It does not seem to me that daylight saving in any particular region would meet the situation. Moreover, it has always been confusing for some area to have daylight saving for certain periods, during the summer while others observe it for different periods, and a vast section of the country not at all. It will be good for all of us to feel that we were doing even this little to economize on power. It would add to the sense of unity.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

A World War Veteran Expresses Himself

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

LETTER FROM OWEN O. MORRIS, ORTING, WASH.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein a letter from a resident of the old soldiers' home at Orting, Wash., in my congressional district, which expresses in blunt language the deep emotions of the World War veteran author. At his request, I am reading it into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

This veteran, who is a student of economics and social reform, and who takes a deep and abiding interest in current national and international affairs, wanted all of the House of Representatives to know how he felt about current tendencies toward war, and legislation which has been passed in connection with so-called national defense. But here is the letter. Let it speak for itself:

OLD SOLDIERS' HOME,
Orting, Wash., June 8, 1941.

UNITED STATES CONGRESS,
Imperial Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Twenty-two years ago last February Gen. John J. Pershing wrote the following form letter:

G. H. Q., AMERICAN A. E. F.,
France, February 28, 1919.

GENERAL ORDERS No. 38–A.

DEAR FELLOW SOLDIERS: Now that your services with the American Expeditionary Forces are about to terminate, I cannot let you go without a personal word. At the call to arms the patriotic young manhood of America eagerly responded and became the formidable army whose decisive victories testify to its efficiency and its valor, with the support of the Nation firmly united to defend the cause of liberty, our Army has executed the will of the people with resolute purpose. Our troops have faithfully fulfilled their trust; and in a succession of brilliant offensives, have overcome the menace to our civilization.

As individuals your part in the World War has been an important one in the sum total of our achievements, whether keeping lonely vigil in the trenches or gallantly storming the enemies' stronghold; whether enduring monotonous drudgery at the rear or sustaining line at the front, each has bravely and efficiently played his part; by cheerful endurance of hardship and deprivation, by vigor, strength, and idomitable will, made effective by thorough organization and cordial cooperation, you inspired the war-worn Allies with new life, and turned the tide of threatened defeat into overwhelming victory.

With concentrated devotion to duty and a will to conquer, you have loyally served your country. By your extraordinary conduct a standard has been established and maintained, never before attained by any army. With minds and body as clean and strong as the decisive blows you delivered against the foe, you are soon to return to the pursuit of peace. In leaving the scenes of your victories, may I ask that you carry home your high ideals and continue to live as you have served: an honor to the principles for which you have fought and to the fallen comrades you leave behind.

It is with pride in your success that I extend to you my sincere thanks.

Faithfully,

JOHN J. PERSHING,
Commander in Chief.

Every soldier of the A. E. F. was supposed to have received one of these letters. I have always cherished this letter very highly all of these years. It has inspired me to carry out our high ideals. I have this letter framed and hanging on the wall in my room. I have always considered it a receipt for a task well done. But, since the Senate munitions investigation, I have learned to my sorrow that instead of saving the world for democracy, we saved it for autocracy and plutocracy by creating 22,000 new millionaires from war profits alone, and by this process created 23,000,000 paupers.

Ever since the first World War we have been traveling the road of the ancient nations. All we have to do is to read history to see our destiny if we take part in this European conflict.

President Roosevelt warned us in 1938 that the fabric of peace on the continent of Europe, if not throughout the rest of the world, is in immediate danger. The consequences of its rupture are incalculable. Should hostilities break out, the lives of millions of men, women, and children in every country involved will most certainly be lost under circumstances of unspeakable horror. The economic system of every country involved may be completely wrecked. The United States has no political entanglements. It is caught in no mesh of hatreds. Elements of all Europe have formed its civilization.

You gentlemen know that the President was speaking the truth in 1938.

I will not take time for his many other statements. Only one more. Our President was supposed to have said at Chautauqua, N. Y., in 1936, "industrial and agricultural production for a war market may give immense fortunes to a few men—for the Nation as a whole it produces disaster."

You gentlemen who voted amendments to our neutrality law and who supported the conscription bill, the lend-lease bill, stand convicted and should be impeached. You had no right under the Constitution to grant our President powers which are not prescribed by that document.

The Wall and Downing Streets are planning on immense profits out of this legalized murder. This will be settled some time around a council table, after they have slaughtered and maimed our young manhood.

Tyrants throughout the ages have forced their enslaved peoples into battle. Likewise President Roosevelt thinks he will force the slaves of Wall Street to fight for their slavery. I say, "No." I am protesting out of respect for my ancestry and my fallen comrades whom I left on Flanders' Field. Their sons are not going to be sacrificed on the field of battle to increase the fortunes of the same group of plutocrats whom their fathers put on the throne.

It is time for the people to stand on their constitutional rights. I know if we refuse to cooperate with our slave masters we are considered traitors. The people will either be traitors to themselves and the country or be traitors to Wall Street. Before this war is over, as the President said, our economic system will be completely shattered. Our debt will be over $100,000,000,000, and the coming generation will be born into slavery and they will be taught to love, cherish, and to fight and die on the battlefields to defend it.

I must add that our economic system is already shattered. We have approximately 52,000,000 shrunken bellies in this country to prove it. It is certainly not worth fighting for.

"IN FLANDERS FIELD

"(By Lt. Col. John McCrae)

"In Flanders Field the poppies blow
Between the crosses, row on row,
That mark our places, and in the sky,
The larks still bravely singing, fly
Scarce heard amid the guns below.

"We are the dead! short days ago
We lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
Loved and were loved, and now we lie
In Flanders Field.

"Take up our quarrel with the foe.
To you with failing hands we throw
The torch; be yours to hold it high.
If ye break faith with us who die
We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
On Flanders Field."

"OUR ANSWER

"Sleep on, brave pals, where poppies grow
Between the crosses, row on row,
That mark the places where ye fell
Amid the flaming fires of hell
In Flanders' field.

"Ye may be dead, but still ye live.
Your courage unto us ye give
To drive the barbarous foe to flight,
Till none remain to cast their blight
In Flanders' field.

"Take up your quarrel with the foe?
'Tis taken up, brave pals, for lo!
The torch ye threw, we hold it high,
We break no faith with ye who die
In Flanders' field."

Gentlemen, in closing, I promise not to break faith with those who died on Flanders' field.

OWEN O. MORRIS,
Served in Company I, Three Hundred and Sixth Infantry, Seventy-seventh Division.

President Roosevelt Should Keep His Promise to American Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

PROTEST BY 120 REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS TO THE NEW DEAL ADMINISTRATION OPPOSING ANY REDUCTIONS IN TARIFF DUTIES ON FARM PRODUCTS IN THE PROPOSED TRADE AGREEMENTS WITH ARGENTINA AND URUGUAY

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, acting under instructions from 120 of my fellow Members in the House of Representatives, I appeared, on June 23, before the Committee for Reciprocity Information in opposition to any reductions in the tariff duties on farm products in connection with the proposed trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay.

In my oral argument to the committee, I opposed any reduction of tariff duties on farm products raised in the United States and demanded full protection to the home market for American producers of dairy and meat products, flaxseed, vegetables, fruits, furs, hides, wool, and other competitive commodities.

In addition to my oral argument, I read and filed with the committee the following protest which was signed by 120 Members of this House, as their names appear on this significant document in behalf of American producers:

To the Committee on Reciprocity Information:

In re proposed trade agreement with Argentina and Uruguay.

We, the undersigned, Members of the House of Representatives, strongly oppose the proposed negotiation of trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay. Our reasons are:

1. International trade is chaotic. Europe is cut off from normal world commerce. No one can foresee the future pattern of international trade; whether it will again be unrestricted, or be limited by great blocs or groups of countries trading freely within themselves but walled off from the rest of the world. A few large nations may control international trade for their own purposes. Therefore, any foreign-trade commitments are dangerous at this time.

Although right of termination of agreement upon notice by either party may be provided, such right has never been exercised even under greatly altered circumstances. Agreements with Holland, France, and Belgium-Luxembourg have never been even suspended despite German subjugation of those countries.

2. The principal avowed purpose of the reciprocal trade agreement policy, according to Secretary of State Hull, has been the promotion of world peace. Its complete failure to achieve that end is overwhelmingly evident.

3. All concessions granted in either of these two proposed agreements would be generalized to all countries under our unconditional, most-favored-nation treaties. Even Japan, Italy, and Russia would be included. Germany would be the only nation excluded. Generalizing such concessions would dissipate our bargaining power. When conflicts cease we must have that power as "a club behind the door" to reestablish our world-trade position, and command for American producers full equity in world commerce.

4. The trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay are supposed to promote hemispheric defense. We believe hemispheric defense cannot be advanced by piecemeal bargaining between the United States and individual countries.

Hemispheric defense must be considered in the light of the relations of these countries with other nations of the world. Great Britain has by far the largest foreign investments in Argentina and Uruguay. Consequently, the trade of those two countries is tied most strongly to the British Empire. To secure the bulk of this trade we would have to take over such investments. We could accept these in payment for lend-lease loans. But, we would have to accept our interest in large quantities of competitive products, mostly agricultural.

5. By acreage restrictions, loans, food stamps, and export subsidies, the Government has, for 5 years, undertaken to raise farm prices, and control surpluses, which have become embarrassing notwithstanding. By price raising, it now encourages increased production of certain foods. When the present emergency is ended, we will face (as after the first World War) unmanageable surpluses, and price disruptions. It is, therefore, illogical to lower duties on competitive agricultural products.

6. Current shortage of ships for Latin American trade would make of the agreements merely a gesture now, but the agreements would become fully effective at the close of the war, when we will be undergoing the convulsions of internal readjustments and collapsed farm prices.

7. Concessions to Argentina and Uruguay are contemplated on plums, prunes, pears, and tomatoes. The Department of Agriculture states these commodities are even now being produced in surplus quantities in this country. It has been expending public funds in surplus removal operations to raise their prices. Reduction of duties on such commodities would directly negate those efforts.

8. The Department of Agriculture, by various devices, stimulates production of other crops on former surplus crop lands. For instance, flaxseed is being grown on acreage formerly planted to grains. Dairying has increased tremendously in the South, replacing cotton. These proposed trade agreements include flaxseed, cheese, casein, and lactrine among the commodities on which concessions may be granted. The dangerous inconsistency is patent.

9. Various Federal social policies have increased the cost of producing meat products. Nevertheless, in the proposed agreements, the concessions include extracts of meats, preserved and prepared meats, corned beef hash, hides, and wool. Here again is glaring inconsistency. Distress to cattle producers would result.

10. The current policy of the administration is to raise wages, increasing production costs. Such a policy cannot possibly be integrated with still another trade policy of admitting to the American markets the farm products of low wages, long hours, and low-living standards. The American farmer must share the social gains.

11. These proposed trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay certainly will contain concessions detrimental to large groups of our population. Fear of potential injury from such trade agreements will impair that national unity so vital in the present emergency.

In conclusion, we join in the specific protests filed with your committee by farmers, farm organizations, and others, opposing reduction in the duties on casein, meat products, cheese, flax seed, grapes, plums, pears, grass seed, tomatoes, asparagus, wool, furs, hides, and other competitive products in connection with the proposed trade agreements. We hold that American producers are entitled to full protection in their domestic market.

The farmers of the United States properly expect President Roosevelt to keep his promise to them when he solemnly declared:

"I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my entire farm program, and every farmer knows it and will not be deceived."

We, the undersigned Members of Congress, insist the President keep this pledge to American farmers.

We respectfully submit our protest to your committee:

August H. Andresen, Minnesota; Earl C. Michener, Michigan; Clifford R. Hope, Kansas; Harold Knutson, Minnesota; N. M. Mason, Illinois; Bertrand Gearhart, California; Fred L. Crawford, Michigan; John Taber, New York; Carroll Reece, Tennessee; Jesse P. Wolcott, Michigan; J. Roland Kinzer, Pennsylvania; Clare E. Hoffman, Michigan; Charles L. Gifford, Massachusetts; George W. Gillie, Indiana; Carl T. Curtis, Nebraska; Bartel J. Jonkman, Michigan; Everett M. Dirksen, Illinois; W. A. Pittenger, Minnesota; Leland Ford, California; John Jennings, Jr., Tennessee; John W. Gwynne, Iowa; J. W. Wadsworth, New York; Robert F. Jones, Ohio; Frank Fellows, Maine; Stephen Bolles, Wisconsin; Ross Rizley, Oklahoma; Francis Case, South Dakota; John M. Vorys, Ohio; James V. Heidinger, Illinois; Forest A. Harness, Indiana; Charles L. Gerlach, Pennsylvania; Albert G. Rutherford, Pennsylvania; Harve Tibbott, Pennsylvania; Henry C. Dworshak, Idaho; Joseph J. O'Brien, New York; Daniel A. Reed, New York; Albert J. Engel, Michigan; Paul Cunningham, Iowa; Roy O. Woodruff, Michigan; Usher L. Burdick, North Dakota; Ben F. Jensen, Iowa; Louis E. Graham, Pennsylvania; Benjamin Jarrett, Pennsylvania; Frank B. Keefe, Wisconsin; Charles S. Dewey, Illinois; Joseph P. O'Hara, Minnesota; Raymond S. Springer, Indiana; Homer D. Angell, Oregon; Thomas A. Jenkins, Ohio; Charles A. Halleck, Indiana; Oscar Youngdahl, Minnesota; James W. Mott, Oregon; H. Carl Andersen, Minnesota; Jessie Sumner, Illinois; Edith Nourse Rogers, Massachusetts; John Z. Anderson, California; Melvin J. Maas, Minnesota; A. D. Baumhart, Jr., Ohio; Clarence J. Brown, Ohio; Charles H. Elston, Ohio; U. S. Guyer, Kansas; Allen T. Treadway, Massachusetts; Charles R. Robertson, North Dakota; Richard P. Gale, Minnesota; Frank Carlson, Kansas; Paul W. Shafer, Michigan; Henry O. Talle, Iowa; Anton J. Johnson, Illinois; W. H. Wheat, Illinois; William N. Stratton, Illinois; Evan Howell, Illinois; Harry L. Englebright, California; Charles R. Clason, Massachusetts; Reid F. Murray, Wisconsin; Fred C. Gilchrist, Iowa; K. M. LeCompte, Iowa; W. P. Lambertson, Kansas; Noble J. Johnson, Indiana; William S. Hill, Colorado; Gerald W. Landis, Indiana; J. Edgar Chenoweth, Colorado; Karl Mundt, South Dakota; Edward H. Rees, Kansas; Thomas E. Martin, Iowa; Chauncey W. Reed, Illinois; Thomas Winter, Kansas; Earl Wilson, Indiana; William H. Blackney, Michigan; William H. Stevenson, Wisconsin; Joseph L. Johns, Wisconsin; Cliff Clevenger, Ohio; Karl Stefan, Nebraska; George A. Paddock, Illinois; Philip A. Bennett, Missouri; Walter C. Ploeser, Missouri; Joseph W. Martin, Jr., Massachusetts; George H. Bender, Ohio; Donald H. McLean, New Jersey; Dewey Short, Missouri; Frederick C. Smith, Ohio; Oren S. Copeland, Nebraska; James C. Oliver, Maine; C. W. Bishop, Illinois; J. Harry McGregor, Ohio; John M. Robsion, Kentucky; Ward Johnson, California; Hamilton Fish, New York; Charles A. Plumley, Vermont; Ivor D. Fenton, Pennsylvania; Fred Bradley, Michigan; Gordon Canfield, New Jersey; George A. Dondero, Michigan; Robert F. Rich, Pennsylvania; L. C. Arends, Illinois; Lewis D. Thill, Wisconsin; Robert A. Grant, Indiana; Jeannette Rankin, Montana; Margaret Chase Smith, Maine; Leo E. Allen, Illinois; Robert L. Rodgers, Pennsylvania.

In Tribute to William E. Borah

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

TRIBUTE BY HON. COMPTON I. WHITE, OF IDAHO

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday at Fairfield, Ill., the birthplace of the late Senator William E. Borah was dedicated as a shrine, and many thousands of people paid their respects to his memory by attending the ceremony. In connection with this event, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include my sincere tribute which was forwarded to the dedicatory committee:

IN TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM E. BORAH

(By COMPTON I. WHITE, Member of Congress)

At a time when the United States of America girds for defense, while the greatest upheaval of governments in the history of the world shakes the very foundations of civilization, it is fitting that we pause to reflect on the philosophy of that beloved national and international personage, the late Senator William E. Borah, and pay tribute to his memory.

To us he left for guidance the heritage of his faith in representative government, his hope for comity between all nations, and his love of social justice.

We do well to honor him whose intense patriotism, independence of thought, courage of conviction, and fearless leadership need emulation in these troubled times. He exemplified his ideals of citizenship by sacrificing a lucrative legal career to serve his country as a Member of the United States Senate for 36 years; he refused to adopt ideas and practices simply because they had been established by usage or were orthodox in theory but ever sought knowledge and truth from the highest authorities of history and literature and from his contemporaries; his conclusions he announced with calm conviction when he knew excoriating criticism would be his lot; if the mantle of acclaim fell on his shoulders after his ideas had been tested in the crucible of debate and public opinion, he brushed it aside with the simplicity and serenity of a great soul.

Senator Borah once said, "Time and time alone, unerring and remorseless, will give us each our proper place in the affection of our countrymen and in the esteem and commendation of those who are to come after us."

The affection of the people of his native State of Illinois is attested by the preservation of his birthplace so that posterity may visit the spot and reflect upon the American concept of equality of opportunity. It was at the close of the Civil War that Senator Borah was born in the simple surroundings of an average American home; his childhood days in the environment of a Christian household, his education without the panoply of wealth, his determined effort to establish himself as a citizen of worth in his adopted State of Idaho, and his rise to national fame and international importance exemplify the American way of life.

Before the sands of time had run their course in the life of Senator Borah, the people of Idaho bestowed upon him the honor of having the most majestic mountain within its borders named Mount Borah. They honored him for the better part of half a century with the highest office the State could bestow, a seat in the United States Senate. He sleeps in hallowed ground in Idaho.

The name of Borah the Nation over connotes a brilliant intellect, an illustrious record, a polity of justice. He bears the esteem of countless masses in this country and abroad. As it has been said of another great man of Illinois, so it may be said of Senator William E. Borah, "He belongs to the ages."

July in American History

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

ARTICLE BY HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, with Independence Day only a few days away, we should rededicate ourselves to the principles of our founding fathers and the freedoms which we enjoy. Freedom is our heritage; to defend freedom is our duty.

We are all proud of American history, and there have been many events which will long remain in our memories. I am herewith submitting to the people of America historical high lights that occurred in our Nation's history during the month of July. I intend to submit further historical high lights periodically throughout this session of Congress.

The article follows:

July 1. The Battle of Gettysburg began in 1863; in 1898 during the Spanish-American War the Battle of San Juan was fought.

July 2. Sherman antitrust law passed in 1890; first elevated railroad opened to traffic in New York City in 1867.

July 3. George Washington assumed command of the Continental Army at Boston in 1775; Battle of Santiago fought during Spanish-American War in 1898.

July 4. In addition to the signing of the Declaration of Independence this day is celebrated for (1) the opening of the United States Naval Academy at West Point in 1802; (2) the birth of President Calvin Coolidge at Plymouth, Vt., in 1872; (3) the completion of the first Pacific cable in 1903; (4) the birth of the great novelist, Nathaniel Hawthorne, at Salem, Mass., in 1804; (5) the birth of the immortal composer, Stephen Foster Collins in 1826; (6) the enactment of the first tariff law in 1789; (7) and the death in 1826 of Presidents John Adams and Thomas Jefferson.

July 5. David G. Farragut first United States admiral, born in 1801, and P. T. Barnum born in 1810.

July 6. Republican Party organized at Jackson, Mich., in 1854; John Paul Jones, naval hero of the Revolutionary War, born in 1747.

July 7. Columbia University established in New York City in 1754 as King's College.

July 8. Birth of John D. Rockefeller in 1839; Jacob Barsimson, first Jew, reached New Amsterdam in 1654.

July 9. Elias Howe, inventor of the sewing machine, born in 1819.

July 10. Wyoming admitted to the Union in 1890; James Abbott McNeill Whistler, one of great American painters, born at Lowell, Mass., in 1834.

July 11. United States Marine Corps established by Congress in 1798; John Quincy Adams, sixth President of the United States, born in 1767.

July 12. Henry David Thoreau, great naturalist and philosopher, born at Concord, Mass., in 1817.

July 13. Congress passes Northwest Ordinance of 1787, first law for government of territory outside of Original Thirteen Colonies, which provided government for area out of which were carved States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin.

July 14. First international industrial exposition opens as Crystal Palace World's Fair in New York City in 1853.

July 15. World War battle of Chateau Thierry begins in 1918.

July 16. Birth of Mary Baker Eddy, founder of Christian Science, in 1821.

July 17. Congress passes act authorizing acquisition of District of Columbia as seat of United States Government, in 1790.

July 18. Horatio Alger, noted author, died in 1899.

July 19. First woman's rights convention met at Seneca Falls, N. Y., in 1848.

July 20. Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States became part of the law of the land in 1867.

July 21. First battle of Bull Run began during War Between the States in 1861.

July 22. Pilgrim Fathers leave Holland for America in 1620; first patent for color photography granted to Frederick E. Ives in 1890.

July 23. First workable typewriter patented in 1829.

July 24. Brigham Young and the Mormons arrive on site of Salt Lake City in 1847, a day now celebrated as Utah's Pioneer Day.

July 25. Smokeless powder used for the first time in the United States in experiments at Sandy Hook, N. J., in 1891.

July 26. William Jennings Bryan died in 1925.

July 27. First successful Atlantic cable completed in 1866.

July 28. Ballington Booth, founder of the Volunteers of America, born in 1859.

July 29. Pittsburgh Gazette, first newspaper west of the Alleghenies, published in 1786; BoothTarkington, noted author, born in Indianapolis in 1869.

July 30. First Colonial legislature—Virginia House of Burgesses—meets at Jamestown in 1619; Henry Ford born in 1863.

July 31. First patent issued by the United States Government granted to Samuel Hopkins in 1790.

What Promises Will Mr. Roosevelt Honor?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STEPHEN A. DAY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHICAGO SUNDAY TRIBUNE

Mr. DAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Sunday Tribune of June 29, 1941:

[From the Chicago Sunday Tribune of June 29, 1941]

WHAT PROMISES WILL MR. ROOSEVELT HONOR?

The way the ball is tossed from Downing Street to the White House and from the White House to Downing Street, from British ministers to American Cabinet officials and back again would indicate preconcerted teamwork and probably does.

Mr. Roosevelt had asked for suspended judgment on the Robin Moor incident. His calm disappeared in his highly dramatized message to Congress in which he virtually said that American battleships would speak the next word.

It is just possible that Mr. Roosevelt had heard from London that the Hitler move against Stalin was to be expected momentarily and knew that if he was to make anything of the Robin Moor incident he had to get in before it was completely forgotten. He had waited for the public to get out ahead in demanding war. The public remained calm, and if the incident were to be made a part of the war propaganda Mr. Roosevelt had to move quickly. London accepted his message as something just preceding a declaration of war.

We have Mr. Roosevelt's own words for it that the things he is doing would put the United States in war. To draw the conclusion is only logical. He can be called as a witness against himself to prove that he has intended to bring about a situation which he thought would make war unescapable.

When he was a candidate for the second term in 1936 he made a speech in Chautauqua, N. Y., in which he said he hated war, and warned the country that if it should break out in Europe there would be a tremendous pressure exerted in this country to tear down our neutrality. He then said it would be clamor of greed and that to resist it would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace. He added: "The effective maintenance of American neutrality depends today, as in the past, on the wisdom and determination of whoever at the moment occupy the offices of President and Secretary of State."

Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull continue to occupy those offices, partly because the second-term candidate was not talking and acting as the third-term President does.

In 1939 the war of which Mr. Roosevelt had been talking was on. The clamor and the pressure for abandonment of American neutrality also was on. Mr. Roosevelt, about to become a candidate for the third term, appeared still to be a man of peace, as he would have to be if he was to be a successful candidate, but he wanted some changes in the neutrality law. He didn't want to destroy the law which he had predicted would be attacked; no, he wanted to improve it.

People who saw through his intentions were convinced at the time that if he got what he wanted neutrality was out of the window. But Mr. Roosevelt said "No," all he wanted was power to keep American ships and American citizens out of war zones. "This means less likelihood of incidents and controversies which tend to draw us into conflict, as they did in the last World War. There lies the road to peace."

That was a part of the program. It was the part which was used to justify the other part, which opened American markets to belligerents who could send ships with cash to buy munitions.

Cash and carry was safe—safe, no doubt, if guarded by the wisdom and determination of the men who happened to occupy the offices of the President and Secretary of State. "Our acts," said Mr. Roosevelt to Congress, "must be guided by one single, hard-headed thought, keeping America out of this war."

The third-term candidate asking for votes made more promises. There would be no foreign wars. Your boys are not going to be sent to war. All this, and more, again and again. When the third-term candidate, through the misjudgment of the American people, became the third-term President, the first thing he did was to throw his neutrality law into the ashcan and push the lease-lend bill through Congress. Now he presents to Congress the case of an American ship, carrying American passengers and goods, bound for a belligerent port, sunk as an act of piracy by an outlaw nation, one of "the incidents and controversies which tend to draw us into conflict, as they did in the last World War."

As a second-term candidate and as a third-term candidate Mr. Roosevelt deceived the people. To secure his election he declared for peace. As soon as he was back in the White House he took steps for war. We do not know yet what promises he was making all the time to foreign governments. We don't know what promises he made to France or what promises he has made to Great Britain other than the public pledges that all the resources of the United States were at their disposal. Secret commitments are unknown. They would seem to exist. The time for their disclosure will come later.

Mr. Roosevelt's promises to the American people have been to keep them out of war. All his actions are leading them into it. He is endeavoring to make war inescapable.

Mr. Roosevelt's words to this country have not been trustworthy. The British think that his word to them can be trusted. To act in good faith to them he must act in bad faith to his fellow countrymen. Which promise is he about to honor?

World Situation Has Undergone Far-Reaching Change

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. BRECKENRIDGE LONG TO THE CHATTANOOGA (TENN.) ROTARY CLUB

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address delivered by Mr. Breckenridge Long, Assistant Secretary of State, to the Chattanooga (Tenn.) Rotary Club on June 26:

An amazing aspect of the world of today is the speed of international developments. In less than 2 years the world situation has undergone far-reaching change. Since that fateful morning in September 1939, when Hitler's legions swarmed into Poland, the march of events has proceeded with awful suddenness and in unforeseen directions. Many nations which enjoyed freedom and independence have been crushed by the onrushing tide of aggressor armies. Peoples who yesterday knew the blessings of liberty today live under the tyrannical rule of conquerors who impose upon their victims brutal methods reminiscent of the darkest ages of history.

Sadly enough, the peoples of these countries which have gone down before the totalitarian armies are partly to blame for the tragedy which has befallen them. They closed their eyes to the dangers about them. They refused to believe that the powerful military machines which were being constructed by the dictators would be used against them. They would not be convinced that the dictators were preparing a program of world conquest. They allowed themselves to be hypnotized by promises that the dictators had no designs on other nations. As a consequence, they neglected to prepare adequate defense against the critical dangers confronting them.

Meanwhile the totalitarian nations geared their entire economies for war. Year after year they followed this policy relentlessly. They regimented their peoples. They trained great armies. They darkened the skies with airplanes. They produced a huge volume of military equipment and accumulated tremendous supplies of war materials. They directed their entire national effort to preparation for aggressive warfare.

When the storm broke the totalitarian armies with their superior training and equipment were able to overrun nation after nation. One by one the smaller peoples fell. The brutal invasion and ruthless extinguishment of the independence of many countries are still vivid in our minds.

Each step in the conquest of the totalitarians has been the destruction of a nation. Each step has been used in preparation for the next—the subjugated people, the area acquired, the resources taken—all have been used immediately to support new advances. In addition to being equipped with powerful arms, the totalitarians make use of every weapon of subversion, deceit, corruption, and assault. In carrying on their operations they are not restrained by considerations of generally recognized law or principles of humanity.

The totalitarians have no fixed limit for their program of conquest. They are desperately struggling to get control of the seas as an essential means of achieving and maintaining their conquest of other continents. If they should succeed in this, the danger to the United States and to the other nations of the Western Hemisphere, great as it is today, would be many times greater. Under modern conditions of warfare the open oceans can become a highway for, rather than a barrier against, an attack on this hemisphere.

The danger before us is as great as or greater than any we have ever experienced in our entire history as a nation. We in America must be fully aroused to this patent fact before it is too late. I hope that we can profit by the experience of the peoples who have felt the full force of the Nazi military machine and who are now enslaved under a merciless, tyrannical rule. If we can really profit by their experience, we will drive with increased intensity to build our defense strong enough to insure that the war shall not reach this hemisphere.

The task of defense of this Nation is of tremendous proportions. Safeguarding our heritage requires the full and continuous efforts of each and every one. The single effort of one individual may seem small. But we have 130,000,000 individuals in this country, and each one of us has a real stake in the outcome of the effort in which we are now engaged. Each must work with a sense that what he does is important in determining whether this country shall be secure. The members of the armed forces have their particular field of activity. The worker on the farm or in the factory or in the mine can make a definite contribution. Each of us can contribute in some way, directly or indirectly, to the national-defense effort.

The days and weeks and months ahead will be strenuous. Sacrifice in some degree will be necessary for all of us. However, we can be assured that the sacrifice will be of some privileges and not of fundamental rights. We must realize that the end in view is the preservation of our national existence, our free institutions, our way of life. It is to insure that the lamp of liberty, lighted in this country a century and a half ago, shall not be darkened. For that end, no sacrifice is too great.

I often think that in this country we are too prone to take our liberties for granted. We forget that they were brought about through the struggle and sacrifice of the founders of this Nation. We assume, as a matter of course, the perpetual existence of individual freedom, freedom of religion, freedom of speech, and freedom of the press. We do not realize that unless we watch our ramparts there may be a black-out of these freedoms. With our country surrounded on both sides by vast expanses of water and far from the scene of battle, we would like to enjoy our leisure and luxury and trust to the future to take care of itself.

Meanwhile, other peoples lie prostrate under the invader's heel. Their liberties have been taken away. Starvation is rampant among them. Children are suffering mentally and physically. Families are torn apart. The firing squads regularly take their toll. Terrorism is the order of the day.

It is all very alluring for us to sit complacently in our comfortable homes and think in illusory vein that war will not come to us here—that the stories we hear of Europe and of Asia and of Africa are, after all, happenings thousands of miles away—that it cannot happen here. It is all too easy to be deceived by stretches of fertile fields which run out beyond horizons and to feel that no danger from abroad could carry this far. So thought Poland. So thought Norway, stretching way up into the Arctic circle. So thought Greece, bathed by the warm water of the Mediterranean. So it was thought on the tropic sands of Africa, in the distant recesses of China, far Indo-China, and old Siam down near the Equator.

We must not be beguiled by such thought. We must understand that distance measured in miles has been reduced to inches, that time has been decimated and space rendered of no protective value. We must understand that the actual waging of that thing called war has changed. There was a time that it commenced when the shooting began. But now it has predecessors the consequences of which are worse if possible than the devastation of actual military combat. There is the insidious infiltration of whispering agents casting doubt upon the justice of our own position, faintly praising the qualities of the intending intruder. Then come agents of trouble and discord, inciting opposition at home, making trouble in centers of mechanical production. Then the saboteurs to throw monkey wrenches into the machinery—all with the object of creating discord and dismay and of rendering nugatory efficient organization. The radio becomes the instrument of insidious voices. Doubt is cultivated. Fear is propagated—fear, the worst of our foes, the ally of threatening force.

Another predecessor is economic penetration, to destroy existing markets for your goods, to gain footholds in the territory of your neighbors, and, when economic and financial conditions have been sufficiently cultivated, to institute political control over some not distant country. Once political control is established, then the military armies, through the air, on the water, by land, and from the new base the cowering inhabitants become servitors, even unwilling partners of mechanized military autocracy in preparation for its next plunge, with a history of suffering in its wake and a promise of sorrow for the next victim—unless stopped in its mad career.

We must determine that these things shall not happen here. They cannot happen here if we unite in carrying forward a mighty and sustained defense program; if we build our defense swiftly, efficiently, and adequately.

In this dangerous hour, we should prepare for every possible contingency. We must prepare to meet a challenge from whatever direction it may come. We must continue to increase the numbers and efficiency of our Army, our Navy, and our Air Corps. We must build great fleets of airplanes. We must launch increased numbers of merchant ships. We must step up the production of every weapon necessary for self-defense. All these should be done with the utmost speed, for speed is the vital need of the day.

As a part of our national-defense effort the people of the United States have approved overwhelmingly the policy of extending assistance to Great Britain, China, and other nations which are endeavoring to turn back the advance of the aggressors. It is clear that our own interests justify fully the furnishing of weapons necessary for use in the heroic resistance of the British people. This is but the exercise of our inalienable right of self-defense. In accordance with the policy expressed in the Lend-Lease Act, we are determined to continue to send to Great Britain in ever-increasing quantities food, airplanes, guns, ammunition, and other necessary supplies.

Another direction in which our defense preparations are being made is through cooperation with the other nations of this hemisphere. An attack by an aggressor power against any nation of this hemisphere obviously would menace the United States. Our system of national defense, therefore, is part of a hemisphere defense system in which we are cooperating with the other American nations. We are advising those nations of our defense preparations. We have received military missions from them and, in turn, we have sent military experts to them. It is our purpose to encourage a frank interchange of information and plans. The naval bases which we have acquired from Great Britain are for the protection of the entire Western Hemisphere. The unity of the American nations was shown when these bases were promptly made available by the United States to the other American republics for cooperative use.

Your Government is fully alive to the situation confronting the United States. Each of the three branches of our National Government is aware of the needs of that situation. Each officer of your Government is on guard. We only hope that each citizen for himself realizes the significance of the situation as it actually exists and the consequences for his own self and for the members of his family and for their joint peace unless we all of us join in a magnificent effort for defense.

President Roosevelt has proclaimed a full emergency. That fact alone should bring realization to every man and woman in America that the danger is direct and will be imminent unless we all join in a united effort. In making that declaration the President said:

"I call upon all the loyal citizens engaged in production for defense. * * *

"I call upon all our loyal workmen as well as employers. * * *

"I call upon loyal State and local leaders and officials. * * *

"I call upon all loyal citizens to place the Nation's needs first in mind and in action to the end that we may mobilize and have ready for instant defensive use all of the physical powers, all of the moral strength, and all of the material resources of this Nation."

The call has gone forth. We beg of you to heed the call—and to do each one his bit in the mightiest effort of all time.

A Woman of No Importance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VITO MARCANTONIO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein an editorial which appeared in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 20, 1941. I recommend it to every American:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 20, 1941]

A WOMAN OF NO IMPORTANCE

"Mrs. Robert Wood, wife of the State Communist Party secretary, was convicted last night of criminal syndicalism by a district court jury, which recommended the maximum punishment of 10 years' imprisonment and $5,000 fine." So runs a laconic news dispatch from Oklahoma City.

For what was Mrs. Wood convicted? Stripped down to its bare essentials, she was convicted because she adheres to a political philosophy—namely, communism—that is hateful to most Americans, including this newspaper. Mrs. Wood did not murder anyone. She did not commit sabotage. She did not steal. She did not cheat on her income tax. She did not violate any of the basic laws of the land.

What she did was think thoughts, read books, and express ideas which the Ku Kluxers of Oklahoma did not like. For that she is to spend 10 years in prison, more years than many of our foulest criminals have served.

Mrs. Wood, of course, is a woman of no importance. In the eyes of some Americans, particularly of the Ku Klux type which they breed in Oklahoma—and this goes for some of their judges, prosecutors, sheriffs, and other public officials—the fact that Mrs. Wood is a Communist places her beyond the pale. It places her not only beyond the pale of social respectability, but also beyond the pale of law, of justice, of the fundamental rights for which Americans have died and for which they may soon die again.

We want to ask a question. Since when has it become a crime in the United States—in the land of George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Abraham Lincoln, and Oliver Wendell Holmes, yes, and in the land of Franklin Roosevelt, who has expressed his determination to carry the four precious freedoms of America all over the world—since when has it become a crime to think, to read, and to talk?

But let us explain in clear, simple language about Mrs. Wood. Her conviction is one of a series of prosecutions being conducted in Oklahoma as part of a "State-wide witch hunt," described in detail in the Post-Dispatch of January 25, 1941, in an article by F. A. Behymer. Last December, a District Court convicted Alan Shaw, 22 years old, of being a Communist and sentenced him to 10 years in prison and to pay a $5,000 fine. In the preceding October, Robert Wood, husband of Mrs. Wood, received an identical penalty, as did Eli Jaffee last April.

John Eberle, assistant county attorney, announced after the Shaw conviction that it meant that any member of the Communist Party faced like conviction and penalty in Oklahoma. The evidence upon which these people were convicted consists largely of copious extracts from books and pamphlets seized at Wood's book store, including standard works on economics to be found in all libraries. If the F. B. I. should raid the St. Louis Public Library, it could establish the same kind of case against Librarian Compton and his staff.

The Oklahoma crusade has not been confined to Communists, but has been directed also against the religious sect known as Jehovah's Witnesses, against university professors, and everyone else who does not fit into the Ku Klux pattern. Oh, it may be said that the Communists deserve what they get and the Jehovah's Witnesses are crackpots and the university professors are this and that. Perhaps so.

But the Ku Klux spirit, once it gains the ascendancy, does not stop there. Let us not forget the three principal targets of Ku Kluxism in its heydey. Its objectives were Catholics, Jews, and Negroes. Not only Catholics, Jews, and Negroes, but anyone who, because of his belief in American principles of justice and freedom, sympathized with the victims of the Klan. Once the Ku Klux spirit runs amok no one is safe from the midnight raiding parties, the floggings, the maiming, and the killing, to say nothing of concentration camp and penitentiary. Once terrorism prevails, it is not alone the hated Communists, the despised Jehovah's Witnesses, and such minorities as the Catholics, Negroes, and Jews who are in jeopardy, but anyone who stands for the Bill of Rights and the American way of life.

Mrs. Wood is nothing. Joe Doakes, the Jehovah's Witness, is nothing. Tom Murphy, Isadore Goldstein, and Mose Jones are nothing. Just unfortunate human beings who pay the penalty for their beliefs, their religion, their color. Let us not deceive ourselves. Mrs. Wood, Joe Doakes, Tom Murphy, Isadore Goldstein, and Mose Jones are everything, because once they are persecuted with impunity, the whole philosophy of American freedom and justice is turned to dust, ashes, and blood.

We mentioned Thomas Jefferson. We have at our elbow a thick volume containing the sayings of this great Democrat, this celebrated lover of liberty, and every page of it breathes scorn and contempt for the Oklahoma spirit of Ku Kluxism. Said Thomas Jefferson when he first stood up to take the oath as President:

"Bear in mind this sacred principle, that the minority possesses their equal rights, which equal laws must protect, and to violate which would be oppression."

We mentioned the sainted Abraham Lincoln. In his first inaugural, he said:

"If by the mere force of numbers, a majority should deprive a minority of any clearly written constitutional right, it might, in a moral point of view, justify revolution—certainly would if such a right were a vital one."

We mentioned Oliver Wendell Holmes. This revered Justice of the United States Supreme Court said:

"If there is any principle of the Constitution that more imperatively calls for attachment than any other, it is the principle of free thought—not free thought for those who agree with us but freedom for the thought that we hate."

"The thought that we hate." Mrs. Wood's thought. The Jehovah's Witnesses' thought. Even the Ku Kluxer's thought. If we cannot tolerate thoughts in this democracy, it has ceased to be a democracy, and Mr. Roosevelt's "four freedoms" are a sham.

In contrast to the Oklahoma decision, based on an old criminal syndicalism statute, we had from the Iowa Supreme Court the other day another opinion in a case based on a similar old criminal syndicalism statute. The high court of Iowa reversed a decision against William Sentner, a St. Louis labor leader, in which it said that the charge made in the trial that Sentner was a Communist was "immaterial, incompetent, and irrelevant." The court held that Sentner was not being tried for his belief in communism but for syndicalism, and it held him not guilty of that. That was an American decision, not a Ku Klux decision.

We had better pause in this moment of our history to decide whether or not we are going to throw away our liberties, scrap the Bill of Rights, throw our cherished judicial traditions into the discard, and engage in a hysterical Nation-wide witch hunt, or whether we are going to preserve the principles on which this country was founded. We are not yet at war, yet Britain, which is in the midst of a desperate war, still permits Communists to sit in the House of Commons, still permits its citizens and newspapers to speak freely, still recognizes differences of thought, still—in short—practices democratic principles.

Is the United States to scrap freedom, democracy, and justice at a time when the dictators of Europe and Asia are attempting to destroy them?

We mentioned Franklin D. Roosevelt. Only yesterday, in accepting a degree from Oxford University, the President said:

"In days like these * * * we rejoice that this special convocation, in breaking all historical precedent, does so in the great cause of preserving the free learning and the civil liberties which have grown stone upon stone in our lands through the centuries. That is why I am proud to be permitted to have a part."

These words can be clothed with meaning only if, in the days ahead, the people of Oklahoma, Missouri, Texas, Wyoming, and the other States observe the civil liberties "which have grown stone upon stone." They can be clothed with meaning only if the case of Mrs. Wood, the woman of no importance, is merely a savage exception to the principle of free thought rather than a forerunner of a Nation-wide witch hunt.

Communism and the Complicity of President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull have taken into their arms that most bloody aggressor, the homicidal Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the destroyer of democracies, and a dictatorship of unparalleled cruelty.

American money and perhaps American blood are to be used by President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull for the perpetuation of communism in Europe and the rest of the world. They have publicly promised credits and materials to the Soviet Union.

This action by them is the result of their optional use of the fantastic lend-lease bill. This bill established a preposterous foreign policy for the United States. Whereas it was alleged to be a measure to keep the United States out of war it quickly brought the United States to the brink of war in Europe and Asia, and whereas its declared purpose was to defend the so-called democracies, actually it has resulted in the United States underwriting communism in Europe and Asia and undertaking to assist the communistic Soviet Union in its war against Finland, one of the most democratic countries in Europe.

The support of communism by President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull has even led them to refuse, illegally, to apply the Neutrality Act, with its combat-zone provisions to prevent the sinking of American ships, to the war now being waged by the Soviet Union.

There should be a thorough and fearless investigation by a committee of the Congress of the policy of President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull in relation to communism and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, beginning with the recognition of the Soviet Union in 1933. This recognition, given in the face of powerful public protest, gave official standing and encouragement to communism in the United States and led to its present commanding position in the affairs of our country.

There should be investigated also the alleged continuance in important Government positions of persons already disclosed to be Communists by a congressional committee, and the degree to which domestic and foreign policies of the United States are being influenced by communistic thought and philosophy.

Accordingly I have prepared and have introduced in the House a resolution providing for such an investigation by a select committee of the House.

The text of the resolution is as follows:

Whereas in 1933 the United States Government recognized the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics over powerful public protest, thereby giving official standing and encouragement to communism in the United States, and thereafter, despite the most flagrant violations by the Soviet Government of the pledges to this Government upon which our recognition had been predicated, the President resisted repeated demands for withdrawal of recognition; and

Whereas many of the Government policies adopted during the last 8 years show characteristics of communistic philosophy and thought; and

Whereas it has been disclosed by official congressional investigations that Communists have been appointed to important positions in Government circles and are being allowed to continue to hold such positions; and

Whereas President Roosevelt has just offered assistance to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics now at war by way of credits and materials, thereby attempting to guarantee the continuance of communism in Europe and Asia, and

Whereas the President has illegally refused to apply the neutrality act, with its combat zone provisions to prevent the sinking of American ships, to the war now being waged by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in order that the Soviet Union may receive supplies from the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a select committee is hereby created, to consist of five Members, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to investigate the foreign policy of the United States in relation to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the extent to which the domestic policies of the United States are being influenced by communistic thought and philosophy, and the extent of the employment of Communists in the Federal service and the responsibility therefor; and said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, to compel the attendance of and to administer oaths to witnesses, to conduct such inquiries at such times and places as the committee may deem necessary, and to report its findings and recommendations to the House of Representatives at the earliest practicable date.

Arizona Mining Men Protest Recent Restrictions of Mining Activities on Public Domain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

STATEMENT OF ARIZONA SMALL MINE OPERATORS ASSOCIATION

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks and include a statement of the Arizona Small Mine Operators Association, I wish to show why the Nogales Council of that very spendid organization is wholeheartedly supporting my bill, H. R. 2675.

The statement in the form of a letter is as follows:

NOGALES, ARIZ., June 20, 1941.

Hon. JOHN R. MURDOCK,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Herewith we send you resolution passed by the Nogales Council of the Arizona Small Mine Operators' Association and also accompanying statement in support of your bill, H. R. 2675, which would open the Organ Pipe Cactus National Monument to prospecting and mining. We hope that these will be useful in your efforts and that you will read them into the RECORD.

We leave it to the good judgment of the House of Representatives to determine who is best able to evaluate the mining possibilities of this vast territory—parlor conservationists and an ecologist from Oklahoma, or these near resident groups of our association, composed of prospectors, miners, and mining engineers, many of whom have personally traveled over the ground in question. This is too important a matter to be sidetracked by the unsupported statement, "I object."

The statement has been made by a Representative that he has been informed that the ground has no mineral value because it has been prospected for the 400 years since Coronado and no mineral found—as if that settled the matter. The activity of the New Cornelia mine at nearby Ajo, Ariz., is the best answer to that statement. The statement also shows a complete ignorance of prospecting on the part of both the Representative and his informant. No ground is ever completely prospected. Nowadays a mineral prospect is not standing wide open, waiting for any chance passerby to locate it. After every rainy season every arroya in our country again becomes virgin prospecting ground. A miner may travel hundreds or even thousands of miles hunting for a mine that will repay him for a lifetime of labor, and then after a rain and a little landslide locate a mine in his own dooryard. This has happened, not once, but many times.

In seeking the passage of H. R. 2675 we do not seek to establish a precedent, but to correct an error and a grave injustice. We object to the star-chamber method by which the monument was created in the first instance. Had there been due notice given and a public hearing for the interested parties the monument never would have been set up in its present form except by arbitrary, dictatorial action.

The manner of establishing this monument is a sample of what we in the Western States have to face all the time. In Arizona over 62 percent of our land is administered by different Federal bureaus and departments—in 1 county that percentage rises to nearly 90 percent under public ownership. In the Government there are over a million civil servants (would-be masters). Work must be found for them to warrant keeping them in their jobs. Hence the constant reaching out by these bureaus for more territory and more power. A bureaucrat is a bureaucrat, regardless of his party label—Democrat, Republican, Bull Moose—it is just the same. He always itches—for power. We grant a certain administrative ability, but it is an ability which, if allowed to continue its present rampant course, will administer the mining industry clear out of existence. In Arizona we have seen the number of operating mines drop as much as 467 in a single year. The constant restricting of the right of mine means that we will soon be dependent on foreign nations for the major portion of our strategic metal needs.

There are in Arizona over a billion tons of proven low-grade ore that could be extracted and added to the national wealth if we could reduce the cost of extraction 50 cents per ton; but with every lowering of cost by technological improvement we have faced other cost increases that have more than canceled out the economies, and with a fixed selling price we are further away from recovery of that metal than before. How can that low-grade ore be considered a national resource? What value will you put on it?

Every debate of this kind brings up the old, old question: What is conservation? It also shows the folly of making general rules to cover all natural resources. As cited above, hidden mineral buried in the ground cannot be rated as a national resource. Metals taken from the ground and placed in use become a visible resource. They are a permanent addition to the national wealth. Please note that "permanent addition to the national wealth." If any Representative doubts that assertion let him look up at an electric light, and think of the power plant back of it. The copper in that whole utility system will serve the people—in some form—so long as the country shall last. Every other metal object about you, even the new beams for the ceiling, also proves the truth of our saying. But the idealistic, theoretical conservationist will seek to set himself up as Deity for future generations, overlooking the fact that a million years ago a kindly Providence has already provided, and stored up, the mineral essentials to supply every need of the changing economic scene. The unknown and valueless mineral of yesterday becomes the favorite utility of today. We cite only four out of many of these: Arazonite, bentonite, ferberite, vermiculite. How many Representatives can state the nature of these minerals, and give their uses? Yet within the year the Arizona Department of Mineral Resources has been instrumental in opening up operations or has negotiations under way on all of them. In this progressing world who can say what metals your grandchildren will need or even use? Once on a time King Solomon made silver as common as stones in Jerusalem, but today silver has become so precious that, on occasion, Congress will use $100,000 worth of time merely to talk about silver.

Here in Arizona one group of good citizens is spending $25,000,000 to open up one copper deposit at Morenci. By their private enterprise they show their faith in the future basic stability of the country in undertaking to create this new national wealth for national use. Does anyone for a moment think that the Legislature of Arizona would spend $25,000,000—nearly 10 percent of the total assessed value of the State—to develop such a property? What Representative would introduce a bill in Congress to use $25,000,000 of Federal funds to develop such a property and expect its passage? Only development converts hidden mineral into a national resource. The development of any mine is a job for private enterprise—we do not forget R. F. C. loans with their high administration costs when we say that—and we miners are glad to take the risk when we are not hampered by restrictive laws and regulations that make success impossible.

Arizona miners are proud of the fact that our mines give employment to more than 10,000 people. We furnish 86 percent of all the pay carload freight originating on Arizona railroads, and a large part of the trucking also. We have contributed largely to the building and prosperity of all our cities like Phoenix, Tucson, and Prescott. We have had a hand in the building of every college, school, and church in the State. We have furnished our farmer friends with their best market—the home market. Last year one mining company alone spent over half a million dollars for our home State farm products. We have given a beneficial touch to the life of every resident of Arizona and to those of untold millions throughout the Nation.

The same is true of every other mine throughout the whole United States. The mines of the Nation originate 51 percent of all the pay carload freight carried on every railroads in the country and every year millions of other tons carried by boats.

We are glad to be called Coronado's children, but we refuse to be classed as wreckers and scions of Old Nick, as some conservationists would have the public think. We are true conservators of the national welfare by development. Mining is the real primary industry of the Nation, and is entitled to consideration as such. Mining supplies the first requirements of every human activity. If it were not for the miners, Tubal Cain and his successors, the farmer would still be plowing with a crooked stick.

We earnestly pray the speedy passage of H. R. 2675, or that of its similar companion measure that has already passed the Senate.

Respectfully submitted.

NOGALES COUNCIL, A. S. M. O. A.,
HUGO W. MILLER, Chairman.

NOGALES, ARIZ., June 18, 1941.

Resolution adopted by the Nogales Council of the Arizona Small Mine Operators Association in regular meeting held June 18, 1941

Whereas the present emergency has demonstrated that the United States is not self-sufficient in the production of necessary elements for national defense, but must depend on foreign countries for even such a basic essential as copper; and

Whereas the Federal Government now owns and controls 45,155,000 acres of land in Arizona, being three-fifths of the entire State, which is administered in an arbitrary and bureaucratic manner with little thought as to the welfare of the State in which the land lies, nor legitimate mining development in accordance with national needs; and

Whereas of the above amount 19,566,339 acres lie in Indian reservations where there are many mineral deposits of proven value, but there is not a single mine in operation on any reservation in the State, entirely administered by the Indian Bureau, due to restrictive regulations made by officials who know little about, and care less for the mining industry; and

Whereas the Organ Pipe Cactus National Monument was created on April 13, 1937, by Presidential proclamation when 464 square miles of land directly south of Ajo, Ariz., were withdrawn from the public domain so that rights of mining and prospecting were thus prohibited. When, as a matter of fact, the organ pipe cactus grows on only about 15 percent, or approximately 80 square miles, of this vast tract; and

Whereas this national monument was segregated by star-chamber methods without notice and without a hearing being granted to interested parties; and

Whereas experienced, competent mining geologists have reported that the district thus withdrawn shows every evidence of having mineral values, and this conclusion is supported by the fact that one of the largest copper operations in the world, that at Ajo, Ariz., employing hundreds of men, is located immediately north of the monument: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Nogales Council of the Arizona Small Mine Operators Association register its approval of H. R. 2675, which would allow prospecting and mining on the Organ Pipe Cactus National Monument, and ask its speedy passage; and, further, that laws be enacted that will prohibit the withdrawal of any further lands from the public domain except upon notice and with public hearing and upon passage of specific laws by Congress authorizing the withdrawal.

ARIZONA COUNCIL,
HUGO W. MILLER,
Chairman.

Trade Agreements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES R. ROBERTSON

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

STATEMENT BY HON. CHARLES R. ROBERTSON, OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. ROBERTSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made before the Committee for Reciprocity Information:

The word "defense" has been made to cover a multiplicity of peculiar sins during the past few months, but I believe there have been few more fantastic ideas advanced in the name of defense than the proposal that the farmers of America should give up their home markets for the benefit of foreign producers.

American agriculture is now, and has been for many years, the scapegoat of an unfair and unwise tariff policy. Our farmers have suffered enough and are being penalized as it is, without throwing trade scales further out of balance against them, and asking them for still further concessions which would permit an increased flood of farm imports to come into this country from South America in direct competition with our agriculture.

As the representative of a great farm State, and on behalf of the people of that State, I am unalterably opposed to any further reduction in the tariff on imports of competitive farm products from Argentina, Uruguay, and other South American countries. These nations have already received tariff concessions which are working to the disadvantage and hardship of our own farmers, and any further concessions can only result in greater hardship.

Speaking with particular reference to flaxseed, North Dakota for many years has been the major producer of this crop. Any reduction on the present tariff on flaxseed from South America will have the effect of forcing our farmers to reduce their own domestic acreage. As a matter of fact, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration has taken further steps to bring about such a reduction in acreage by prohibiting the use of sweet clover as a nurse crop. Where is the consistency, therefore, in forcing our own farmers to reduce acreage, and then permit the foreign nations who inflict no such regulations upon their own farmers to increase their imports of this crop to the United States? We were told by officials of the A. A. A. this spring that our flax production in this country was reaching a point where there would soon be a danger of having a surplus. How, then, can there possibly be any justification for lowering tariffs that would increase imports of flaxseed from Argentina? Such a reduction in the tariff will not only encourage Argentina to dump a still larger proportion of their crop on the American market, but will also let down the bars for increased imports of Canadian flax.

Instead of reducing the tariff on flaxseed and thus further threatening our own domestic producers, it seems to me we should be giving our own farmers greater encouragement to increase production and meet the needs of an expanding market resulting from our defense program. We all know what happened in the last World War when an acute shortage of flaxseed and linseed oil drove prices to unprecedented high levels. We are assured by the A. A. A. that there is little danger of this happening again, but at the same time it seems rather foolhardy to set out on a deliberate program of handing over American markets to foreign producers and forcing our own farmers to cut down their acreage. This is especially true at the present time, with existing uncertainties in the ocean freight situation brought on by the war.

Certainly there is no one, not even the most ardent of those who advocate the so-called good-neighbor policy, who would deny the fact that American farmers should have first claim on the American market. This applies not only to flaxseed but to meat products, wool, hides, and other farm products which compete directly with similar products grown in the United States, and which not only force our own farmers to reduce production, but also tend to decrease the price which they receive for their own crops. The goal of all the farm programs we have had in the past 25 years has been to achieve parity prices for agriculture. During all those years the farmers have been at a disparity with industry and labor. Now, when the prospects for receiving parity are the best in years, it is a violation of every pledge made to our agricultural industry to permit an increased flood of foreign farm imports, which would threaten that prospect of finally attaining parity prices. It is my hope that this committee will not be an instrument to further disadvantage the farmer by permitting foreign nations to dump their surplus on the American market.

Statistics show that the imports of agricultural products for 1940 represented a total paid value of nearly $2,500,000,000; that these imported products displaced those that could have been grown on 118,510,007 acres. In other words, we turn over to the foreign farmers American markets equivalent to what could have been produced on 581,000 American farms of 174 acres each.

All these years we have had a tariff policy under which the farmers of America have been asked to "take the rap" in order that American manufactured articles could be exchanged for these foreign farm imports. I realize the importance of promoting increased trade among the Americans, but at the same time, I see no justification why the farmers of this country should be asked to make all the sacrifices and all the concessions on the specious plea that such farm imports lower the cost of living for the American worker.

Labor and industry for years have been able to erect tariff barriers which largely keep out the manufactured products of foreign nations which are in competition with American industry. This has been done, and I think rightfully done, on the ground that American industry and American workers should not be forced to compete with the low-wage labor and industry of foreign countries. I think it is high time the same principle is recognized in behalf of the American farmers. Why should he be asked to compete with the low-wage agriculture of other countries? The farmers are entitled to the same protection which has been granted labor and industry since the beginning of our protective-tariff program.

On behalf of the men and women out on our farms—the men and women who are fully capable of producing all the grain, meat, and fiber that will make this Nation strong and self-sufficient—I respectfully urge this committee to oppose the granting of any further concessions discriminatory to American agriculture and to oppose any reduction in the tariff rates and import levies now existing against such imports of foreign farm products.

America's Danger Is America's Opportunity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 30 (legislative day of Thursday, June 26), 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. CLAUDE PEPPER, OF FLORIDA

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered by me on June 28, 1941, under the auspices of the Committee to Defend America, on the subject America's Danger Is America's Opportunity.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hitler's mechanized divisions are now pouring into and over the last country with which he had a negotiated peace. Another people with whom Hitler had a nonaggression pact are now also the victims of Hitler aggression. In fact Hitler has not invaded a single country to which he had not given, expressly or impliedly, solemn assurances of security and nonaggression.

But this last assault of the Nazis came as no surprise to the world. That strategy of lies, the national policy which makes solemn covenants of nations mere scraps of paper (or rather an opiate to lull the unsuspecting into false security), the national policy which ignores every human right, which crushes every fragile sentiment, which scorns every restraint which decency, morality, or law imposes, the whole world knows now as Hitlerism.

One who looks back over the course of eight and a third years wonders if it is a hideous nightmare he sees. Can it be possible that the world we knew eight and a third years ago, even five years ago, is no more? In this twentieth century are there real concentration camps in which men, wrung from their families and homes, are tortured into the grave, or a living hell? Is it true that preachers are driven out of their pulpits and a political leader commands that he be worshiped like God? Is Jesus Christ actually denounced by the heads of a great modern nation as a contemptible, hated, despised being? Does any race really claim that it has the quality of divinity?

Does a whole people actually claim that there is no right but might? Does a world power actually scoff at the dignity of man? Could it be that whole races are being destroyed by the separation of men and women? By persecution? By transplanting? By starvation and murder?

Is it true that nations and people which offend no one, which seek naught except the right to be free, to be a part of the world, to worship their own God, in their own way, to live with the race of men, suddenly find themselves invaded, their homes bombed, their fields destroyed, their children killed, their land taken over by a cruel conqueror and a hated secret police hunting them down like wild animals, slaughtering and imprisoning them like trapped beasts?

Can it be that one man now has his heel upon the whole of Europe? That another foot is raised to crush Asia while he flourishes his sword above Africa? That his bloodcry echoes across the oceans to chill the heart of every land and every people? Can one believe that the world is an armed camp? That the energies of all mankind are being poured into the maelstrom of war, or preparation for war? That every economy, every factory, every man's labor is being geared to make the tools of war?

We sadly lift our eyes to the horizon. We see men die. We see streams of human blood. We hear the crash of bombs. We hear the blood-curdling sirens of the dive bombers, the roar of cruel guns. We see millions of men on their mission of death, riding grim monsters of steel crushing everything before them. We hear the plaintive cry of the orphan, the wail of the widow, the mutterings of the crazed, and the dull sobs of the crushed. It is not a nightmare. It is a horrible truth. It is our world which has come to this.

Above and behind it all is the arch fiend, Adolf Hitler. No savage ever persecuted as he has. No mad monster of history was ever more cruel. No tyrant more unfeeling. In no breast ever beat stronger the pulse of harsh ambition. No genius ever passed his evil greatness.

Hitler marches on. One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven, twelve, thirteen, fourteen, fifteen nations now are his. Russia, to whom he pledged his troth, is but the victim of the moment, the one upon whom his capricious sword has fallen this particular time.

Long ago most men, most women, saw Hitler in all his hideous raiment. They saw what he was; what he had done; what he was doing. They knew at what he aimed. The world, therefore, has fallen largely into two parts—those who are for Hitler, and those who are against Hitler; for Hitler is the evil which every man and woman must today embrace or renounce. There is no halfway. Hitler recognizes no divided loyalty. He scorns a divided foe.

And for those who aline themselves with Hitler there is no partnership. There is but obeisance. For in the lexicon of Hitlerism there is no equality. The Nazi principle that the German is the superior race and there must be a superior class leaves no place but the slaves' dungeon to be occupied by those who grasp Hitler's hand.

I say that all men must answer "Yes" or "No" to Hitler's call. There have been some, there are some in every country, who speak the language of patriots but serve Hitler's cause. The fact that they do it unwittingly changes not the nature or the truth of their aid. That they are misguided, the blind crying out to lead the blind, diminishes not their danger. Even the child which plays with dynamite is a menace to the safety of all roundabout. There are times when the man who is reckless with his words is no less inimical to the public welfare than one reckless with a loaded gun.

What responsibility, what fearful responsibility, lies upon the shoulders, upon the consciences of those men in public life in every nation which saw Hitler grow more and more menacing and counseled their people not against him. How responsible, I say, they are for the devastation which lies across their prostrate lands, the heavy yoke which now galls their people's necks. What shall men say of them? What shall their people say of such false watchmen? Of such blind leaders? Of such cowardly defenders?

America has not been free of those influences which have divided, and in so many sad instances, destroyed brave people, mighty nations in other lands. There have been some, taking advantage of our hospitality, who have turned their weapons upon us from within. They have gained our confidence only to betray it, and made our democracy but a stepping stone by which to destroy our freedom. Yet others under the guise of free speech, protected by democratic institutions and sentiments, have whispered and cooed poisoned words of propaganda. Others yet, while claiming the rights of freemen, have sabotaged our machines, dammed up the streams of our production, curtailed our efforts to create the tools of defense, and thereby served tyranny. Still others, mouthing democracy, really cherish in their hearts the sentiments of dictatorship, because they have the vanity to think that in such an order they would be the privileged few, immune from all the vexations and harassments of the democratic way of life.

Poor misguided ones. You business giants of America who harbor such delusions, go look at Thyssen and Stinnes, who poured their money into Hitler's treasury to make him what he is, and are now hunted like wild beasts across the face of the earth by Hitler's relentless hand.

Yet another group, some of whom are in the Senate of the United States, spend their time denouncing dictatorship, warning the people against danger, crying out against a menace, but the dictator whom they attack is not Hitler but Roosevelt; and the danger against which they hurl their shafts is not that of Hitler but Roosevelt; and the menace against which they warn the people is not Hitler but Roosevelt. I fear there are still some in America who would rather lose their country than help Roosevelt save it.

They are those who said there would be no war in Europe, if Roosevelt did not cause it. They are those who denounced Roosevelt when he said at Chicago that the aggressors must be quarantined. They are those who refused to repeal the Arms Embargo and incited Hitler to unloose the dragons of war. They are those who opposed the Selective Service Act; those who fought against the lend-lease bill; who have thrown every possible obstacle in the path of the President, the Congress, and the people who have thus far, thank God, made some contribution to the cause of stopping Hitler.

Now, this group has given their song another name, but it is the same old song. They now cry out against Russia, against communism, against irreligion, against Stalin. They wrap their pretentiously holy robes about them and scorn this Churchill and this Roosevelt who would keep such bad company.

But one never hears them utter more than mild rebuke to nazi-ism. They never raise their mighty voices to denounce the paganism and the persecutions of the Nazis. Their wrath never rises against Hitler.

A little bit ago it was the same, but the name they then used was British imperialism, undemocratic England, the roaring British lion.

The record shows, therefore, that they did not want to help Britain to stop Hitler any more than they now want to help Russia stop Hitler. Neither do they want to help China, or Greece, or Yugoslavia to stop Hitler.

In fact, if their record alone is to be made the test, if their utterances are the criterion, some of them have not made any great effort to stop Hitler anywhere and with anybody.

Maybe we have been at fault in our terminology. Too often I think we have used or let our friends use the phrase "Aid to Britain," or "Aid to China," or "Aid to Greece," or "Aid to Yugoslavia," as an expression of our policy. What we should have said was, we swear to stop Hitler from conquering the earth. We shall now throw every obstacle in his path, materials, money, our moral forces, our diplomatic power, all we possess but our men. We pray these mighty forces will hold him back. But if he shall break over every barrier, if he shall trample down every obstacle, everyone who stands in his path, and all that we have built against him, and leap at our land, then our men shall meet him in midair.

We are not thinking, therefore, about helping anybody. We are Americans thinking about defending America. We see this deadly menace creeping, crouching, step by step toward us. We hand weapons to those who stand in the front lines and shield us. We put in their hands the tools with which to build the barriers of defense. Food, clothes, medicines, our prayers, too, we give, for they are our heroic defenders.

Those men who fall in front there, fall where Americans might be falling. The least we can do is to help them and to honor them. If those bombs are not stopped there, they might fall here sometime. Were those millions of Hitler men, those tanks, those planes, those guns of Hitler not turned against the steady defenders of other lands, their mighty strength could be devastating South America, Central America, or maybe Mexico, or Canada, or us.

We are often unconsciously deceived about geography because we usually see the world upon a flat map rather than as a globe. If we see it as a flat map, Russia seems far across the Atlantic, beyond the borders of Europe, far in the fastnesses beyond the Urals; but if we see it as a globe, if we look not to the east across the Atlantic but to the west, not across the wide Pacific but just across the few miles of the Bering Straits, there is Russia. You can see it from Alaska, and Alaska is America and American.

It is in our hemisphere. It is just off here to the northwest in our own continent. It lies against Canada, and Canada lies against us. Looking this way, as you lift your eyes across the globe, there is Hitler just on the other side of Russia, and coming this way as fast as his steel horses will bring him. His millions of men are pouring over the borders hundreds of miles inland this way. Between Hitler and his heretofore invincible army and us stands Russia, 160,000,000 people, with great resources, rich in everything a greedy conqueror would want. With those resources all the ships in the world cannot starve out Hitler, cannot cut him off from the materials with which to wage his expanding conquest, cannot squeeze him to collapse. With those 160,000,000 added to the 200,000,000 of Europeans he now dominates, over a third of a billion of human beings will wear his yoke.

A great railroad runs across Russia. It runs this way. It could bring Hitler's men, Hitler's tanks, Hitler's guns, Hitler's flame throwers, Hitler's Gestapos. Those are Russia's fortifications just off the coast of Alaska, within sight of Alaska. If Hitler crushes Russia, German Nazis will be in those fortifications. They will not have to cross the Pacific. They are already within sight and America's rising sun will every day lift America's glory and wealth before their greedy eyes.

If Russia falls, if the Nazis march across this ancient land, they will have thwarted British ships, British planes, British sentinels; they will have broken out of Europe; they will have reached us in spite of all the heroic Poles, British, and French, and Greeks, and Yugoslavs have done to hold them back.

Then who will be between Hitler and us? Then whom will we have a chance to help? What other mighty nation will rise up to hold Hitler off for us? What other heroic people will rise to spill their blood for America's defense, as well as their own?

You and I know there would not be anybody else between Hitler and Alaska, and with Alaska taken, only Canada, a nation the size that Belgium was, will stand between Hitler and us here in continental United States. I often wonder if some of our Senators, or Colonel Lindbergh, would then say it was too late, that we should try to get on with Hitler, that we should offer the hand of appeasement. I wonder if some of our statesmen would still spend most of their time and strength warning the people against Roosevelt, against the danger of dictatorship in the United States, against the tyranny of democracy? I wonder if even then ambitious men would throw off the cloak of ambition and join their chosen leader to defend America in unity and cooperation? I wonder if even then men would forget petty jealousies, selfishness, profits, small gains, and make a solid front against so great and so near a danger?

They did not in the Scandinavian countries; they did not in Belgium; they did not in France. Would they do it here?

But if Hitler conquered Russia, his bloody hand would hang over China. It would clasp the dripping yellow hand of Japan across China and India. Then more than half, much more than half, of all the race of men would be within the grasp of these clutching hands. All the rim of the western Pacific would lave the lands of Hitler and Hirohito and the gigantic shadow of Adolf Hitler would tower over every human head.

Does it take much stretch of fancy to see these things come true when our burning memory tells us that so much more has come hideously true in the last 2 years? Is it impossible for a Hitler who has crushed all Europe to crush Russia, and with Japan, to crush China and India relatively weaponless as they are by Hitler's standards?

Can any honest patriot, therefore, say that those of us—Churchill, Roosevelt, you, or I—who want to keep Hitler behind the Urals, beyond the steppes of Russia, really are thinking only about helping Stalin or communism, or somebody else, or something else?

They do not believe that. They did not really believe that we were just trying to help the British Empire when we resolved to give all aid to the British and their allies who were holding back the flood of Hitlerism in Europe and on the Atlantic.

Some of these critics who seem so horrified about our wanting to stop Hitler beyond Russia are lawyers. I wonder if they have ever seen the state allowing a criminal to turn state's evidence in order to help convict another criminal without any thought of embracing the criminality of the criminal turncoat.

Some of these critics must have seen forest fires. In the absence of modern and adequate fire-fighting equipment, I wonder if they have ever seen a fire built to stop a fire?

Some of these critics must be great admirers of Andrew Jackson. I wonder if they remember that old Andrew Jackson at New Orleans, more than a century ago, gladly welcomed the pirate Lafitte, upon whose head hung a price, and Lafitte men and guns to hold back the invading Pakenham with his redcoats.

We no more have to embrace those who help us than they have to embrace us. This is not the first time that men of many faiths, or many races, of many origins, of many lands have fought a common danger which menaced them all.

To those who have open minds (and that is the vast majority of the people of America), it has been apparent that if Hitler wins this war he must crush Britain this year. He must crush every foe in reach of his marching men before he is drowned in the flood of American materials. Yet he dares not make his final assault upon Britain—upon the powers of the west—without first striking down mighty Russia, which lies on his flank to the east. Hitler is therefore, fighting the battle of Tannenberg all over again, trying to knock out Russia before he hurls his last devasting attack upon the west.

This very necessity, however, has forced him to do what he had so assiduously tried to avoid—fight a war on two fronts. We know not what may be Russia's strength. There are many of us who estimate more highly than others her power, the courage of her soldiers, her preparation, the determination of her men who defend their homes and ancient lands. We do know that Hitler now struggles with them, with almost his full strength—that he is now clutching with them in a death grapple. Does not therefore common sense dictate that we hurl every help we can, save our men, against Hitler? Should we not, then, search our factories, our own storehouses—yes; even what our own forces possess—for every plane, every tank, every gun which might be thrown across Hitler's path to impede his progress? Should we not take advantage of this moment when Hitler is mightily engaged to say to General Weygand, "We will give you the weapons needed if you will swear that Hitler shall not have the West Coast of Africa and Dakar. Moreover, we pledge our faith that Britain will not, when this hideous struggle shall have ended at last, retain one meter of the empire of France."

If we could give these assurances to General Weygand, might it not raise in him new hope and new resolve to set his face against this cruel Hitler who destroyed his fair French Army and put his ruthless heel upon the breast of prostrate France but to serve his lust for power?

And meanwhile might we not address ourselves to Japan and hold up to this doubting member of the Axis the betrayal of those who have pinned their faith to Hitler's sword; point out to Matsuoka and the war lords of Japan what at least has happened to all those who have for a time been Hitler's partners in crime?

While Hitler wrestles with Russia, would it not be well with the British and all others who would help, or acquiesce, to occupy those islands which lie across the exits of the areas Hitler holds and are the stepping stones for assault upon our continent and country, occupy them upon sacred assurances that they were held only against Hitler, held until that happy hour when every voice on earth and in the heavens above cry out with joy that Hitler should, like Lucifer, have been hurled to his destruction?

And would it not be timely now for America to see to it in whatever way our experts advise that every instrument which will stop Hitler shall find an open road across the seas from its origin anywhere to the hand of him who will use it against Hitler?

People of America, we have done much in the last year. Even against determined and relentless opposition we have done much; but the danger grows greater instead of less; Hitler's power more and more ominous. Day by day and step by step it draws nearer and nearer to us.

Our people still are not aroused to the danger. Our Congress is still not aroused to the danger. We are still divided in counsel, split in spirit, pulling against one another, throttling the hands of our President and leader; blind to this hideous thing which is already peering with its green eyes above the horizon at us.

America's strength is not great unless it is a united strength. Our power is not determining unless it is mobilized. America's will is not decisive unless it is one irresistible will against which nothing can stand. We cannot be united unless we all look at a single object, scorning any petty distractions, and concentrate upon it with all the vigor of our being.

Who, therefore, would destroy us with detractions, would raise up petty jealousies to divide us, would throw screens of prejudice and hate across our visions to blind us to what strikes at us from beyond?

A great opportunity still dangles before us to save America's blood, even uncounted billions of America's treasure; and, above all, the cause of honor and godliness for which America has ever stood, if we but like Americans now embrace it.

A New Caesar and a New Worry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

LETTER FROM THE BOSTON HERALD

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from the Boston Herald of June 20, 1941:

[From the Boston Herald of June 20, 1941]

THE MAIL BAG

A NEW CAESAR AND A NEW WORRY

To the Editor of the Herald:

There is no question where the great majority of Americans stand in this war. They stand squarely with Britain against Hitler and all that his name, cruelty, and power imply.

Who put the heel of oppression on the peoples of Belgium, Poland, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Austria, and Czechoslovakia? We know now from authentic accounts, and not propaganda, that men, women, and children were bombed and machine gunned on the roads of France. What happened in Rotterdam and Warsaw is well known and needs no elaboration.

In this war against the dictators a victorious England, aided by America, means life and independence to many peoples, as well as to the English people themselves. A victorious England will remove the heels of the oppressor from the throats of the peoples of all countries now enslaved by Hitler. Time marches on and Hitler has marched on. Any American who ponders over the statements made by other German leaders and who is not concerned with the result of this war has his head in the ground like the ostrich.

Let us remember that the people who have been taking a terrific scourging in Britain with their chins up and with fortitude and courage are English, Scotch, Welsh, Irish, and their Canadian, Australian, and American blood brothers who have gone over to help them. Also fighting the battle of freedom with them are Poles, Hollanders, Norwegians, French, Czechs, and others—brave men who prefer the risk of death or death itself to life in a slave world.

Do we wish to see these people, now fighting for life and liberty, notwithstanding the mistakes made in the past by some of their Tory leaders, devoured by Hitler and his associated group of sadists seeking world domination—the kind of domination desired by Goebbels, one of Hitler's lieutenants, who declared a few years ago: "The Government is resolved to institute German order throughout the world; the world will have to reckon with German business, with German soldiers and cannons."

These German leaders have convicted themselves through their own actions, their own words, and their own writings. They have convicted themselves of their intentions by direct evidence and not by circumstantial evidence.

A victorious England means a great deal to the people of these United States; to the people of Canada, and to the people of South America. An eminent son of Boston, the Reverend Edmund A. Walsh, of Georgetown University, and an acknowledged authority on international affairs, summarized the situation not so long ago when he said: "If Great Britain falls, we shall be faced with a new worry and a new Caesar."

This new Caesar and his gang have cunningly prepared, through the rule of the gun, to destroy freedom throughout the world, and the world includes the United States. The Nazis, the Fascists, and the Communists in this country are unworried about this situation. You will find these people attending meetings throughout the country, mixing with Americans having honest differences of opinion, making noisy demonstrations, but their minds and their hearts are not with the United States of America.

Actually, they are the enemies within our ranks who need constant watching. They are part and parcel of the new worry and the new Caesar, referred to by Father Walsh as confronting the United States. There are Americans who have dislike for England for various reasons, but these people are overlooking the fact that Hitler and all that he stands for are an existing world-wide menace.

The President of the United States has warned the people in unmistakable language not to be deluded and to beware of the foulness and craftiness of the German propaganda machine. If Britain loses this war, and the writer believes that she will not, America must become an armed camp for a period of years, the length of which no individual can predict or visualize. The President and the Congress must decide the course for America to pursue at a time when a brute force has been held back only by the bravery and enduring spirit of the people of Britain.

ALEXANDER M. SULLIVAN.

BOSTON, MASS.

Unfortunate Delay in Action on 28-Year Amendment to Selective Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, during the colloquy with the majority leader this evening, I expressed regret that those in charge of the legislative program had deferred until July 8 consideration of the 28-year amendment to the Selective Service Act, leaving in a state of uncertainty, the legal status of registrants between 28 and 35 and the probable rate of call for those below 28. Tomorrow, July 1, is the date for new registration. I referred to an editorial in the Mitchell (S. Dak.) Gazette, on the subject, written by L. W. Robinson, a local board chairman, which I now offer for the RECORD under permission previously granted by the House.

It should be understood, of course, that the reason for the delay in action on the bill is the fact that some Members are opposed to any consideration of the questions involved in the stoppage of work in defense plants and that proposition has been made a part of the May bill which deals with the deferment of service for men past 28.

Personally I think both questions should be settled as quickly as possible, and I regret this delay. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN] and myself spent a great deal of time today trying to secure an agreement to have the 28-year section worked into the deficiency appropriation bill, but that required unanimous consent in another body which we were unable to arrange. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], ranking House Members of the deficiency conferees, and several leaders in the other body, including the junior Senator from my own State, expressed themselves as personally favorable to the proposition, but it was impossible to secure the unanimous consent necessary.

Consequently the matter is going over. I submit herewith the editorial to which I have referred:

[From the Mitchell (S. Dak.) Gazette]

CONGRESS SHOULD SPEED UP ACTION ON SELECTIVE SERVICE

On several occasions the Gazette has commented on the loyal and patriotic spirit exhibited in the first selective service registration, in the quick return of questionnaires, and the ready response to service on the part of the men placed in Class 1A.

It is a loyalty and a response which deserves more consideration from Congress than is being given registrants, and thousands of selective-service board members, lawyers, physicians, and others who are giving of their services without remuneration. We are thinking of the delays, in Congress, on the enactment of legislation governing the application of the selective service law. These delays add materially to the work of the volunteer boards, and create a prolonged and unnecessary uneasiness on the part of men subject to the selective service law.

Two cases in point will illustrate: Nearly 3 weeks ago the Senate passed a measure giving the President authority to defer all men listed in the first registration who have attained their twenty-eighth birthday. Immediately selective service boards in every county in the Union were besieged with questions as to how and when the new plan would be put into operation. Many jumped to the erroneous conclusion that with passage of the measure in the Senate it became immediately operative. As stated above, that was nearly 3 weeks ago, but because the House of Representatives has failed to act on this measure it has not become a law. Even if the House had passed it, it is indecisive in that it does not definitely settle the question of deferment of men in the older-age groups, but leaves that decision to the President.

If the House had immediately followed the Senate in taking action on this measure, and the President had given his endorsement, thousands of selective service boards throughout the Union would have been saved the unnecessary burden of detailed examination of the questionnaires returned by men in the older-age group, and hundreds of thousands of the men in that group would have been removed from the ranks of those citizens who will never feel well settled again until they are classified into some selective service rank.

On the other hand, if the House does disapprove the Senate bill, it should have expressed that disapproval immediately, and then cooperated with the upper Chamber in formulating a measure on which there could be agreement.

Another case in point is that concerning the position of young men come of age since last October 16, who are to register on July 1, as related to those included in the first registration. Are they to be placed on the end of the old list, as far as order or call numbers are concerned, or are they to be integrated with those already classified?

To individuals not acquainted with the operation of the law, this may not appear to be a vital point; but to those who have the task of putting the law into operation, and to the young men who will register next Tuesday, it is an exceedingly important one.

Selective Service boards have already classified from hundreds to thousands in the first registration list, the number depending on quota demands. But whether hundreds or thousands, each of these men has not only an order number, but in case of class I-A men—those selected for service—they have been numerically realined as to the order in which they will be selected from their own top-ranking group. If, after fussing around another month or two, Congress finally decides that the new registrants must be mixed in with the old, it is easy to see that it will add a very considerable extra burden on the volunteer boards who are administering the Selective Service Act.

And the young men who are going to respond so loyally to the registration next Tuesday have a right (this being a democracy of which they are a vital part) to know something about their probable placing. Many thousands of them hope to go back to school, or to seek new jobs. If Congress decides that the new registrants will be added to the end of the old one, they will have some degree of assurance that they will have from 6 to 9 months' leeway, while the list of first registrants is being exhausted. If they are to be mixed in with the first list, and therefore likely to more immediate call, they are entitled to know it.

This is all written with the highest regard for the selective service law. But we also have the highest regard for the lives and work of the young men who are so vitally affected by it. In the text of this law selective service boards are urged to avoid as far as possible a disruption of the normal flow of life and business; and yet Congress drags along with indecision on vital points in such manner as to upset what local boards may do to sustain that normality, and at the same time to materially increase the burden which thousands of volunteer members of these boards in all parts of the land have so willingly assumed.

Congress should act promptly and definitely on every question involved in the selective service, and not leave millions of citizens guessing as to their status. If Congress cannot take prompt action on this question, it should leave decisions to the national selective service headquarters, which is constantly on the job and always in touch with State and local boards.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, and in connection with the thought in the closing paragraph of Mr. Robinson's editorial, I call attention to the remarks by the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts, who has urged local boards to recognize the probable passage of the 28-year amendment and delay action accordingly. I understand similar suggestion is being sent by the selective-service officials. It is regrettable that their suggestions can only be suggestions until the House takes formal action.

William Brockman Bankhead

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE J. CONNERY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of HON. WILLIAM BROCKMAN BANKHEAD, late a Representative from the State of Alabama

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, words are such clumsily poor media with which to express the emotions that engulfed me on hearing the news of the passing of a kind friend, a venerable scholar, a statesman among statesmen, a truly great leader, and one of the finest American gentlemen I have ever known, the late beloved Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Honorable WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD.

Apart from my share in the public loss to the Nation and the Nation's Legislature of its lamented leader, I feel a personal regret that, I feel, qualifies me to speak right from the heart.

The very words of the time-worn address to the Chair—"Mr. Speaker"—conjure for me each time I say them, and especially as I say them today, the spirit of the man who looked down so encouragingly as I said them here for the first time some 4 years ago; the man who had a few months before unprecedently stepped down from the chair to pay inspired and ringing tribute to my beloved brother and your late colleague, "Billy" Connery; the man who personified in my esteem the full essence of official probity, benevolence, dignity, and honor.

The more intimate relationship that followed my first contact with our late Speaker leaves me with even more affectionate memories of the charm and old-world courtliness that belied an outlook so ultra modern that it was not only abreast of the times but ahead of them, leaves me with affectionate memories of the quiet, effortless good fellowship and the proverbially fair squareness of purpose, synonymous to all who knew him, even slightly of the very name of BANKHEAD.

With us who worked with him here will live these memories, as well as the recollection of his patient forbearance as presiding officer of this body during stormy session, his sound impersonal decisions, his constant awareness, his gentle consideration, his consistently absolute impartiality.

What will never pass from these halls are his precedents, introduced, proven, and practiced by him, and now become traditional. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD has endowed the chair of the House of Representatives with some of his own justice, integrity, sincerity, and decency. Congress will never be satisfied with less. In him lived the veritas, auctoritas, and dignitas lauded by Cicero in ancient Rome and found all too seldom before, during, or since his time.

WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD has passed from us. He was truly one of those few destined to find during his short span on this poor universe of ours a wisdom that transcends it. While he lived, it crowned his every endeavor, it gathered in his fellow man. When he passed, it did not pass with him. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD'S mark is on America.

Cheese for Mr. Wickard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REID F. MURRAY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, the unwarranted request of Secretary Wickard in asking the American public to reduce its consumption of cheese—the poor man's meat—has caused a rather general resentment in Wisconsin, where one-half of the Nation's Cheddar cheese is produced.

The people of Wisconsin, as well as the Members of Congress from that State, hope that Secretary Wickard will take immediate steps to correct this uncalled for request. The normal domestic consumption of this incomparable product cannot only be still further increased but ample cheese can be provided for export. Let us ask that he make the necessary adjustments in fairness to the cheese producers of this country.

At the same time let us ask that he be cautious in regard to the domestic per capita butter consumption. Butter has not enjoyed the per capita increased consumption that has taken place in the per capita consumption of cheese and condensed milk during the past 10 years. Fair dealing to all groups within an industry and between industries should be expected from any administration.

The wisdom of disrupting the cheese industry at this time is to be questioned.

The Agriculture Department has sent out a circular to the innumerable agricultural employees scattered all over the United States to "sell" the war to the farmers of the Nation.

There was, on June 1, 1941, in storage 102,768,000 pounds of Cheddar cheese, with a 5-year previous average of only 67,000,000 pounds. There is a total of 119,628,000 pounds of Cheddar and foreign-type cheese in storage in the United States, 15,000,000 pounds Cheddar cheese in storage in Canada, 35,000,000 pounds in storage in New Zealand, and 44,000,000 pounds of foreign-type cheese in storage in Argentina. This makes an available supply of 214,000,000 pounds of cheese.

Legislation and programs should be based on common sense and common justice. This program is not based on either of these premises.

The cheese people have spent millions of dollars and years of time making this country cheese conscious. It is the "poor man's meat." This increased production can be obtained and still have American consumption maintained, or increased, if the producer is given a price incentive for so doing.

The following editorials, from three of the leading newspapers of my district, are indicative of the attitude of these fair-minded papers:

[From the News Herald of Marshfield, Wis.]

MR. WICKARD'S CRACK

Last week Secretary Wickard, of the Department of Agriculture, asked the American people to consume less cheese because, he said, he foresees a shortage due to the fact that heavy shipments are to be made to England.

This unfortunate crack from Mr. Wickard has brought down upon his head the maledictions of Wisconsin cheese producers and the press of the State. Because if there is one thing Wisconsin desires most it is the greater increased per capita consumption of cheese in these United States. Wisconsin cheese is a wholesome food of which more should be eaten by the American people.

And when Mr. Wickard, to support his plea for less consumption, declared cheese is not an essential food he damned an industry that has suffered depression since the mid-twenties, and which only now, under the stimulus of Government buying, is beginning to recover from the 15 or more years of adversity it has suffered.

One wonders at the loose talk emanating from Washington. Surely, say Wisconsin cheese producers and dealers who know the industry from the inside out, there is no danger of a cheese shortage. Our farmers have been urged to produce less for so many years they have not yet begun to unlimber their ability to produce cheese. And this without building new factories.

Like his Cabinet colleague, Secretary Ickes, who shouted of an impending oil shortage which did not exist, Mr. Wickard is talking through his hat. He may be a successful hog raiser, but he doesn't know the cheese industry. Like Mr. Ickes, Wickard ought to keep his mouth shut until he knows what he is talking about. Farming from Washington never was successful.

[From the Wausau Record-Herald, Wausau, Wis., of June 17, 1941]

WHAT! NO CHEESE AT THE WHITE HOUSE?

Claude Wickard, Secretary of Agriculture in Washington, D. C., perhaps sought publicity by declaring that because Americans do not take their cheese seriously, this dish should be reserved for the English connoisseurs.

Wisconsin's cheese industry, rising in arms over the blunt statement of the Secretary, has asked whether the Secretary has not read the papers, including the double-page advertisement in the Saturday Evening Post, extolling Wisconsin's dairy products? Why should Governor Heil have toured the country on a cheese mission only to have Washington ridicule the thought that Wisconsin's cheese industry has progressed beyond the primitive stage?

The English may boast provincially of their cheddar, saying that no cheese can compare with this English delicacy. Here in Wisconsin, cheddar cheese is just ordinary "American cheese," according to label, and Secretary Wickard's contention that "the English cannot live without their cheddar and that Americans will not miss their cheese" is at least amusing. Nothing could have awakened Wisconsin's cheese industry to a higher pitch of resentment. Some may ask whether the White House has been serving cheese during the past 6 years other than an English cheddar. Incidentally, we note there is a strange silence about reciprocity. We ponder whether the national emergency will allow us to even long for our cheese—just as we longed for our pork when Washington curtailed pork production. But we dare not think what will happen to our Wisconsin cheese production after peace returns. We may well hope that the war will last forever.

Butter production, too, is to be curtailed, we are told, by diversion of milk to condenseries, with creameries serving as receiving stations for their big brother plants. Oleomargarine is a good food, we may be told by Federal decree—as to ice cream, the popular dish may become scarce as gold. The erstwhile underestimated skim milk may also be denied to us. From where will come the vitamins that we have been told are contained only in milk. Where is preparedness in all this?

[From the Shawano (Wis.) Evening Leader of June 26, 1941]

WISCONSIN DAIRYMEN FACE A CRISIS

Secretary of Agriculture Claude W. Wickard seemingly will not back down on his proposal that the people must eat less cheese, and Wisconsin's representatives in Congress and elsewhere are standing by their guns that this principal dairy product shall not be pushed down from the high ground it has acquired with great effort and expense over a long period of years.

We assume that Secretary Wickard doesn't want to hurt the dairyman. He probably doesn't want to hurt anyone. But as we prepare for war and the many years it may last, we must become accustomed to tumults and disorders and the revolutionary processes it will work in our lives. It has always been thus and it always will be.

The Wisconsin dairyman is not the only businessman who will be confused and befuddled, seduced with bloated prices on some articles and benumbed by lost markets with others. The havoc will be general. But the example gives us a side glance at the future for all those not too short-sighted to see it.

The American people in years past have eaten much less cheese per capita than any other civilized nation. The process of creating a demand for cheese has entailed huge expenditures of money. You will remember that the campaign to educate people on the health and nutritional value of cheese was carried on last fall by the Evening Leader and the Northeastern Wisconsin Cheesemakers and Buttermakers Association. It was effective and over 2,000 pounds of cheese was sold through local retail stores during 1 week.

And now that the fruit of all this toil and expense is beginning to bud upon the tree, war makes its sinister appearance, and in crisp clipped language issues orders, counter-orders, and reverse orders. That is its nature.

The food front changes to the food administrators just as the battle front changes to the generals. As more artillery and dive bombers are ordered at one spot so more meat may be advanced or retreated at another.

The best argument for the dairyman at this time is that if cheese is treated on a par with other foodstuffs, the injury done the farmer will be much more lasting than to others, particularly if carried over a period of a year or more.

The campaign to extend the use of cheese was doing well and making splendid advances. To become firmly entrenched, such a campaign would have to be carried on for a generation. Even the recently adopted methods of putting cheese into a prominent place on the Christmas gift list has returned surprising dividends in consistency of orders.

It is for these reasons that the secretary's order is painfully unjust although that gentleman may not realize it.

For this is sure; after the war Wisconsin cheese will not be wanted in Britain. It will not sell for $1 per pound.

And worse, the most important part of the American market will have been dried up.

Mr. Speaker, one out of every 100 cows in the United States can be found in the district I have the honor to represent. Where 85 to 90 percent of the farm income is from livestock and livestock products, any legislative or economic influence on livestock or livestock products is quickly reflected on the income of the farmers of this territory.

This administration is now considering the possibilities of again lowering the tariff on cheese coming from Argentina. This is the picture at this time—lower domestic consumption—increase domestic production—lower the bars for more imports.

I asked the Secretary about these imports and if he favored them, but he declined to answer, saying this was a matter for the State Department. The American farmer sorely needs someone primarily interested in the producers of this country. Too much sympathy is being extended to the consumers of this country and foreign lands.

Dr. George Gallup Volunteers Plan for Checking Accuracy and Integrity of Polls by American Institute of Public Opinion

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, over a period of time there has been an increasing interest in the matter of public-opinion polls with some citizens and Members of Congress expressing concern about their effect upon public opinion, others lauding the polls as highly effective devices for probing and reporting public attitudes, and some proposing that Congress investigate the whole conduct of established public-opinion polls to determine for the public record what safeguards are taken to protect the public against the use of such devices as an instrument to mold public sentiment rather than to measure it. Unquestionably this analytical discussion of public-opinion polls had done much to create increased interest in the whole program of measuring public opinion, to stimulate thought about their usefulness and responsibilities as one of the devices of a free functioning republic, and to cause the operators of legitimate public-opinion polls to redouble their zeal in checking and double checking their methods so as to eliminate every possible hazard of inaccuracy or insufficiency.

Mr. Speaker, about 2 years ago I published in the RECORD an exchange of correspondence which I had with Dr. George Gallup, whose American Institute of Public Opinion is recognized as the leading institution which is continuously engaged in the measurement of public opinion. At that time I made what I hope were some constructive criticisms of some of the questions which were at times asked by the Institute of Public Opinion and stressed the importance, if these polls were to serve their maximum usefulness and their announced purpose, of exercising extreme care that the editorial text reporting the results of polls and the conclusions derived therefrom be kept in strict conformity with the nature of the question itself. I found Dr. Gallup to be very receptive to constructive suggestions and very courteous and cooperative in his determination to free his polls from all possible cause for legitimate criticism. Because of that correspondence and because of the growing public importance placed upon these polls, I have continued my survey and study of public-opinion polls ever since and have at times been in correspondence with Dr. Gallup and others in an effort to be helpful in aiding these polls to serve a legitimate and important public interest.

PROPOSED SENATE INVESTIGATION OF ALL PUBLIC-OPINION POLLS

When Senator NYE introduced Senate Resolution 111, asking for an impartial and nonprejudiced investigation of public-opinion polls, I made the statement on the floor of this House that I was sure Dr. Gallup and other operators of established fact-finding institutions would welcome an opportunity to tell Congress with complete candor the methods by which they analyzed and reported public opinion. Dr. Gallup has since vindicated my predictions in that regard by asserting his willingness to appear before any congressional committee to answer any and all questions regarding the scope and significance of his findings of public opinion and the purpose and philosophy underlying his procedures. It is quite possible that a little later in the present session of Congress the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee will give Dr. Gallup and other operators of fact-finding polls an opportunity to demonstrate the integrity of their methods in public and official testimony.

DR. GALLUP SUGGESTS A CHECK ON HIS OWN POLLS

Mr. Speaker, about a month after I last addressed the House on this subject I received a letter from Dr. Gallup expressing his eagerness to cooperate in every way to inform the Congress about his methods and to work with any impartial group to devise questions which would be free from charges of ambiguity and devoid of any possibility of being construed as "leading" or "loaded." I replied that I appreciated the continuation of his cooperative spirit and hoped that a method might be developed for providing Congress with complete and unchallengeable information on the most important questions dealing with the public attitude toward the vitally significant aspects of America's attitude toward the international situation.

I shall now include with these remarks a recent letter received from Dr. Gallup indicating progress in the direction of safeguarding both the public and the polls in the universal desire to provide as accurate information as possible on the most vital questions of our times:

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC OPINION,
New York, N. Y., June 19, 1941.

Congressman KARL MUNDT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MUNDT: I am enclosing a copy of our release for Friday, June 20, which contains a statement as to how a bipartisan committee of Congress might go about testing public sentiment on war, convoys, aid to Britain, and other matters.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE GALLUP.

[Enclosure.]

With Dr. Gallup's letter of June 19 was enclosed a reprint from his release for June 20, which is self-explanatory and which I now reproduce as a part of this record:

GALLUP POLL PROPOSES METHOD BY WHICH CONGRESS CAN CHECK WAR ATTITUDES

On highly controversial issues, the methods and findings of the American Institute of Public Opinion are attacked by both sides, and particularly by the side which is reported at the time to be in the minority. This, of course, is natural and, in a democracy, even desirable. Criticism is needed as much in the field of public-opinion measurement as it is in any other field.

If there is any desire on the part of congressional leaders or others in the country to test Institute findings on the attitude of the people toward war issues, it is possible to do so in a very quick and inexpensive way.

Let a bipartisan committee of Congressmen, or a committee of political scientists, select at random (or by lot) one or more communities of proper size from each area of the country.

Let all the eligible voters of these communities vote in what might be described as an advisory referendum. The bipartisan committee can word the questions in any way which it thinks will most accurately reflect the true attitudes of the people toward the various issues concerning defense and foreign policy being debated today—issues such as whether the United States should enter the war, whether it should convoy, and whether it should give aid to England, and how much. Local election boards in these communities can count the ballots and make known the results.

Although the Institute does not believe, from a scientific point of view, that this is the most reliable way to measure Nation-wide sentiment on any given issue, it stands ready to have any or all of its findings put to the above test, provided that an impartial committee has charge.

Dr. GEORGE GALLUP,
Director,
American Institute of Public Opinion.

On June 25, I replied to Dr. Gallup's letter, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 25, 1941.

Dr. GEORGE GALLUP,
New York City.

MY DEAR DR. GALLUP: I thank you for your letter of June 19 calling my attention to your proposal indicating how a bipartisan committee of Congress might go about testing public sentiment on national and international issues while at the same time providing an opportunity for the American Institute of Public Opinion to vindicate the accuracy of its findings. For one Member of Congress, I want to say that I think that your proposal is definitely fair and I hope that you will follow through by inviting such a committee to join you in selecting a topic and an area in which to make such a test.

For myself, I have never doubted the reliability of those who take your polls, nor have I doubted the accuracy and honesty with which the count is faithfully reported. My own source of concern has been with (1) the manner in which your questions are sometimes phrased, especially on international issues, and (2) the editorial conclusions which you sometimes provide or promote in the explanatory matter which you print as the findings of these polls are released.

For example, in a recent poll you sought to analyze public sentiment on the subject of convoys by a question which contained the word "convoys" in parentheses, only, whereas you used a rather involved and wordy sentence as your question which sought to describe the process of convoying without naming it as such. In reporting the findings of that poll, however, you again spoke specifically about convoys. It would seem much more matter of fact and confidence inspiring were the subject matter of your question and your editorializing kept in closer harmony.

Perhaps if you were to conduct a poll on the simple question, Do you favor the United States entering the war now? or on the question, Should the United States declare war on the Axis Powers now? it would eliminate all criticisms since your question would then be to the point, timely, and perfectly clear cut. I am sure that Congress and all the country would be interested in the findings of such a poll, and I feel that you would be rendering a true public service in collecting this information for us all. It would also be interesting to note possible changes in public sentiment from week to week or month to month as the American public registered its attitude on this all-important question at the specific time described by the word "now" as the periodical polls are taken.

Assuring you of my continued desire to protect the integrity of the legitimate polls of public opinion in America and likewise to protect the public against any illegitimate useage of the public opinion probing devices, I am, with all good wishes,

Cordially yours,

KARL MUNDT,
Member of Congress.

DR. GALLUP AGREES TO ASK DIRECT QUESTION ON "WAR OR PEACE NOW"

Mr. Speaker, indicative once more of Dr. Gallup's cooperative spirit and his desire to help both Congress and the country make an accurate analysis of public sentiment on the question of whether America should remain at peace or project itself into a shooting war, I received the following letter from Dr. Gallup under date of June 27 in which he agrees to ask my proposed question of, "Do you favor the United States entering the war now?" in the ballots which are presently being circulated by the individuals comprising the fact-finding agents of the American Institute of Public Opinion.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC OPINION,
Princeton, N. J., June 27, 1941.

Hon. KARL MUNDT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN MUNDT: I am glad that you like the suggestion which I proposed for testing public sentiment on national and international issues. I have today suggested to Prof. Harwood Childs, editor of the Public Opinion Quarterly, that he name a committee composed of the outstanding professors in the field of public opinion to carry out tests of sentiment in selected areas of the country. The committee would select these communities and would word the various questions as they see fit.

Incidentally, I think your question, "Do you favor the United States entering the war now?" is a very good one, and we shall add it to the ballot this coming week.

In our interpretation of the results on the question dealing with convoys we felt free to use the word "convoy," because we found in running this question on one form of our ballot and the word "guard" on the B form of the ballot that there was no important difference. In short, in the case of one cross-section we used the word "convoy" with "guard" as an explanatory word, and in the other cross-section we used the word "guard" with convoy as the explanatory word.

I shall keep you informed on the progress of the experimental work to be conducted by the Public Opinion Quarterly.

With kind regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE GALLUP.

THE ROAD TO NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Speaker, there is much talk of unity in this country and every right-thinking American is desirous of expediting unified action on the part of the full force of this country in carrying out domestic and international policies in conformity with the real will of the people of America. Both the proponents of war and the proponents of peace are now claiming that those who disagree with them are "the disrupters of unity and the fomenters of disunity." The answers received to the direct question now being asked by the American Institute of Public Opinion, "Do you favor the United States entering the war now?" should provide irrefutable evidence as to which group it is in America—the war crowd or the antiwar crowd—which is in fact entitled to urge that America attain unity by following the road to war or the path toward peace. The American principle is that unity is always something to be attained by the minority viewpoint merging with the majority viewpoint; it is never a thing to be attained by an obstinate minority of willful men trying to make up in noise and influence what they lack in numbers.

We now have national unity in our program of extending all aid short of war to Britain, in making an all-out effort to build our own defenses and those of the Western Hemisphere, and in eliminating from the American scene the subversive agents of nazi-ism, fascism, and communism. Only on the question of war or peace are we disunited. And on this all-important question neither the people nor the Congress has spoken. On this question, the people or the Congress must speak before there can be any serious thought of this country's actually entering a shooting war. It means comparatively nothing that a few members of the President's Cabinet are making fire-breathing speeches urging that America enter the war now. It does not commit this country to a policy of entering the war, even when the President shouts derisive innuendoes at certain foreign powers and pledges his every effort to defeat their nefarious policies. Wars in a free republic such as this are not entered by the oratorical offering of a few individuals in high places or low; national policy, in the realm of peace or war, is not determined by the dictatorial device of a few men deciding when America shall be at peace and when America shall be at war.

Only Congress, in this free republic, can declare war. Only Congress can transfer the United States from the status of a nation at peace to that of a nation at war. As representatives of the people, the Members of Congress desire to know the people's attitude on the question of war or peace for America. Real unity will come to America when once the public attitude is fully and finally known, the Congress—and I hope the President and the Cabinet, too—reassures the people, to whom this country belongs and whose sacrifices and security is most involved in determining its international policy, that it will conform with their demands in the matter of going to war or protecting and preserving our peace.

OTHER POLLS WILL ALSO CHECK ON DR. GALLUP'S FINDINGS

Mr. Speaker, if there be some who still doubt the integrity and accuracy of Dr. Gallup's methods, additional opportunities are now available to measure American public opinion on the question of peace or war. Apparently spurred on by the growing interest in the mechanics and men who operate our established polls, a large number of special public-opinion polls are now being taken to sound out American public opinion on the international situation. The honorable HAMILTON FISH, Jr., Representative in Congress from the home district of President Roosevelt, has just announced the findings of a poll of over 100,000 voters of his district, giving the country the surprising information that in the President's home congressional district, just outside the city of New York, the people are 90.1 percent opposed to entering this war at this time. While this poll covers only one congressional district, and is not conclusive proof that the people of America, as a whole, are determined to keep out of this war, it is highly significant, since it comes from a section of the country which editorial writers and radio commentators carelessly refer to as "overwhelmingly in favor of intervention in this war."

NEW YORK AND CHICAGO PAPERS ANNOUNCE STATE-WIDE POLLS

Mr. Speaker, apparently aroused by the unexpected and over-whelming vote against war in President Roosevelt's own congressional district, the New York Daily News has just announced a State-wide poll which it is taking by direct mail to check the validity of Congressman FISH's poll and of the findings of the American Institute of Public Opinion. The results of this poll will soon be made available on the direct question of war or peace—with no trick language, no camouflaging of the issue, no sugar-coating of the problem—just the simple, blunt question now confronting America, Shall we stay out of the war or send our soldiers overseas to join in the fighting?

This week, also, the Chicago Tribune has announced it is taking a State-wide poll on a similarly direct question to explore public sentiment in Illinois on this all-important question. These results will also be available to check against other less inclusive polls than those which are mailed to every qualified voter in an area.

PRESIDENT HUTCHINS, OF UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO, DR. HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK, AND OTHERS ANNOUNCE NATION-WIDE POLL ON WAR OR PEACE

Mr. Speaker, in addition to all these other polls, and the direct question on war or peace with which Dr. Gallup is now taking a Nation-wide referendum on America's attitude to the war, a special Nation-wide poll has just been announced by a committee of leading educators and clergymen in America. I call your attention to the accompanying news article which appeared in last Sunday's issue of the Chicago Tribune:

UNITED STATES EDUCATORS AND CHURCHMEN PLAN WAR POLL

A group of prominent educators and churchmen Friday announced plans for a survey of public opinion on America's relation to the war. Dr. Robert M. Hutchins, president of the University of Chicago, spokesman for the group, said the object is "to discover answers to questions not hitherto asked or not adequately covered by other agencies."

Six questions will be prepared by the group, and the survey will be conducted by Samuel E. Gill, head of a professional public-poll organization in New York. The survey will be independent. It is financed by an unconditional grant from the America First Committee.

Members of the group besides Dr. Hutchins are the Reverend Harry Emerson Fosdick, of New York; Alan Valentine, president of the University of Rochester; Ray Lyman Wilbur, president of Stanford University; Henry Noble MacCracken, president of Vassar College; Raymond Kent, president of the University of Louisville; and the Reverend Albert W. Palmer, president of the Chicago Theological Seminary.

From all of the foregoing, Mr. Speaker, it is becoming evident that the whole country will soon know whether it is really the war crowd or the antiwar crowd which is in harmony with American public opinion, and which is therefore entitled to call upon the rest of the country to join it in a program of real national unity based on the overwhelming sentiment of the rulers of America—the people. This is as it should be in a republic where under God the people rule and where officials in both the legislative and executive departments of government are elected to facilitate rather than to frustrate the functioning of majority rule.

A Curious Aspect of the Kellogg-Briand Pact

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES L. McNARY

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN A. DANAHER, OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on last evening before the Institute of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] delivered an interesting address, entitled "A Curious Aspect of the Kellogg-Briand Pact." I feel that the subject and its treatment are such that I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in full in the RECORD for the information of the Congress and the public.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Perhaps the most startling phenomenon visible to the Congress in these times appears from the mail which reveals that thousands of our citizens feel that our status in international affairs is akin to a game which anyone can play. Perhaps I may not seem presumptuous on that account if I address myself to this subject. People who wouldn't make the slightest personal legal commitment without consulting an attorney are quite sure they are fully competent to decide our Nation's course. That they do not know either the extent or the nature of the intricacies of our diplomacy or even the objectives ultimately to be sought by our policymakers affords no deterrent. Probably that is all to the good in the last analysis, for our people at the very least thus indicate how public opinion is formed and, ephemeral though they may be, cumulatively their decisions each day constitute the chief, and practically the only check on the President in his execution of American foreign policy.

Thus, there is all the more reason for a continuously candid and frank exposition by our Chief Executive of what he really has in mind. It is my belief that far greater advantage is to be had in keeping Americans fully informed than will come from suppressing the real aims and purposes of the administration for fear of some unfortunate diplomatic impact. In the first view of it, if the President's objectives when analyzed and explained to our people find favor with them, the President will achieve that "unity" we hear so much about but which is certainly lacking, and thus he will achieve popular support without which his policy will never be appreciated and may fail. In the second case, foreign governments will act as their interests dictate anyhow, no matter what drum beating and cymbal striking we go through, and they certainly are not nearly so likely to react as we wish to our mere bombastic utterances, no matter how stentorian, as they would to direct representations to their proper authorities.

I know there is ground for sharp difference of opinion in this particular, and that more experienced and time-tested diplomats follow, the second, rather than the first course, is apparent. I venture to suggest these are new times. Weighing the comparative approaches, I feel the American people should be the first to be apprised of our intended plan and our true course, and their very unwillingness to endorse in blank a policy of whose ultimate ends they are kept in ignorance establishes the truth of this premise.

Let me illustrate, by what seem to me appropriate proofs drawn from our recent doings, just how the American people react.

From time immemorial down to the World War we had pursued rigorously in the main a policy of complete neutrality, no matter what wars engaged other countries. Our people knew that and understood fully that our productivity constantly could be devoted to the enhancement of our own lives and that we enjoyed the blessings of peace to work out our destiny while other nations wasted their substance and the lives of their youth in the destruction of war. They knew that other governments fell and that their people staggered for generations under the burden of war-incurred indebtedness. Finally, as they watched the World War for nearly 3 years, for reasons which seemed sufficient and after a welter of debate, our people supported our entrance into that war. They then heard it said that if Germany prevailed, "our turn would be next," that the Allies were "fighting our battle," that only the British Fleet stood between the Kaiser and us, that the countries to the north and south of us would be easy prey to the militarism of Prussianism, that we must fight to "make the world safe for democracy."

Bitterly disillusioned after the war, Americans firmly rejected the League of Nations. They resolved once more to adhere to our historic principle of neutrality. They saw the representatives of other nations as they argued for years in their efforts to define "aggressors" at the League sessions at Geneva. We watched the gathering storm clouds in Europe and determined to go the length of imposing by domestic legislation a series of limitations upon the activities of our own people in an effort to avoid those incidents which might lead to involvement in a "shooting war" should war eventuate. All these things were open and obvious; the people understood them. Those charged with administering a foreign policy which reflected American thought along these lines found a united people supporting them.

In short, our people were willing, without giving up our rights under international law, to refrain from asserting them. We were desirous that war, if it occurred, be limited so far as possible to the area in which it appeared, without our exhibiting partisanship for one belligerent or the other, without taking sides in our national status, no matter what we might be free to think as individuals. In this spirit the Congress overwhelmingly adopted the Neutrality Act and the President approved it.

Then the President, in September 1939, told the Congress that the people's efforts in this direction must yield to a program he outlined. He told the people's representatives that while repealing the embargo on arms and undoing what had previously been thought to be protections, American merchant vessels should be restricted from entering danger zones. He said American citizens must be prevented from traveling on belligerent vessels or in danger zones. He said that foreign buyers must take in this country transfer of title to commodities purchased by belligerents, and, moreover, we must prevent war credits to belligerents. After outlining this four-point plan, he said:

"To those who say that this program would involve a step toward war on our part I reply that it offers far greater safeguards than we now possess or have ever possessed to protect American lives and property from danger. It is a positive program for giving safety. This means less likelihood of incidents and controversies which tend to draw us into conflict as they did in the last World War. There lies the road to peace."

The American people accepted and relied upon such representations, and the Neutrality Act was amended to implement the President's position. But then the American people, with growing dubiety, watched what has since been happening. If that was the road to peace, as the President said, the people now ask, "Why aren't we following it?" The people certainly feel that if our national interests could best be served by following the President's own program as he explained it, any other steps in a different direction must inevitably lead, not along the road to peace but to war. Yet there has never been a frank, full explanation to the people of why the President abandoned his own plan, and unity of acceptance of his newer course is far from achievement.

Another phase of the evidence I offer relates directly to the outcome of the war. Our people are told that Hitlerism must be destroyed and that we will never "acquiesce in a peace dictated by aggressors and sponsored by appeasers." Passing the obvious point that there certainly must be a peace some day, where do we stand and why? If we say that we can't let Britain fall, but also say we will simply aid her short of war, what are we to do if it appears that she will fall without our active participation? Is it then to be our position that we have merely been buying time, and that we have been talking only for diplomatic effect, taking part only in a war of nerves? Or is it really the American plan that we intend to aid Britain, not short of war, but enough to guarantee victory? It should be obvious to all of us that either we intend to win this war or in the alternative we should stay out of it. We just can't compromise. Honesty with and to ourselves and before the bar of history demands that we formulate a policy, that it be fully canvassed with our people and thoroughly understood in the light of our own national interests. At the same time we should know, if we decide to enter the war, why we are doing so and what we ultimately seek to accomplish. Vague talk of destroying Hitlerism is no answer. The American people have already demonstrated by their attitude that the questions I pose are of the very essence of their doubt. I need not tell you, I'm sure, may I say collaterally, that I have felt right along that the President's seeming policy of opportunism in making the decisions of each day has been mistaken. Without explanation, without candid exposition, without a definition of objectives, without the sure guide of recognized principles of general acceptance, our course might better be described as apparently lacking policy.

I use the "apparently" advisedly, for I would now respectfully suggest to you that there is more of substance to the President's plan than is commonly believed. The rationale need not be obscure, as analysis will show, but the matter has never adequately been analyzed by the American people, there is no common understanding, much less acceptance, of the basis upon which we are proceeding, indeed there is a startling disparity of acquiescence within the administration itself if the position of Mr. Hull be considered. It is not without significance that it was not our Secretary of State who interpreted our position at the Inter-American Bar Association meeting in Habana on March 27 of this year, but the Attorney General, Hon. Robert H. Jackson, as I will later point out in detail. Why there should be reticence about responsible discussion of the subject by the President who, under our Constitution, is the executor of our foreign policy, we may know some day, but for now let us consider together some of the little mentioned factors which underlie our present attitude.

Let us turn to the so-called Lease-Lend Act, which authorizes our Nation, as an entity, to manufacture in our arsenals and to transfer any defense article, including weapons, aircraft, and warships to the government of any country whose defense the President "deems vital" to the defense of the United States. The bill was favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. There wasn't a member of that committee who failed to realize that under international law the United States had no right whatever to sell or transfer munitions of war, vessels, or money to a belligerent government. Private citizens as distinguished from the Government itself, have long been permitted under international law to do these things, the turning point being whether such acts were public or private in nature. In order to justify the course they were recommending, the committee turned to the Pact of Paris. They told the Senate, as I quote:

"The Kellogg-Briand Pact is recognized by eminent scholars of international law to give any signatory the power, where the pact's provisions are violated by another nation, to cease to abide by the neutrality laws which govern in normal times, and to supply the state attacked with financial or material assistance, including munitions of war."

Immediately we are challenged to ascertain what "eminent scholars of international law" recognized the Kellogg-Briand Pact to confer any such power, and when, and under what circumstances the decision was agreed upon. We are at once driven to the Kellogg-Briand Pact itself to ascertain what it said that such an interpretation could be read into it. We might also properly inquire what, if any, similar interpretation was placed upon the pact by any other nation signatory to it, and even what representatives of the United States, if any, there were who agreed to such a holding. That the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations was now accepting such an opinion as justification for what the committee itself recognized was ceasing "to abide by the neutrality laws which govern in normal times" becomes of gravest importance. There are two operative provisions of the Kellogg-Briand Pact which read:

"ARTICLE I

"The high contracting parties solemnly declare in the names of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies, and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations to one another.

"ARTICLE II

"The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts, of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them, shall never be sought except by pacific means."

When the Kellogg-Briand Pact was before the United States Senate in 1928 and 1929, the Senators in the debate preceding its ratification expressly denied that if a nation violates the treaty the United States would be under any obligation, express or implied, to apply coercive or punitive measures, or that our Nation might do so with impunity. Whence, then, came these interpretations upon which the Senate committee purported to rely that in this treaty we could find justification for a program to "supply the state attacked with financial or material assistance, including munitions of war"? The only reference to the subject by any of the proponents of the lease-lend bill is to be found in the arguments submitted by Senator CONNALLY, who purported to dispose of this question in a hundred words, from which I quote:

"Prior to the war now raging, a council of distinguished international lawyers met in Budapest. In considering the Kellogg-Briand Pact, that council of international lawyers found that under the specific provisions of that pact any nation could supply arms and munitions to any other nation when it was attacked by a signatory to the pact. Italy and Germany were signatories to that pact. They agreed that they would not employ war as a national policy, and when they agreed to the terms of that pact, they agreed that if they should attack any other nation in violation of the Kellogg-Briand Pact, any other nation which was a signatory to the pact might supply arms and munitions to the nation attacked or invaded. So, Mr. President, under international law—if international law still survives—we have a right to enact this particular measure without infringing upon international law."

In Budapest these lawyers met, Senator CONNALLY said. The group was unofficial; our Nation was not represented by any accredited delegates, but they were international lawyers, of that you may be sure. They had met at Oxford in 1932, and the Right Honorable Lord Blanesburgh appointed a committee on conciliation consisting of—

Prof. James L. Brierly, Chichele, professor of international law, All Souls College, Greensward, Headington Hill, Oxford.

M. A. Caloyanni, late judge, Native Court of Appeal, Egypt, 2 Rue de Lyon, Paris.

J. C. Colombos, advocate, 10 King's Bench Walk, Temple, London.

C. G. Dehn, 85 London Wall, London.

Francis Temple Grey, 2 King's Bench Walk, Temple, London.

Mr. Campbell Lee, 1 Brick Court, Middle Temple, London.

Dr. Arnold Duncan McNair, professor of international law, Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge.

G. M. Palliccia (legal adviser to the Italian Embassy, London), 1 King's Bench Walk, Temple, London.

Sir John Fischer Williams, K. C., Bowling Green House, Headington Hill, Oxford.

Wyndham A. Bewes, convener, 2 King's Bench Walk, Temple, London.

These 10 lawyers drew up the interpretations. When the Conference met at Oxford in 1932 they were reminded that Secretary of State Stimson, speaking a few days earlier, had called upon the international lawyers to examine into the subject matter and the content of the Kellogg-Briand Pact. Mr. Stimson had said:

"War between nations was renounced by the signatories of the Briand-Kellogg Treaty. This means that it has become illegal throughout practically the entire world. It is no longer to be the source and subjects of rights. It is no longer to be the principle around which the duties, the conduct, and the rights of nations revolve. It is an illegal thing. Hereafter, when two nations engage in armed conflict, either one or both of them must be wrongdoers—violators of this general treaty law. We no longer draw a circle about them and treat them with the punctiliousness of the duelist's code. Instead, we renounce them as lawbreakers. By that very act we have made obsolete many legal precedents and have given the legal profession the task of reexamining many of its codes and treaties."

These international lawyers undertook their task earnestly, we may have no doubt, for when the committee met in Budapest between the dates of September 6 and 10, 1934, Mr. Wyndham A. Bewes submitted a report containing proposed articles of interpretation of our treaty, adding to our language new matter and new thought which had been expressly rejected by the United States Senate when the pact was ratified. Mr. Bewes said, in part:

"In the event of a violation of the pact by a resort to armed force or war by one signatory state against another, any signatory state, not being a party to the original dispute, may, without thereby committing a breach of the pact or of any rule of international law, do all or any of the following things:

"(a) Assist with armed forces the state attacked;

"(b) Supply the state attacked with financial or material assistance, including munitions of war."

Notice your Senate Committee on Foreign Relations did not quote Mr. Bewes' interpretation that the United States might "assist with armed forces the state attacked," but it is an inherent part and was the first item of the interpretations upon which the Senate committee relied when it said, as I previously quoted to you, that we might "supply the state attacked with financial or material assistance, including munitions of war."

The conference at Budapest, through these international lawyers, then sought, and by their language it is now sought, to bind the United States to their sanctions and their commitments. Mr. Campbell Lee told the conference that—

"The pact is a part of the supreme law of the United States, on a par with the Constitution itself, which says, 'This Constitution and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land.'"

I ask you to recall that the United States of America had expressly rejected the League of Nations.

Mr. Llewellyn-Jones told the conference that—

"It was rather curious that 2 or 3 days before our meeting at Oxford the American Secretary of State, Mr. Stimson, had uttered what I believe was in the minds of most of us, if not of all of us, at that time, and that was this: That there could be no place for neutrality in the future history of the world. I know that the word 'neutrality' has rather been banned from the discussion today. The term 'nonbelligerency,' which perhaps is not such a provocative term as 'neutrality,' has been used. But I am not certain, in the new order of things, if the Briand-Kellogg Pact is going to mean what it meant in 1928. Is there going to be room for nonbelligerency? Are we not coming to a point when all the states of the world will have to combine to see that the state which is the aggressor is prevented from upsetting the international equilibrium? The aggressor in the world of states is the lawbreaker. He is the breaker of the laws which exist or should exist between states and, difficult as it might be, it is in the interest of the community of states to see that some system is devised whereby the aggressor or even the state which proposes, which contemplates aggression will realize that any attempt at aggression is going to meet with formidable opposition from all the other states. We have not merely to try to set up an organization through the League of Nations or otherwise which is going to take action in order to prevent war when war is contemplated by this state or by the other state. We have got to go a step further. We have got to remove the causes of war. How can we eradicate the difficulties referred to? By the putting into operation of the Briand-Kellogg Pact."

Mr. Bewes thereafter told his confreres that—

"When a nation has assumed obligations to other states, it should put the necessary internal laws in order without delay. It is a matter of public faith."

Then Mr. James A. Petrie took the floor. He said:

"I feel very strongly that all foreign engagements to which a country has pledged itself should be made part of its municipal law. Respect for the statute book is absolute in most countries, and the citizen of any country will realize what his government's international duties are much more clearly if they are embodied in the municipal law than if they are merely left as the executive concern of the minister entrusted with the conduct of foreign affairs. It is high time, in my opinion, that our association should emphasize the principle that when a state enters into obligations to another state, its municipal laws should associate themselves with and reflect its position from the point of view of international law."

After adopting the articles of interpretation, the international lawyers at Budapest passed one final resolution calling upon all states which were signatory to the Kellogg-Briand Pact to make the treaty "a reality" in accordance with their interpretations. In fact, the language of their resolutions specifically alleged as to the signatories that it was "their duty without delay to enact domestic legislation to implement their treaty obligations."

Mr. Manley O. Hudson felt that the interpretations constituted a "development of a twentieth century international law to correspond to the needs of a twentieth century international society." Said he:

"I believe the acceptance by this association of the legal consequences of the Covenant of the League of Nations, the statute of the Court, and the Briand-Kellogg Pact means throughout the world a larger, a wider recognition of the tremendous significance of those documents."

Note the interrelationship Mr. Hudson gives to the several pacts he mentioned. The climacteric remained to be stated by the Right Honorable Lord Blanesburgh, who was the presiding officer of the Conference, when he said:

"These discussions make it clear that the signatories had signed something far more binding upon them than they had perhaps suspected."

Certainly, the Members of the United States Senate ratifying the Kellogg-Briand Pact in 1929 never "suspected" the result later to be claimed from our adherence to the pact. Certainly, the people of the United States had never heard presented to them any such interpretations.

You could have read the article by Sir John Fischer Williams, one of the committee, writing in International Affairs, London, 1935, in which he said:

"It may be argued that * * * the pact has changed the law in a manner not contemplated by the signatories; and, indeed, it must be admitted that it may well be that some or most of the signatories did not realize that such a change was the necessary consequence of their action. * * * The signatories must be taken to have intended the necessary consequences of their own acts."

Again he pointed out:

"Although the President and Secretary of State might say * * * that they would carry out the view that the signatories of the Briand-Kellogg Pact were absolved from the ordinary duties of neutrality, there was no guaranty that the President would be there 2 years hence, and that this would be the view of his successors. It was essential that his statement should be endorsed in some way by the action of the Senate."

Perhaps you can see some explanation for the third term; perhaps you begin to see how the lease-lend bill reached the Senate.

The House of Lords debated the interpretations in February 1935, when Lord Howard pointed out:

"It may well be argued that these neutral rights as between cosignatories have been actually abolished by the pact itself, if we are to accept the view of such an authority as Mr. Stimson, former Secretary of State of the United States. * * * According to Mr. Stimson, therefore, and, indeed, according to many authorities, the whole conception of war and neutrality since the pact has been revolutionized, because any country using force against another for a national purpose is a violator of the pact, and therefore of the new law of nations, and so becomes an outlaw who may legally be treated as such. * * * This ends, once and for all, the principle of international law established hitherto and generally strictly followed, that neutrality implied impartiality towards both belligerents—the open door, so to speak, to both sides. Now this ruling, which has, I believe, also been agreed to by the United States, makes it clear that a state, without becoming an ally or associate in a war, may establish, in the interests of peace * * * a condition of exclusive dealing as against one of the belligerents, thus cutting at the very roots of neutrality as formerly understood."

How different was all this from our understanding when our Senate debated the ratification of the Kellogg-Briand Pact. On January 14, 1929, the Committee on Foreign Relations reported that this treaty "pledges the nations bound by the same not to resort to war in the settlement of their international controversies, save in bona fide self-defense, and never to seek settlement of such controversies except through pacific means."

Senator Borah, reporting for the committee, further set forth:

"The committee further understands that the treaty does not provide sanctions, express or implied. Should any signatory to the treaty or any nation adhering to the treaty violate the terms of the same, there is no obligation, or commitment, express or implied, upon the part of any of the other signers of the treaty to engage in punitive or coercive measures as against the nation violating the treaty. The effect of the violation of the treaty is to relieve the other signers of the treaty from any obligation under it with the nation thus violating the same.

"In other words, the treaty does not, either expressly or impliedly, contemplate the use of force or coercive measures for its enforcement as against any nation violating it. It is a voluntary pledge upon the part of each nation that it will not have recourse to war except in self-defense, and that it will not seek settlement of its international controversies except through pacific means. And if a nation sees proper to disregard the treaty and violate the same, the effect of such action is to take it from under the benefits of the treaty and to relieve the other nations from any treaty relationship with the said power.

"This treaty in no respect changes or qualifies our present position or relation to any pact or treaty existing between other nations or governments.

"This report is made solely for the purpose of putting upon record what your committee understands to be the true interpretation of the treaty, and not in any sense for the purpose or with the design of modifying or changing the treaty in any way or effectuating a reservation or reservations to the same."

Secretary of State Kellogg had testified "that I was not willing to impose any obligation on the United States. I knew that was out of the question."

Then Senator Walsh, of Montana, a great lawyer, said to Secretary Kellogg:

"Assume that Germany invades Belgium, claiming she does so in self-defense. Let us assume her claim is a perfectly just one, that she is acting in self-defense. Then, of course, the other nations that come to the aid of Belgium would be breaking, not only the Locarno Treaty but breaking this treaty. But what difference does that make to us?"

Secretary KELLOGG. "None at all."

Senator WALSH. "Supposing some other nation does break this treaty, why should we interest ourselves in it?"

Secretary KELLOGG. "There is not a bit of reason."

Senator Borah, later in argument to the Senate, said:

"If a nation violates the treaty, are we under any obligation, express or implied, to apply coercive or punitive measures? I answer, emphatically, 'No.'

"It will certainly not be contended that the language of the treaty itself makes any such provision. The language of the treaty refutes the proposition. The philosophy of the treaty is not that of preventing war, but that of organizing peace, which is a wholly different thing."

He continued:

"Not only is the language of the treaty, as I have indicated, clear and unmistakable, but at no time in this voluminous correspondence, coming up between 15 nations originally, and the correspondence laying the basis for adherence, has there been an indication or an implication that any nation conceived that there was any implied obligation upon the part of the nations to enforce the treaty or to punish an aggressor. At no time has that ever been suggested."

Senator Borah pointed out that the shrewd and discerning statesmen of 60 nations signing the pact had wholly failed in any instance even to suggest that there was an obligation implied to enforce the treaty. He told the Senate further:

"But I find nowhere in the language of the treaty or in the correspondence any reference to this matter, or any language which would indicate that it occurred to any of the governments that such implication might arise."

Nor was Senator Borah alone in his interpretation of the treaty. Senator Swanson said:

"The treaty contains no sanctions for its enforcement. No obligation, moral or legal, is assumed by the signatories to use punitive measures against any nation that may violate the treaty."

Senator McLean argued:

"I think the American people and the rest of the world clearly should understand that this treaty attempts to do nothing more than express a mutual and sincere desire for peace; that it contains no obligation to use force or refrain from the use of force; that it does not and will not entangle or disentangle anybody or anything."

Senator WAGNER, of New York, said:

"In the event of violation no machinery of enforcement is provided. No sanctions are established. A breach of the treaty does not bring upon the violating state any consequences springing from the treaty. There is no obligation whatever upon any signatory state to punish a treaty-breaking state. * * * The discussion of sanctions under the treaty reveals more clearly than anything else how debatable are even the most elementary factors in a plan for a world free from war. The treaty has been ridiculed because it provides no sanction and no machinery or method of enforcement of the promises to refrain from war. It has likewise been challenged because it is said to impose upon the United States the duty to punish, by force of arms if necessary, a treaty-breaking state. This latter criticism is absolutely without foundation. There is no language in the treaty proper upon which the most astute of lawyers could pin an affirmative obligation to do anything."

Little did Senator WAGNER know that only 5 years later an astute group of 10 lawyers appointed at Oxford would meet at Budapest to write a series of interpretations which have since been accepted as the basis for our law and our international conduct.

While I can call as witnesses many others of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations who in 1929 told Americans of the significance to be attached to the treaty, it will suffice that I present the view of Senator BARKLEY, now our distinguished and able majority leader. Senator BARKLEY said:

"Mr. President, I am unable to read into this treaty, or into any of the correspondence preliminary to it, or into any possible interpretation of the treaty, any obligation on the part of the United States or any other nation that is signatory to this treaty to interfere in the internal affairs of any other nation in the world. If all the colonies of Great Britain should on the day following the universal ratification of this treaty rise in revolt and seek to establish their own independence as independent nations of the world, there is not only nothing in this treaty which obligates the United States to interfere with those colonies or nations in their efforts, but, on the contrary, I think the plain implication of the treaty is that we would not have any right to interfere in any such conditions or circumstances."

When the United States, in 1929, voted to ratify the Kellogg-Briand Pact it did so without interpretations, and on the unequivocal understanding that it was agreeing simply to an instrument of peace.

The Budapest interpretations have never been expounded by the President to the American people, yet since last June he has constantly pursued a course in the execution of our foreign policy which is related to and based upon these interpretations. The Secretary of State, so far as can be perceived, has never made public reference to the acceptance of these interpretations. That Secretary Stimson has felt otherwise becomes apparent, not only from his testimony in connection with the Lease Lend Act, but from his recommendations and his conduct with reference thereto over the past year. It remained for the Attorney General at Habana on March 27 of this year, to make assertion of the new international law which is said to be the basis for our Nation's policy. He argued that the Kellogg-Briand Pact of 1928, in which Germany, Italy, and Japan covenanted with us, as well as with other nations, to renounce war as an instrument of policy, made definite the outlawry of war and of necessity altered the dependent concept of neutral obligations. He said that "the United States and other states are entitled to assert a right of discriminatory action by reason of the fact that, since 1928 * * * the place of war and with it the place of neutrality in the international legal system have no longer been the same as they were prior to that date." He argued that the pact had destroyed the historical and juridicial foundations of the doctrine of neutrality. While conceding that the difficulty with the proposition lies in the lack of means for determination of the fact of aggression, the Attorney General argued that Germany, Italy, and Japan had violated a right and affected the interests of the United States.

"No longer can it be argued that the civilized world must behave with rigid impartiality toward both an aggressor in violation of the treaty and the victims of unprovoked attack. We need not now be indifferent as between the worse and the better cause nor deal with the just and the unjust alike.

"To me such an interpretation of international law is not only proper but necessary," continued the Attorney General, "if it is not to be a boon to the lawless and the aggressive. A system of international law which can impose no penalty on a lawbreaker and also forbids other States to aid the victim would be self-defeating and would not help even a little to realize mankind's hope for enduring peace. The principle that war as an instrument of national policy is outlawed must be the starting point in any plan of international reconstruction. And one of the promising directions for legal development is to supply whatever we may of sanction to make renunciation of war a living principle of our society."

How far this new pronouncement of international law spelled out of the Kellogg-Briand Pact coincides with the understanding of the United States Senate in adopting the treaty I leave to be considered in the light of the record. Whatever the full implications of the new program may be, certain it is they have never been canvassed by the American people. Whatever the full extent of the commitment to which we will be bound, once having chosen to act in adoption of the Budapest interpretations, has never been explained. However far other nations may go in acceptance of what we are now making our interpretations, no one knows. Suffice it to say in postulating the problem, all action so far taken in reliance upon this enlarged concept of our treaty has been taken by the United States alone. We are at the very least in the unenviable position of having made a unilateral assertion of rights under the pact. As the lawyers meeting in Budapest resolved that we should do, we have purported to implement the pact by domestic legislation, whether wisely or unwisely. It may yet develop that our Nation will be found alone in its promulgation of the new order in international law, surely a curious aspect of the Kellogg-Briand Pact.

So, my friends, here at the home of Thomas Jefferson, in your beautiful State of Virginia, may I ask in fairness to the American people whom he loved so well that we be told what is planned, and why? Americans, do not fear the truth.

War-Sentiment Poll by Representative Fish

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE POUGHKEEPSIE (N. Y.) EAGLE-NEWS

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the Eagle-News of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., of June 30, 1941, entitled "Quiz for FISH."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of July 3, 1941]

QUIZ FOR FISH

(The following dispatch is reprinted from the Poughkeepsie Eagle-News of June 30)

Turning the tables on Congressman FISH, after receiving one of his postcard-poll ballots, which Mr. FISH is sending to his constituents, B. W. Frazier, Garrison, sent a series of 12 questions to the Congressman, asking for "yes or no" answers.

Mr. Frazier, whose business is doing over old houses in the Hudson River Valley and adjacent territory, said that in marking Congressman FISH's ballot before returning it to him, he replied in the affirmative.

Mr. FISH was asking whether the United States should enter the war.

The questions asked by Mr. Frazier follow:

1. Do you still believe as you stated in Berlin in August 1939 that "Germany's claims are just and that all can be settled if Hitler is given Danzig, the Polish Corridor, and anything else he wants"?

2. Do you still believe as you stated after the publication of the German "white book" that "I cannot conceive of the German foreign office fabricating or forging the document"?

3. As you are now an isolationist, do you believe that you could still mediate the European conflict as you attempted to do when, as an interventionist, you flew to Oslo from Berlin in Von Ribbentrop's private plane, bearing a peace proposal?

4. Did you have an audience with Rudolf Hess while in Berlin?

5. Do you still believe as you said in Congress on March 12, 1940, "Just how we can use more than 2,000 planes in America I cannot understand?"

6. Do you still believe as stated in a radio address on March 5, 1939, that "If we are arming merely for defense, we are spending far too much and wasting money as no nation thinks of attacking us?"

7. Do you still believe as stated on February 11, 1938, in a radio address "The proposed $800,000,000 additional expansion to our Navy is unnecessary to our defense and inconsistent with our foreign policies?"

8. Do you believe as you stated on September 3, 1940, when you, fought the Selective Service Act that "Peacetime conscription is un-American, undemocratic, and unrepublican, and is subversion of the ancient and first principles of a free people?"

9. Do you still believe that the German Day rally at Madison Square Garden where the platform was decked with the Nazi swastikas and the Nazi marching song, "Horst Wessel Lied" was sung and before which you were the principal speaker, was composed of loyal Americans of German origin as you stated in defense of your appearance?

10. Do you still favor a congressional investigation of opinion polls (although at the present time you are conducting one yourself) as stated in January of this year when a poll taken in your own district revealed a majority of 5 to 1 against your obstruction to the Lend-Lease Act?

11. When you were in grave danger of defeat during the last campaign and in an effort to be reelected you tied yourself to Willkie's coattails, you made the following statement in a page advertisement, "I agree with Mr. Willkie 100 percent on his foreign policy." As Mr. Willkie has not changed his stand on foreign affairs, was your statement merely made for political expediency?

12. Are you still unashamed, as you stated on March 28, 1941, that you wrote an article for the Nazi propaganda publication, Today's Challenge, the editor of which has been indicted by the United States Government as an unregistered Nazi propagandist?

Mr. Frazier said he would appreciate "yes" or "no" answers to these questions with the same promptness with which he answered Mr. FISH's request for his opinion on the war poll.

Tribute to the Late Senator Harrison

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THEODORE G. BILBO

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

POEM BY HORACE C. CARLISLE

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a poem written by Horace C. Carlisle on the late Senator Harrison, of Mississippi.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PAT HARRISON

Pat Harrison, Senator-statesman, is dead—
A recognized leader in Congress for years—
He's meeting with friends that have gone on ahead,
Where there are no vexatious problems nor fears—
He fought a good fight for the truth and the right—
His was a life full of exemplary deeds—
He's gone to the land of unending delight,
Where there are no sorrows, no worries, no needs.

Pat Harrison was a true friend to his own—
He loved Mississippi with all his big heart—
In all his vast dealings he never was known
From principles based upon right to depart—
His own conscience was his infallible guide,
Whose voice he religiously ever obeyed—
In State and in Nation he took growing pride,
And walked among men, unfeared, unafraid.

Pat Harrison will in the Senate be missed—
Here his high esteem as a statesman was won;
For here he stood ready always to resist
Whatever was mentioned that should not be done—
He loved to agree with his Nation's great Chief,
But firmly opposed what he thought was unwise—
Aweary with labor, he longed for relief,
And God, in His mercy, closed gently his eyes.

—Horace C. Carlisle.

How the 1941 Wheat Quota Works, and Why

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

ARTICLE BY CLIF STRATTON IN TOPEKA DAILY CAPITAL OF SUNDAY, JUNE 29, 1941

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, one of the matters of great interest and current discussion among the wheat farmers of this country is marketing quotas. It is natural that on such a controversial subject there should be differences of opinion and some misunderstanding. The following article by Clif Stratton, Washington correspondent of the Topeka Daily Capital and one of the best-informed agricultural writers if the country, presents a fair, candid, and very informative discussion of the subject:

[From the Topeka (Kans.) Daily Capital of June 29, 1941]

HOW THE 1941 WHEAT QUOTA WORKS AND WHY—NONCOOPERATORS COMPLAIN ABOUT 49-CENT PENALTY

(By Clif Stratton, of the Capital's Washington Bureau)

WASHINGTON, June 28.—In the past 2 weeks mail of the Kansas Senators and Congressmen has been fairly heavy with letters and telegrams from those opposed to the A. A. A. farm program, protesting against the "crime" of the marketing quotas for wheat, and especially against imposition of the 49 cents a bushel penalty on wheat marketed from excess acreages.

In the interest of fair play, it should be stated that there is much more involved in the wheat program right now than just the matter of excess penalties. Also that for several years past farmers cooperating in the national farm program have made certain sacrifices from which the noncooperators have received the immediate advantages. Now that the farmers in the program are apparently getting a better deal (though not nearly so much better as is being claimed by opponents of the program) the protests are coming in thick and heavy. Everyone is "mad" anyway these days and looking for someone to be blamed for the most unpleasant position in which the whole world finds itself.

The following is an attempt to shoot straight on the national farm program as it affects wheat, including marketing quotas and penalties for marketing production from excess wheat acreages.

INCREASE MARKETING PENALTY

In the same bill which provided mandatory Government loans (to cooperators in the national farm program) on basic commodities at 85 percent of parity, it also was provided that the marketing penalty on "excess" wheat be increased from 15 cents a bushel to 50 percent of the established basic loan value. In the case of wheat the established basic loan value is 98 cents a bushel on the farm; that means the penalty on wheat from excess acreage is 49 cents a bushel.

Incidentally, that means loan value on No. 2 Hard Winter wheat at Kansas City is $1.10; No. 2 Red wheat at St. Louis, $1.15; No. 1 Dark Northern Spring at Minneapolis, $1.15; No. 1 Soft White at Portland, Oreg., $1.05. The 98 cents is figured the average loan value at the farm.

FOR COOPERATORS ONLY

Now under the old law the penalty was 15 cents a bushel, but the loan value (farm) established and in effect was 56 percent of parity, or 64.4 cents at the farm. This loan value was for cooperators only; noncooperators were eligible for loans on excess wheat at 60 percent of the cooperators rate, or approximately 39 cents a bushel, but only if marketing quotas were in effect. That was so much lower than the market price (sustained as it was and is by Government loans) that no noncooperator would consider taking a Government loan with loan value at 56 percent of parity. And likely few of them will under the new act, except some very big operators for purely speculative purposes. Aside it might be mentioned, not all the wheat gambling is done on the Board of Trade.

Even before the outbreak of the World War, there was no market for Unted States wheat in Europe, except by payment of subsidies by the Government. With the war blockade in effect, and Britain getting its wheat from its own dominions and from Argentina, there was no market abroad for United States wheat. With a surplus of some 400,000,000 bushels this year (1940–41), the market price in America, unless sustained by Government loans, would have dropped down toward 30 cents a bushel.

"The amount that current prices are now above the export price levels is indicated by the export indemnity which would be required to export to Europe," the Bureau of Agricultural Economics reports in the June 18 issue of the Demand and Price Situation. Computed on the basis of export values, this would be about 36 cents from the Gulf and 27 cents from Pacific ports.

SIX HUNDRED AND SIXTY MILLION BUSHEL EXCESS

On the basis of June 1, indication of a crop of 911,000,000 bushels and a carry-over of about 400,000,000 bushels—a total supply of 1,310,000,000 bushels—is indicated (from 1941–42 marketing year). With domestic disappearance estimated at 650,000,000 bushels, there would be about 660,000,000 bushels available for exports, shipments, and carry-over. (Shipments means shipments to our own Territories outside continental United States—about 3,000,000 bushels a year.)

In other words, under existing world conditions, the United States will have on hand next month and for the marketing year enough wheat to supply market demands for the United States 2 whole years—and no foreign market in sight. Canada has on hand, without any allowance for production this year, enough wheat to supply her own and Britain's needs for 2½ years.

Under these conditions, it is hard to see any but a very low price for wheat the coming year—probably 30 cents a bushel is a fair estimate.

Ten or twelve years ago, faced with a similar but not nearly so serious (numerically) a situation, Uncle Sam tried high loans without production restrictions through the Farm Board "stabilizing loans." After 2 years of that we got 23-cent wheat in Kansas.

THE SURPLUS

The penalties for excess marketings is an attempt to prevent a duplication of the Farm Board fiasco. If the Government guarantees 98 cents a bushel on the farm for all the wheat grown, with a surplus above domestic needs for the coming year of better than 600,000,000 bushels, well, there would be a great temptation for everyone to grow wheat. And the surplus would be something to worry about.

Now, let's get back to the new 98 cents a bushel Government loans, and the 49 cents a bushel penalty for marketing excess wheat.

Farmers in the program presumably have not planted excess acreage, beyond a 3 percent tolerance. Farmers outside, some of them, have planted every acre they own to wheat. They are producing the unmarketable surpluses that will drop the bottom out of the market once the Government loans as a sustaining factor are removed.

INCREASED PENALTY

This session of Congress, to protect the wheat growers' market in the face of rising farm costs, provided for the mandatory 98 cents a bushel loan, for cooperators. In the same bill, to discourage planting of excess acreages, Congress increased the penalty of excess marketings from 15 to 49 cents a bushel.

This has been a great help to the farmers inside the program. Those outside feel they have been terribly discriminated against. Actually, their position is not so much different from what it would have been any time marketing quotas were voted.

Under the old law, the Government loans now in effect were 56 percent of parity, or about 64 cents a bushel. The penalty, if placed in effect, would be 15 cents a bushel. Noncooperators, if the loans made the market price, would get 64 cents less 15 cents penalty, or 49 cents a bushel. Under the new program, if the loans make the market price, they get the market price (98 cents on farm) less 49 cents, or 49 cents.

SACRIFICED EXCESS ACREAGE

In practice, it doesn't work out exactly that way, of course. Before the marketing quotas were voted in, the noncooperators were getting the benefit of the price-sustaining loans, and producing all they wanted to. They could gamble to their heart's content on a rising market, having the assurance that the Government would not permit the market to go below a certain point. The cooperators, on the other hand, had to plant their allotted acreages only; they sacrificed their excess acreage in order to help stabilize the market by holding down overproduction.

Since the marketing quotas have been voted, however, the cooperator now has a tremendous advantage. He gets the high-loan value, pays no penalties. The noncooperator gets the benefit of the high-loan value through the artificial market price, but on his allotted acreage only. He practically is barred from selling his excess on the market except at a loss on that excess. Also the noncooperator cannot sell any of his wheat—if he has planted more than his allotted acreage—until he has either placed the excess in storage under bond satisfactory to the Secretary of Agriculture, or has paid the penalty upon it. If he wants a Government loan—which if he is conscientiously opposed to Government aid he should not ask—it will be only 58 cents less the 49 cents penalty, or a net of 9 cents. He can sell at the market price, now about 14 cents below full-loan value, and net perhaps 35 cents a bushel on his wheat. But, of course, he will see his neighbor in the program getting 98 cents—and he can't be expected to like that.

Also, his cooperating neighbor, in the program, will be getting about 18 cents a bushel in conservation and parity payments, bringing his total to approximately parity price of $1.16 a bushel.

But, on the other hand, the cooperator through years past, has surrendered his right to plant all the wheat acreage he wants; and plants only his allotted acreage.

Generally speaking (and this is only a rough average) the cooperator plants only about 60 percent of his potential acreage, compared to the noncooperator's 100 percent. On paper, at least, this could be figured this way:

Say a cooperator and a noncooperator each has 200 acres of wheatland, the acreage based on what they planted in the period before the A. A. A. was started. The cooperator plants his allotment, 120 acres, to wheat. The noncooperator plants his 200 acres; allotted acreage plus 80 acres.

On a normal yield of 20 bushels to the acre, the cooperator harvests 2,400 bushels. He elects to take his loan, 98 cents a bushel, instead of selling on the market, which on June 15 was about 14 cents below the loan value. He also gets approximately 18 cents a bushel in conservation payments, or a total of $1.16 a bushel for 2,400 bushels; 2,400 times $1.16 equals $2,784.

If the noncooperator's allotted acreage is 120 acres and he has planted entire 200 to wheat, he will have a harvest of 4,000 bushels, of which the yield from 120 acres is not subject to penalty, also is not eligible for a loan. He can sell this at the market without penalty, provided he has paid the penalty on his excess or stored it under bond On basis of mid-June, that would be 84 cents a bushel on 2,400 bushels, or $2,016. He can elect to sell the balance of 1,600 bushels on the market at 84 cents, less the 49 cents a bushel penalty, or 1,600 times 35 cents or $560. Add $2,016 and $560 and you get $2,576 from his wheat.

In other words, the noncooperator, in theory, could get $2,576 wheat income, compared to the $2,784 for the cooperator in the program. Of course, the cooperator has not had the seeding or labor expense on the additional 80 acres; also the cooperator is further ahead from having 80 acres for planting nondepleting crops. And in fact the noncooperator may not have obtained quite as large an allotted acreage as the cooperator.

But looking at the whole picture, the marketing quotas do not begin to make the difference against the noncooperator that some of the statements made by A. A. A. opponents in mail received at Washington would indicate.

Expenditures for 1941, the Budget for 1942, and Fiscal Planning

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM DITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker:

Yes, this year we are planning; and why not? After all, that is one of the things that Government is intended to do, to think not in terms of just this year and the next, but for the good of the people, to think for many long years ahead.

Thus spoke President Roosevelt on October 13, 1936. President Roosevelt has repeatedly boasted that he has been a stanch adherent of planning and that one of the fundamentals of the New Deal is planning for the future. However, the record of expenditures for the fiscal year 1941 as compared with the Budget for that fiscal year, and the present estimated expenditures for 1942 as compared with the Budget for that fiscal year as originally submitted 6 months ago, does not give evidence that the New Deal is in line for high praise for its ability to plan, especially relative to national defense.

The Budget for the fiscal year 1941 as submitted to Congress on January 3, 1940, by the President provided for an expenditure for national defense for that fiscal year of $1,800,000,000. Concerning that item in the Budget for the fiscal year 1941 President Roosevelt remarked:

In these headings, for example, I do not believe that the majority of the people in this country want to reduce the budgeted estimate of $1,800,000,000 for national defense. This is an increase, of course, over the current year, but it is far less than many experts on national defense think should be spent, though it is, in my judgment, a sufficient amount for the coming year.

* * * * *

National defense: These estimates represent expenditures needed to develop and maintain our normal defense preparations. They also include, in view of the current world situation, the emergency expenditures required for the War and Navy Departments, the Coast Guard, Department of Justice, and the Panama Canal.

In order that these emergency requirements may be clearly shown I have segregated them for both the fiscal years 1940 and 1941. They call for supplemental appropriations of $272,000,000 in the fiscal year 1940, and appropriations of $302,000,000 in the fiscal year 1941. Expenditures are estimated at $160,000,000 and $300,000,000 in these 2 years. This segregation will, I hope, help to focus attention on our emergency defense expenditures, and the problem of financing them. It will also facilitate the return to a normal defense program when the current emergency has passed. (Pp. 8, 9, Budget for 1941.)

The Budget for that fiscal year carried an estimated total expenditure of $8,400,000,000 for all purposes. Government receipts were estimated at $5,547,000,000, and the net total deficit was estimated at $2,276,000,000. As was previously shown, the President believed that emergency national-defense expenditures for 1941 would be about $302,000,000, that is, defense expenditures in addition to the so-called normal defense expenditures. The only reference to increased taxes in this message is contained in the following quotation:

National-defense taxes: I am convinced that specific tax legislation should be enacted to finance the emergency national-defense expenditures. Although these expenditures appear unavoidable, they will not increase the permanent wealth-producing capacity of our citizens. I believe that it is the general sense of the country that this type of emergency expenditure be met by a special tax or taxes. Moreover, this course will make for greater assurance that such expenditures will cease when the emergency has passed.

I strongly recommend to the Congress, therefore, that additional taxes be imposed to yield in the fiscal year 1941 at least enough to cover the emergency national-defense expenditures in the fiscal years 1940 and 1941. In seeking additional sources of revenue, I hope that the Congress will follow the accepted principle of good taxation, of taxing according to ability to pay, and will avoid taxes which decrease consumer buying power. (Budget for 1941, p. 13.)

Thus the only additional taxes that the President would recommend would be for additional national defense. These taxes, it was estimated, would total about $400,000,000 a year. It should be remembered that the President made no recommendations as to where this additional revenue was to be secured.

Let me once again point out that the President, in January 1940, believed that $1,800,000,000 would be all that would be required for national-defense purposes in 1941. The need for additional funds must have struck the President's mind like a strange and sudden light in the night, for even on May 14, 1940, our farsighted President, who placed so much emphasis on planning, asserted that anyone who believed in a two-ocean navy was stupid. Thus the New York Times reports a press conference of President Roosevelt on May 14, 1940, as follows:

Mr. Roosevelt brushed aside as utterly stupid suggestions that developments in the European struggle and their implications in the Pacific strengthened the arguments for a two-ocean American Navy. If it ever had any merit, that theory became outmoded with the acquisition of California in 1847, he said. Such a conception of the Nation's floating defenses was just plain dumb, he added. (New York Times, May 15, 1940.)

Two days later the President saw fit to ask Congress for more than a billion dollars additional for national defense, and 2 months later he himself signed an act of Congress authorizing the creation of a two-ocean navy.

On May 16, 1940, our farsighted President came before us and requested additional funds for national-defense purposes. In that memorable message the President asked for $1,182,000,000 for national-defense purposes. Above everything, the President desired to have a fleet of 50,000 airplanes in 2 years and to have facilities that would produce 50,000 planes a year by that time. It would appear that he himself believed that $1,182,000,000 would be all that was needed at that time to accomplish this result. In that memorable message the President made no reference to where the funds for the additional expenditures were to come from; no suggestion concerning any additional revenues were made; nor was any proposal set forth in his fireside chat to the Nation on May 26 of last year.

On May 28 a statement was issued concerning the total cost of the defense program and the method to be used in financing it. The total so-called emergency-defense program would cost about $4,000,000,000 during the course of the next 5 years. To finance this the debt limit was to be raised $3,000,000,000, or from $45,000,000,000 to $48,000,000,000; this added borrowing power was to be used solely for national-defense purposes. To finance this new debt income taxes and certain excise taxes were to be raised about 10 percent. Such increases were to continue for a period of 5 years. These new taxes, it was estimated, would yield between $650,000,000 and $700,000,000 a year. This program was formulated in a statement that was issued after a conference between Democratic congressional leaders and Treasury experts. The statement was as follows:

Chairman DOUGHTON, Mr. COOPER, chairman of the tax subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee; Senator Harrison, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, have been in conference since 9 o'clock this morning with Secretary Morgenthau and with Mr. Bell, Mr. Sullivan, and Mr. Helvering of the Treasury, and with the joint congressional committee expert, Mr. Stam, and they have agreed to ask Congress at this session to consider legislation to provide funds for the payment of the national-defense program. Chairman DOUGHTON and Senator Harrison stated that they will convene their committees immediately to formulate a plan.

They will propose an increase in the national-debt authorization by $3,000,000,000 to provide for the issuance of national-defense obligations to be sold with maturities not to exceed 5 years, and they will also propose the levy of additional taxes, the details of which are to be worked out by the committee. These proposed taxes will yield between $600,000,000 and $700,000,000 annually over the 5-year period, which will be sufficient to liquidate the national-defense securities.

The Secretary of the Treasury communicated to the President the conclusions reached by the conferees and the President expressed his approval of the program.—New York Herald-Tribune, May 29, 1940.

It should be noted from the last paragraph that the President acquiesced in this program. But the President was not really interested in how defense was to be financed. He was more intertested in making certain that the defense program did not cause displeasure and discomfort to a large measure of the electorate. To put additional taxes upon these people would have caused them displeasure, and the third-term election was still ahead. On the very day that this tax program was formulated the President stated at a press conference, according to the New York Times:

The President said that there was no reason for the country to become "discomboomerated" in apprehension of what may come to pass. The women of the country would not have to give up their cosmetics, lipsticks, and chocolate sodas in consequence of the preparedness program. It was the intention not to upset the normal trends of American life any more than necessary.

Mr. Roosevelt underscored his observation that the present defense program was not to be compared with that of 1917, when the Nation was attempting to raise an army of 4,000,000 men. There was no thought in government today to revive the draft system, whether of men or money.

The whole idea was that the present troubled state of international affairs called for an outlay of about a billion and a quarter dollars over and above the $2,000,000,000 that was being spent on the military and naval establishments, and it was necessary to set up an organization to supervise the expenditure and make it effective.

What the administration was undertaking now was nothing like a complete national mobilization, the President explained. (New York Times, May 29, 1940.)

Emphasis was placed by the President on "business as usual" and on the fact that this was just a small program and would not cause us any trouble.

On May 31, 1940, the House Ways and Means Committee commenced hearings on the above-mentioned program for financing national defense, yet on the very day that the Secretary of the Treasury testified that the defense program would be adequate for a period of 3 years and would cost only about $4,000,000,000, the President submitted another message to Congress asking for additional funds for national defense. This time he asked for $1,277,000,000. This would seem to have completely upset the previous estimates that the emergency defense program would cost but $4,000,000,000 in no less than 3 years. No one in the White House seemed to be disturbed about this incongruity.

On June 3, 1940, a new revised Budget estimate had been prepared. According to this the estimate of expenditures during the fiscal year 1941 would be $10,001,000,000; national-defense expenditures would be increased from $1,900,000,000 to $3,250,000,000. As was previously indicated, the revenue for 1941 was estimated in January 1940 to be $5,548,000,000, but by June 3 the estimate had risen to $5,652,000,000. The President's first estimate of the deficit for the fiscal year 1941 was $2,276,000,000, but 5 months later it had increased to $4,348,000,000.

Late in June 1940 the financing program that was proposed on May 28, 1940, was enacted. It was not until July 1 that we heard anything directly from the President concerning additional taxes for national defense. But do not be too encouraged merely because we did hear from the President on the subject on July 1—he was not interested in revenue, he was more interested in an excess-profits tax that would be punitive in nature rather than revenue producing. On July 1 he sent to Congress a message which read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

We are engaged in a great national effort to build up our national defenses to meet any and every potential attack.

We are asking even our humblest citizens to contribute their mite.

It is our duty to see that the burden is equitably distributed according to ability to pay so that a few do not gain from the sacrifices of the many.

I, therefore, recommend to the Congress the enactment of a steeply graduated excess-profits tax, to be applied to all individuals and all corporate organizations without discrimination.

Ten days later the President sent to Congress another message asking additional funds for national defense. This time his request was for $4,848,000,000 in appropriations and in contract authorizations, but in the message the President made no suggestions how these additional national-defense expenditures were going to be financed. Before the summer was over Congress had appropriated for national defense in the fiscal year 1941 more than $10,000,000,000 in direct appropriations and in contract authorizations.

Early in August we had another revised budget estimate for the fiscal year 1941. The estimate of expenditures for the fiscal year had increased to $12,058,000,000. This was $3,600,000,000 more than the estimate that was presented to Congress 7 months earlier. Defense expenditures were estimated at $5,000,000,000. The revenue estimate was for $6,367,000,000 or about $800,000,000 more than the January estimate. The deficit, of course, grew apace. It was estimated in August at $5,791,000,000, only about $3,000,000,000 more than the January estimate. Early in the autumn of 1940 Congress passed the excess-profits tax law which was believed at that time would yield $350,000,000 in the fiscal year 1941, and probably $700,000,000 per year thereafter.

When the President submitted the Budget for 1942 in January of this year, 1941, a revised Budget estimate for 1941, of course, appeared. The estimate of expenditures had now increased to $13,202,000,000 and the estimate for national defense was increased to $6,463,000,000. Revenue was estimated at $7,012,000,000 and the deficit was estimated at the tidy sum of $6,280,000,000. It would appear that at the end of the fiscal year we have not quite reached these new high estimates. During the fiscal year we have spent $12,774,000,000, slightly less than the revised Budget estimate of $12,202,000,000. National-defense expenditures were $6,047,000,000, revenues yielded $7,607,000,000, and the deficit for the fiscal year was only $5,103,000,000, not quite double the original estimate of the deficit that was presented by the President to the Congress in January 1940.

On the basis of the experience we have had in 1941 with our farsighted, planning President and his Budget, we can look forward to a similar experience during the course of the fiscal year 1942. In the Budget message that President Roosevelt submitted to us in January 1941 he stated that the cost of national defense for the current emergency would be about $28,000,000,000:

These expenditures must be seen as a part of a defense program stretching over several years. On the basis of the appropriations and authorizations enacted for national defence from June 1940 up to the present time, plus the recommendations for supplementary appropriations and authorizations for 1941 and the recommendations contained in this Budget for 1942, we have a program of $28,000,000,000.

This is a vast sum, difficult to visualize in terms of work actually to be done. If we can prove that we are able to organize and execute such a gigantic program in a democratic way, we shall have made a positive contribution in a world in which the workability of democracy is challenged.

Expenditures for the Federal Government for the fiscal year 1942 are estimated by the President at $17,485,000,000. Expenditures for defense alone would be $10,811,000,000, the revenue is estimated to yield $8,275,000,000, thus leaving a deficit of only $9,210,000,000. As the President submitted his Budget last January it would appear that we could expect that taxes would yield less than half the total expenditures of the Federal Government. But yet the President said merely that we needed some new taxes. He did not mention any specific amount, he did not suggest any specific sources. His attitude was that we did need to rely especially on taxes.

Tax policy: There is no agreement on how much of such an extraordinary defense program should be financed on a pay-as-you-go basis and how much by borrowing. Only very drastic and restrictive taxation which curtails consumption would finance defense wholly on a pay-as-you-go basis. I fear that such taxation would interfere with the full use of our productive capacities. We have a choice between restrictive tax measures applied to the present national income and a higher tax yield from increased national income under less restrictive tax measures. I suggest, therefore, a financial policy aimed at collecting progressive taxes out of a higher level of national income. I am opposed to a tax policy which restricts general consumption as long as unused capacity is available and as long as idle labor can be employed.

We cannot yet conceive the complete measure of extraordinary taxes which are necessary to pay off the cost of emergency defense and to aid in avoiding inflationary price rises which may occur when full capacity is approached.

However, a start should be made this year to meet a larger percentage of defense payments from current tax receipts. The additional tax measures should be based on the principle of ability to pay. Because it is the fixed policy of the Government that no citizen should make any abnormal net profit out of national defense, I am not satisfied that existing laws are in this respect adequate.

Taxes are unpleasant.

From January through June 1941 the President continued to send additional requests to Congress for appropriations. Only 2 months after the President submitted his budget, in which he stated that defense expenditures during the next 3 years would be $29,000,000,000, he requested an additional $7,000,000,000 of appropriations to be expended under the Lease Lend Act. The first session of the Seventy-seventh Congress has already appropriated for national-defense purposes more than $27,880,000,000 in 6 months. If we add to this the $10,000,000,000 appropriated last year, the total appropriations and contract authorizations for national defense that have already been made amount to about $37,000,000,000. This is interesting, for first the President said, on May 16, 1940, that the emergency defense program would cost about a billion dollars; by the 28th of May 1940 the cost had gotten to $4,000,000,000; by the end of the summer of 1940 the appropriations had gone to $10,000,000,000. In January 1941 the estimate was $29,000,000,000, and already by June 30, 1941, we have made available in appropriations and contract authorizations $37,000,000,000. Various officials of the New Deal defense program have stated that this program will cost in excess of $40,000,000,000.

And already we have commenced to have revised Budget estimates for the fiscal year 1942. On May 31, 1941, the Director of the Budget presented a new revision wherein the estimated total expenditures would be increased from $17,485,000,000 to $22,169,000,000. In the original Budget estimate defense expenditures were set at $10,811,000,000; but after 5 months the revised estimate had increased to $15,500,000,000. The revenue estimate had increased from $8,275,000,000 to $9,402,000,000 and the estimate of the deficit had also increased from $9,210,000,000 to $12,767,000,000.

I understand that a committee of this body is now considering a revenue bill that is hoped will yield $3,500,000,000 in added taxes. If this bill should be passed and if it yields this estimated revenue, the deficit will be reduced unles estimated expenditures continue to rise. From our experience gained under the Budget for 1941 and with the actual expenditures for that year, one should not be surprised if expenditures increase in 1942, if it is physically possible for the New Deal to attain such an end.

Our experience with the Budget for 1941, as well as our experience with the Budget estimates for 1942 to date, would be disheartening to any student of budgetary science. When the Budget and Accounting Act was passed some 20 years ago it was believed that a great step forward in fiscal management had been taken. But in the hands of President Roosevelt and his fellow planners this instrument of sound administation has failed to accomplish the results that one could hope for. This experience also makes it painfully clear that President Roosevelt is not the great farsighted planner that he would like us to believe him to be.

Today and Tomorrow

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE, OF KANSAS, TO KANSAS BANKERS' ASSOCIATION

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by me at the annual meeting of the Kansas Bankers' Association in Kansas City, Kans., on May 16, 1941:

I am happy to come back to Kansas after being away since last November and to have the opportunity of getting the western viewpoint and hearing a little talk of weather, crops, and prices. During the last 2 or 3 years, every Member of Congress has been so busy with his work in Washington that he has had little opportunity to spend any time in his own State and district. I have missed the rich association which comes from meeting and visiting with the home folks and also the opportunity which such association gives to learn the views and desires of my constituents. Washington is a beautiful city and a busy and interesting place just now, but I am tired of the atmosphere of war and politics and bureaucracy. Coming to Kansas from Washington is like leaving a sultry, miasmic swamp and getting up into the free fresh air of the mountain tops.

Several weeks ago, when your secretary was making up this program, he asked me to advise him of the title of my remarks. I didn't know just then what I might discuss or what might be of interest by the time this convention was held, because of the rapid changes which are taking place in this country and the world. So I suggested the title "Today and Tomorrow." I thought this would give me quite a wide range, both in time and space, and would not tie me down too closely to anything specific. It occurred to me afterward that it might have been even better to have said "Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow," which would give an opportunity not only to cover the present and the future, but to range backward a few thousand years into history.

I think I can tell from the mail which I have received in recent months and from what I have heard since I have been here, what questions are in the minds of Kansas people at this time. I know that they are disturbed and that they are wondering what is coming, not only immediately, but in the future. I wish that I could paint a bright picture of the coming months and years. I don't believe, however, that anyone can conscientiously do that. I think that we can be certain of but one thing and that is that there are trying times ahead and that our country and the world face months and years which may be among the darkest in history. Perhaps you have heard the new definition of an optimist as one who believes that the future is uncertain. Surely there are many of us who wish we were not so certain of what is ahead.

I wish I could give you an answer to the questions which are in your minds, particularly as to what the immediate future holds with respect to war and peace and how existing conditions are going to affect us from a business and economic standpoint. I don't believe there is anyone who can give you definite answers to those questions. We are living now from day to day, tremendous ventures are in the making in all parts of the world, and there is no one wise enough to fully foresee either the present or ultimate effect.

I am not going to try to cover too much territory. I am making this talk to Kansans and it is about our problems and our conditions that I want to speak. Nevertheless, the whole world is tied up so closely today that happenings even in the most remote parts of the globe definitely affect our welfare. Something that takes place tomorrow in Singapore or Syria or Greenland may affect our lives for years to come.

Just what is our situation today? What do we know for certain? Well, in the first place, we have had a domestic revolution in this country during the last 10 years. During no decade in our history has there been such a change in our thinking with respect to social and economic questions. Never during a similar period of time has there been such a change in our governmental institutions. Now on top of all this has come a world war which has already had tremendous repercussions in this country, notwithstanding the fact that its full effect is just beginning to be realized and felt.

Today the defense program overshadows everything else in a business and economic way and it is only in its infancy. As yet the American people have no conception of the immensity of this program or of the extent to which it is going to absorb our national energies. This is going to be true whether we get into the war as an active belligerent or not. As long as the war lasts our defense efforts must be expanded. We dare not let up on them as long as there is a possibility that Hitler may win, no matter whether our role is finally to be that of an arsenal or a belligerent.

Are we going to get in as a belligerent? The only answer I can make to that is to point out that every month since the repeal of the Neutrality Act in the fall of 1939 we have moved nearer and nearer to actual participation. I can't tell you what the final result will be, but just now we are moving mighty fast in the direction of war. The vast majority of our people undoubtedly want to stay out of war and yet judging by the votes in Congress and by public information polls a majority of them are willing to support steps which, if continued and expanded, will surely bring us into the struggle as a belligerent.

But whatever our role may be it is certain that this national-defense effort will profoundly affect our lives and our economy for many years to come. What is this new activity going to mean to this country and particularly to Kansas during the next few years. Well, it will mean a great many things. First, it is going to mean the end of the more abundant life, or at least what has passed for the more abundant life during the past few years. Eventually we can't have both guns and butter in this country any more than they can have them in Germany. In other words, if our defense program is going to amount to anything it must be an all-out effort with our entire energies concentrated on defense. Unfortunately, the national administration has not made this clear to our people as yet. Until quite recently, at least, the President and his coterie of immediate advisers were still talking about maintaining social gains and at the same time carrying on a great defense program. Sooner or later our people are going to find out that defense costs money and effort and that all of it cannot be passed on to succeeding generations or paid for out of the accumulated wealth of past generations. Perhaps the first real awakening along this line will come when Congress passes the three and one-half billion dollar tax bill now under consideration. Can you think of any new taxes that you would like to pay? If so, I am sure that the Ways and Means Committee will be glad to hear from you. This committee has been holding hearings for several weeks but has had very few suggestions as to what should be taxed. Practically all of those appearing before the committee have been there to plead that certain things be not taxed. Writing a tax bill which will raise three and one-half billion dollars on top of the taxes we are already paying is no summer outing, and before the committee gets through it is going to find that the only way to raise this much money is to tax everybody and everything.

What are some of the other things we can expect as this program proceeds? Well, to mention another unpleasant subject, there is our national debt. Perhaps you remember that no longer than a year ago we were worrying because the national debt was approaching the $45,000,000,000 limit. There were earnest debates in Congress and in the press as to what might happen if that limit were reached. Now high Government officials are calmly discussing the possibility of a $100,000,000,000 debt. If the war lasts as long as some authorities expect, it will go higher than that. This increase, of course, is in spite of the great increase in taxation.

There is the matter of rising prices with possibe inflation in the offing. Efforts are being made to control prices—that is, to hold them down—not only because of the fact that price increases now will greatly increase governmental costs and taxes and bring about inflation, but because deflation after the war will make the great debt doubly hard to pay. I am for these efforts to hold down prices, but our experience in every great war shows what a difficult proposition it is. Furthermore, we will have to go at it in a more effective way than is being done at present if the scheme is to work. While ceilings have been suggested on certain prices, yet up to date nothing whatever has been done with regard to the price of labor. Wages are increasing and under the policies of this administration will probably continue to increase. Wages are an important part of the cost of most products. Temporarily perhaps they can be increased and the price of the product remain the same, as recently happened in the steel industry, but in the end wage increases are going to be translated into price increases. General price increases are going to result in demands for higher wages, which will bring further price increases, and thus the vicious spiral of inflation is on its way. I do not know whether it is possible to hold down prices. If it is done, it will have to be done all along the line. Labor and industry will each have to contribute.

Then, of course, there is this which must be expected, and that is the moment we enter the war as an active belligerent we will be under a dictatorship in this country practically as effective and as rigid as exists in the totalitarian countries today. We already have a tremendous centralization of power in Washington. This has been built up in time of peace. I do not need to point this out or to cite specific examples to those who are in the banking business. You know how the application of the wage-and-hour law has affected your routine. You know how other policies and legislation have materially changed the character of your business. You know what Government competition in the loaning of money has done to you. That is only typical of what has happened to industry in general. Perhaps the business of banking will not be affected by a war economy to the same extent as some other businesses; but, frankly, I do not think that any of us have seen anything so far compared with what is coming. Most of you remember the last war. You remember the control which the Government exercised over your lives and activities, the restrictions upon the use of certain commodities, and that sort of thing, and yet as compared with what would have come had the war lasted a little longer those controls were nothing. They were nothing as compared with what we are going to experience this year and in succeeding years as our defense efforts expand.

I have already mentioned what we may expect if we enter the war as an active belligerent. It is no secret that the plans for industrial mobilization in that event have been drawn up for many months. These plans may be put into effect before we actually become a belligerent, and it would not surprise me at any time in the near future for the President to ask Congress to give him blanket powers to mobilize the entire country on a war basis.

Keeping all of these things in mind, what seems to be the best course for us in Kansas to follow? We want to cooperate in every way possible with the national-defense program. We want to carry our part of the burdens which the present world situation may impose upon our Nation. At the same time, we want to follow a course which will leave our State and its people in the best position to carry on when peace finally returns to the world. In recent years we have heard much discussion along the line of industrializing our State. We are interested particularly at this time in securing our share of the industrial expansion due to national defense. Yet I think that we would be kidding ourselves if we didn't admit that Kansas is primarily an agricultural State and will remain so. This is not only because of the fact that our rich soil and equitable climate make great agricultural production possible, but because our geographic position and our lack of low-cost transportation will always handicap us when it comes to industrial development. With such exceptions as to be negligible the industrial areas of this country are located where there is easy access to water transportation. The Panama Canal has further handicapped the interior sections of this country by providing transportation by water between the two coasts. I am in favor of securing all the industrial development which we possibly can, but it is my contention that good agricultural prices and a sound agricultural development mean more to Kansas and its future prosperity than all the industry we can possibly bring into the State. We are interested in getting our share of the defense program, but a 25-cent-per-bushel increase in the price of wheat and 2 cents more for cattle and hogs will mean more in the way of real permanent prosperity for Kansas people than all the war industries we can ever have any hope of getting. Furthermore, good agricultural prices will do more to establish sound industrial development in this State than anything else. It will give our people buying power, thus building up our local industries and expanding our mercantile institutions. It should result in an expansion of agricultural processing. It should bring in local distribution plants for commodities manufactured outside of the State. It will create a market for industrial products which will provide an incentive for the establishment of plants to manufacture them.

All of this should result in a normal, natural, healthy industrial development suited to our needs and of a permanent nature.

In our efforts to secure war industries I think that we should keep firmly in mind the thought that as far as possible these industries should be of a character which can be made to permanently fit into an agricultural economy. If we can do this, there will be fewer headaches, fewer busted communities, and a much smaller relief problem in the future than will otherwise be the case.

Yet in reviewing the efforts which have been made in recent years to secure better prices for agricultural products I find that in many instances they have been opposed by businessmen even in strictly agricultural communities. A part of this opposition has been inspired by those engaged in businesses which they felt were adversely affected by the methods used to increase farm income. Processors and distributors who had for many years done business in certain traditional ways naturally opposed any change in those methods which might be made necessary through efforts to increase agricultural prices. I do not criticize those who may have felt themselves injuriously affected for opposing these changes. But surely there is no reason why businessmen generally in agricultural communities should oppose practical efforts which are made to increase the most important source of income in their communities through legislation or otherwise.

There are some who have conscientiously opposed efforts to assist agriculture through legislation on the ground that the methods used set up an artificial level of prices and interfered with natural economic laws. These objections might be sound from an academic standpoint. They might be tenable if all of our present-day business and economic activities followed natural economic laws. We must realize, however, that today very little business is conducted on a free and natural basis, and that the price of almost everything which the farmer buys is wholly or partly fixed either by law or by practices in the nature of monopoly; in other words, artificially. Many of these disadvantages to the farmer have been brought about by legislation enacted to benefit other groups of our population. The price of practically everything that the farmer buys is higher than it would otherwise be by reason of the fact that the wages of labor have been increased tremendously in recent years. This is due in a large part to the enactment of legislation by Congress which has not only in some instances directly increased wages and decreased working hours, but has given labor all of the advantages of monopoly prices through unionization. Many of the farmer's costs such as transportation rates, utility rates, and livestock commission rates are fixed by virtue of legislation enacted by the National or State Governments. The cost of many things which the farmer buys has been increased by the tariff. In spite of our antitrust laws, the prices of many things which farmers buy are fixed by monopolies. To sum it up, agriculture has been in the position of operating on a free and competitive basis in a world which is very largely operating under a controlled economy.

There are too many people who look upon low farm prices as something which simply affect the individual farmer. That, however, is only a small part of the picture. Low agricultural prices mean not only distress and poverty to individual farmers, but mean a maldistribution of national income which prevents a free exchange of goods commodities and services between the different groups of our population. At its worst it means business stagnation and depression. In discussing the fairness of agricultural prices as compared with the prices of the things which farmers have to buy we commonly use the 5-year period of from 1909 to 1914 as a basis of comparison. This is because the relationship between farm prices and other prices during that period is generally considered to have been on a fair and equitable basis. During that period we had a well-balanced economy in this country. Since then, except for the World War period when all prices were high, agricultural prices have been at a disparity with prices of other commodities. Since the 1909 to 1914 period practically everything has gone up excepting farm prices. For a good part of the time in recent years farm prices have been lower and in some cases much lower in dollar value than they were during the 1909 to 1914 period. On the other hand, nearly eevrything the farmer buys has increased in price. Industrial wages have increased tremendously. During the period between 1913 and 1939 hourly wages in the leading manufacturing industries practically trebled. Weekly earnings do not show quite so much difference but in 1939 they were almost 2½ times as much as in 1914. Since the defense program began all wage levels in industry have been further materially increased. That, of course, is bad for the individual farmer, but it is bad as well for all who reside in agricultural communities and States because it means a reduction in buying power felt by all. It is bad from a national standpoint because, as already stated, it prevents that free interchange of goods and commodities which is the foundation of business activity under a capitalistic system. For many years the farmers' share of the national income has been declining. During the period from 1909 to 1914 the farmer received on an average about 15 percent of the national income. In 1925 he received 10 percent. In 1929 he received 8.5 percent. In 1940 he received 5.9 percent plus Government payments which when added give him 6.9 percent. That is bad from the farmers' standpoint, but that isn't all. It means that the relative income in every agricultural State and community has been declining.

Does this mean anything to businessmen in an agricultural State? I think it does, and I think further that it is a situation which demands correction and one which every one of you should be interested in correcting.

There are some, mostly in the consuming sections, who want to treat the agricultural problem as a relief problem. They want to buy farmers' products at the lowest possible price and if this leaves him without an adequate income then they want to treat him as a relief case and give him a dole. Certainly this should be resented and opposed by everyone who has the interests of agriculture at heart. Agriculture does not want relief. It does not want a dole. What it wants is adequate income and fair prices from those who consume its products.

Unless those who live in agricultural areas are willing to fight for the right of the farmer to secure a fair price for his products those sections are permanently doomed to poverty and economic subserviency. Even if it were possible, industrialization would not solve the problem. It would simply complicate it. Let me say again, the greatest contribution which we can make toward a sound and substantial industrial development in Kansas is to put our agriculture on a paying basis.

Why shouldn't Kansas businessmen stand by the State's greatest industry and insist that it receive its proper share of the national income? Will we not gain more for the State and for ourselves and for Kansas industry by doing this rather than chasing the will-of-the-wisp of expanding industrial development alone?

Let us remember also that a stable and prosperous farm population is the hope of this country, that from it have come our great leaders, and that it offers political and social stability such as can come from no other group of our population. Let us support every movement to make agriculture prosperous and to keep those who are engaged in it here in Kansas to furnish the leadership we need for the future. An impoverished agriculture means that our boys and girls will be forced to leave the State to go into more prosperous communities and into other industries. Come what may, nothing except our own neglect can destroy our rich Kansas soil. If we conserve it, it is ours for untold generations to come. Nothing can take away our sunshine, which combined with the fertility of this soil makes Kansas one of the greatest agricultural areas on the face of the globe. The world will always need our wheat and our meat. It should pay a fair price for them. We can well afford as citizens of this great State to make it our business to see that our farmers do not labor in vain, and that those who eat our bread shall pay a price therefor, which will enable those who produce it to prosper on an equal basis with those who make commensurate contributions to the common good in the office and the factory.

Former President Hoover Presents Case Against Participation by United States In European War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, no greater service to the American people has been tendered in many a long day than that performed by the distinguished former President of the United States, Herbert Hoover, in his broadcast of Sunday evening, June 29.

So rapidly have the people been swept along on the flood of war propaganda loosed by the interventionists, there was a great necessity for a clarion call to America to return to clear thinking and sane consideration of circumstances and conditions. This call was issued by Mr. Hoover in his Sunday night broadcast.

No more complete demolition of the fallacious arguments which have been advanced by the war propagandists for our participation in a shooting contest has been wrought by the logic of any speaker in the past several months. Mr. Hoover met fearlessly, calmly, dispassionately, and logically each of the eight favored arguments of the protagonists of war, and with unanswerable logic showed the complete fallacy of each of these eight arguments. The former President then proposed a line of action—rather basic policies upon which should be predicated a line of action—that ought to be and will be the chart for the Republican Party. If the country is fortunate, it will be the chart for the Nation's course as well as for the course of the Republican Party.

It is significant that immediately following this powerful, quiet, and logical discussion by former President Hoover several administration spokesmen broke out with the usual clamor for our immediate participation in the shooting. These spokesmen again did what they have always done in the past, disregarded the logic of the situation, closed their eyes to the real welfare and security of this Nation, brushed aside as of no consequence our woeful lack of a trained and equipped army, and our woeful lack of airships and seacraft adequate for our participation in a shooting war, and blindly demanded as loudly as before that we get into the war. These spokesmen not only ignored without answer the logic of Mr. Hoover, but they simply refused to consider our almost total lack of preparedness to engage in even a one-ocean war, let alone a probable two-ocean conflict.

It is significant that in spite of an unparalleled volume of propaganda, and in spite of the most frenzied efforts of the greatest, most highly financed, most cleverly managed propaganda organization the world ever saw, the American people are still 85 or 90 percent against our participation in a shooting war.

There is no question in the minds of Washington observers but that the Hoover broadcast crystallized and solidified the overwhelming opposition of the American people to our getting into the conflict. The address came at just the right time and in just the right way to meet the renewed onslaughts of those who are determined to get us into a shooting war if possible. Undoubtedly some Member of Congress will insert the Hoover address in the RECORD, and it will stand as a complete answer under all circumstances to those who want to urge our participation in the war.

It is being hinted around Washington that already there have been incidents which would have led to a shooting war if Hitler and Mussolini wanted to risk war with us at this time. Whether or not these reports are true, and whether or not the conflict between the Nazis and Stalin's hordes proves to be bloodier than is expected by American military experts, three propositions cannot be obscured by even the propaganda of the pro-war forces.

The first is that the United States cannot trust Joe Stalin and his ruthless Soviet gang any further than we can trust Hitler and his Nazi gang. The second is that Britain is perfectly ready to make common cause with any sort of government, anywhere, at any time, in order to save herself, so that the high-flown talk of carrying the four freedoms to everybody everywhere in the world is now shown up to be entirely absurd. And, third, that the only course for the people of the United States to follow is to make America strong and keep America strong in a world which, whether the war ends quickly or extends for a much longer period, will be a disorganized world. We will have to depend upon ourselves and no one else, not only for our military but for our economic security.

It was an excellent thing that Mr. Hoover pointed out that whether Hitler subdues Russia or not, the seas will still be just as wide as they were before.

The comment among the Members of Congress has been that former President Hoover presented unanswerable arguments for America keeping out of a shooting war, building up an impregnable defense, and preparing to meet economic and sociological problems after the wars are ended and the defense is built, which will be as dangerous to the future security and welfare of this Nation as the conflicts now raging possibly can be.

Tabulation of War Poll in Twenty-sixth Congressional District of New York

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following tabulation of ballots received up to noon, June 30, from a postal-card poll of my congressional district on the questions, Should the United States stay out of war, or Should the United States enter the war?

Ballots cast in Twenty-sixth New York Congressional District as of June 30, 1941

	The United States should—
	Stay out of war	Enter the war
Orange County:
Arden	6	0
Blooming Grove	25	0
Bullville	39	2
Burnside	1	0
Bellvale	13	0
Central Valley	155	14
Chester	171	20
Circleville	36	9
Campbell Hall	79	3
Cornwall-on-Hudson	138	21
Cuddebackville	32	10
Cornwall	139	23
Florida	112	23
Fair Oaks	13	0
Fort Montgomery	77	4
Goshen	495	59
Greenwood Lake	107	17
Godeffroy	36	0
Harriman	108	7
Highland Mills	156	4
Highland Falls	488	41
Hugenot	46	31
Howells	22	3
Johnson	24	4
Middletown	2,572	260
Millbrook	261	39
Meadowbrook	7	0
Monroe	375	33
Montgomery	273	37
Maybrook	126	5
Mountainville	21	3
Newburgh	3,825	362
New Hampton	51	11
New Milford	10	0
Otisville	145	24
Port Jervis	1,117	109
Pine Island	108	44
Pine Bush	185	4
Rock Tavern	10	0
Ridgebury	12	4
Rio	17	0
Roseton	28	17
Salisbury Mills	29	0
Slate Hill	7	5
Sugar Loaf	13	2
Sterling Forest	6	0
Southfield	42	4
Sparrowbush	62	3
Tuxedo Park	179	44
Thompson Ridge	18	0
Unionville	93	11
Vails Gate	28	0
Walden	684	38
Wallkill	51	5
Warwick	497	86
Washingtonville	132	19
West Point	36	4
Westtown	39	2
Firthcliffe	2	0
Total	13,579	1,470
Dutchess County:
Amenia	76	34
Beacon	1,357	122
Billings	11	0
Barrytown	17	3
Bangall	23	10
Clinton Corners	107	6
Chelsea	13	2
Dover Plains	160	22
Fishkill	108	17
Glenham	44	2
Hyde Park	220	26
Holmes	63	4
Hopewell Junction	209	33
Hughsonville	50	0
Hope Farm	5	4
Millerton	178	43
Madalin	52	12
LaGrangeville	115	8
Pawling	204	35
Pine Plains	173	12
Pleasant Valley	206	15
Poughkeepsie	5,838	618
Poughquag	79	3
Red Hook	354	34
Rhinebeck	450	41
Rhinecliff	80	1
Salt Point	73	6
Staatsburg	116	27
Stanfordville	113	7
Stormville	83	9
Tivoli	25	3
Verbank	30	6
Wappingers Falls	601	57

Ballots cast in Twenty-sixth New York Congressional District as of June 30, 1941—Con.

	The United States should—
	Stay out of war	Enter the war
Dutchess County—Continued.
Wassaic	65	16
Wingdale	113	16
New Hamburg	37	4
Annandale	6	3
State School	5	14
Moore's Mills	1	2
Castle Point	2	0
New Hackensack	5	0
Total	11,467	1,257
Putnam County:
Baldwin Place	4	0
Brewster	414	61
Carmel	238	22
Cold Spring	360	26
Garrison	207	24
Mahopac	228	24
Mahopac Falls	120	3
Nelsonville	60	7
Patterson	117	10
Peekskill	27	15
Putnam Lake	10	1
Tilly Foster	6	0
Manitou	1	0
Towners	4	0
Total	1,796	193
Total (3 counties)	26,842	2,920
Ballots received from points not determined, absentee voters, etc	781	118
Grand total	27,423	3,038

Mr. Speaker, there were 698 not included in the tabulation who qualified their ballots, with the result that they could not be recorded as voting either to keep the United States out of war or for going into the war. Of these, 93 voted to stay out of war if possible, or unless it becomes necessary, and 119 voted to enter the war if necessary to stop Hitler, or if there is no other way to save Britain. Ninety voted to stay out of war unless attacked, or unless Congress declares war, and 54 indicated that they would want the United States to enter the war if attacked, or only if forced to do so. I would favor war, as I have repeatedly stated, if this country is attacked or invaded.

Others in this group qualified their votes for staying out of war and added, "send no A. E. F." or "all aid to England, except men." There were 71 who voted this way, and 39 voted to enter the war if necessary to get supplies to Great Britain, or if our ships are sunk, or with our Navy, but no A. E. F., some even saying that we should give all aid to England except our Army, Navy, and air force, which we are already doing.

In addition, there was a total of 238 persons who returned their ballots without voting one way or another. Of these 86 left it to the Congress to determine, saying they had no opinion or felt their Representative in Congress was better prepared to act for them; 53 stated they had confidence in the President to keep us out of war and would depend on his judgment. The remaining 99 take various positions without voting one way or the other. These ran in tenor from convoys only, 22; awaiting developments, 23; be prepared but do not enter war now, 15; and all material possible, after we have supplied our own needs, 24; to we are already in the war, 16. One who voted for war now facetiously stated, "We should send our boys across the water to save those two dear democracies—the British Empire and Communist Russia."

In addition to the votes above tabulated there were a total of 236 cards and letters that were mailed to me from persons in the district, not on the official ballot form, who stated they had received no postal cards but were registered voters and entitled to cast a vote in the poll. While these could not be included in the final tabulation, they have been counted separately as follows:

The United States should—
Enter the war	17
Stay out of the war	219

There were 166 ballots that were unmarked, or that were spoiled by marking both answers, and 137 persons returned their ballots and refused to vote, criticizing the poll as unfair. Since the close of the poll at noon on June 30 over 500 more postal ballots have been received.

Independent Bankers the Bulwark of American Economy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JESSE P. WOLCOTT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, My colleague, Mr. GORE, of Tennessee, has pending before the House Banking and Currency Committee, a proposal requiring branch banks to publish their individual statements of condition. Any proposal to aid independent bankers and to curb the growth of branch banking, other than provided by State law, meets with my enthusiastic approval and, I am sure, with the approval of a majority of this House.

Credit is the lifeblood of this Republic. To allow any individual, or group of individuals, to control credit is to place in that group's hands the powers which, if abused, could wreck our national economy. In this connection I should like to state that, in my belief, independent bankers constitute one of our strongest bulwarks for the protection of a free economy. Independent banking, then, must be protected by Federal legislation wherever and whenever such aid is required for their continuance.

Independent banking is more to the advantage of the general public than branch banking. I do not believe that statement can be gainsaid. That statement is almost an economic platitude and too obvious for discussion. However, in these days of proposals to expand branch banking it might be well to bear it in mind. Independent banking is synonymous with competitive banking, leading inevitably to consumer benefits, notably in the fields of loans and discounts.

Independent banking is the foundation stone upon which we built this great Nation. Independent bankers, and not branch bankers, are responsible for the great economic, industrial, and agricultural growth of this country in its early days of financial pioneering.

Let us follow the notion of branch banking to its logical conclusion. What would we then have and what would be the effects on our credit and economy? We would have an economic dictatorship and a financial monopoly, distinctly contrary and repugnant to the American way of doing business. We should then have one national bank controlling the resources and the credits of this country. I do not have to point out the dangers inherent in such a trend. For this reason, then, the independent banker, and the industry as a whole, can justify their existence and the role they are playing in our financial set-up. Under a system of free enterprise, such as we witness under independent bankers, our credit control is not vested in the hands of anyone individual or group. Congress, to protect the national social and economic gains we have striven to acquire and maintain, should make every effort to protect the independent banker against unfair and death-dealing inroads of the giant branch-banking industry controlled as it might be from New York or Washington.

There is something personal about an independent banker which is simply impossible for the branch to match. In the first place, the depositor when dealing with an independent banker is dealing with the principal. When dealing with a branch banker he almost invariably is dealing with an agent stripped of powers and lacking authority to make quick, definite decisions. The independent banker, too, clearly is more interested in the welfare of his community and more cognizant of its needs than some far-off principal office where decisions for the branch unit usually are made.

In this connection I should like to point out the splendid achievements of the Independent Bankers' Association of the Twelfth Federal Reserve District. Under the aegis of Mr. R. F. Hollister, prominent Portland, Oreg., attorney, and executive manager of the association, its membership has ever been on the alert to protect its interests and to bring before the public the great need for the development and continuance of independent bankers. I think they have done a good job in bringing their problems before the public which they so ably serve. Mr. Hollister and his group are well thought of in Washington financial circles and they have made every effort to cooperate on all occasions with the Congress in the enactment of Federal legislation involving banks.

Mr. Hollister and his association are a credit to the country and to the independent banking fraternity as a whole. Through their efforts independent banking is thriving and will continue to thrive. Their leadership and integrity have combined to focus national attention on the need for the maintenance of independent banking. So long as we have associations like this, plus militant leadership, the evils of branch banking will be curbed. Without independent banking in this country we should be led inevitably down the road of economic dictatorship and chaos. Independent bankers constitute one of our strongest bulwarks against the possibility of a crack-up of a democratic economy.

Situation and Outlook for the Lemon Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED J. ELLIOTT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

REPORT FROM THE UNVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. ELLIOTT of California. Mr. Speaker, at the time of my remarks concerning farmers and labor, I referred to a report from the University of California College of Agriculture, which concerned the lemon industry.

Under leave extended me, the report is as follows:

SITUATION AND OUTLOOK FOR THE LEMON INDUSTRY

This report presents in brief form the situation and outlook for the lemon industry. Emphasis is on grower costs and returns and the effect of anticipated production on these items.

Data upon which this study is based are from official reports of the United States Department of Agriculture and records of the California Citrus League and the California Fruit Growers Exchange. Some calculations are based upon studies previously made by the university.

SITUATION IN 1938–39

The latest year for which costs of production and handling lemons are available is 1938–39. Table 1 is based upon that year's cost, production, utilization, and prices.

TABLE 1.—Production, prices, returns, and costs of lemons for the crop year 1938–39

CALIFORNIA—EIGHT DISTRICTS

Yield per acre (48-lb. field boxes)	475.6
Yield per acre (78-lb. packed boxes)	293.0
Fresh lemons packed out (packed box equivalent)	193.8
Percent pack out	66.2
F. o. b. price (packed and loose basis packed box equivalent)	$2.89
Costs for picking, hauling, packing, selling, and advertising (packed and loose fruit on packed box equivalent)	$1.33
On tree return for fresh fruit (packed box basis)	$1.56
Return on product lemons basis packed box weight	$0.57
Costs for picking, hauling, and handling of product lemons basis packed box weight	$0.51
On tree returns for product lemons basis packed box	$0.06
On tree returns all fruit basis packed box weight	$1.05
Total return per acre	$307.00
Cost of production, per acre, to harvest	$300.00
Net profit or loss per acre	+$7.00

The yield per acre shown in table 1 is the average for 387 orchards reporting costs. This yield is considerably above the average for all bearing orchards in the State, which in 1938–39 was 216 boxes packed equivalent. In general, lower-yielding orchards have somewhat lower per acre costs, but they have higher costs per box.

Charges applied against fresh and product lemons for 1938–39 season are averages for all districts in the State, as reported by 43 lemon-packing houses, over one-half of the total number in the State. Selling and advertising costs are California Fruit Growers Exchange charges. All costs applying to fresh fruit have been weighted so as to represent both packed and loose lemons shipped into fresh-fruit markets.

TABLE 2.—Harvesting, packing, and selling costs for lemons

	Fresh fruit		Product fruit (packed box equivalent)
	Packed	Loose equivalent packed
Picking	$0.3229	$0.3228	$0.3000
Hauling	.0469	.0468	.0436
Packing	.8138	.6219	.1655
Selling	.0700	.0700	----------
Advertising	.1000	----------	----------
Total	1.3534	1.0615	.5091

Of the total fresh shipments in 1938–39, 93 percent was sold as packed fruit and 7 percent as loose fruit. The weighted average of the total costs is $1.33 per packed box equivalent.

Total cost of production includes the actual operating outlay for labor, management, materials, taxes, and other cash overhead costs, and a computed interest and depreciation. For a number of years, the California Citrus League has obtained actual expenditures in a large number of lemon orchards, and these records may be used as an indication of current costs. A summary of the cost of production records for the 1938–39 crop year is presented in table 3. In addition to the actual costs shown by the citrus league, a charge for interest at 5 percent on a conservative investment has been included as shown. The investment used is $450 an acre for bare land, $700 an acre for trees, and $150 an acre for other facilities and equipment, making a total investment per acre of $1,300. Bare land value is based upon current earnings from alternative crops. Tree value is based upon current net cost of growing trees. The $150 for other facilities is based upon inventories of necessary pipe lines, heating, and other equipment.

TABLE 3.—Lemon production costs for 1938–39

CALIFORNIA—8 DISTRICTS

Number of records	387
Acres included	8,934
Total yield per acre, field boxes, about 48 pounds	476
Total yield in packed boxes of 78 pounds	293
Cultural labor and material cost per acre	$158.58
Cash overhead cost, taxes, insurance, repairs, etc	$55.33
Depreciation on buildings and equipment	$20.81
Interest on investment at 5 percent (explained above)	$65.00
Total on-tree cost of production per acre	$299.72

A separate summary of the California Citrus League cost records for 26 orchards in the Ventura-Santa Barbara district show a cost, exclusive of interest on investment, of $315 an acre, compared to an average of all districts of $235 an acre. On the basis of current earnings from alternative crops a reasonable value on lemon orchards in this district is $1,500 per acre. Interest at 5 percent on this value would give a total cost of $390 per acre.

On these 26 orchards yield per acre in 1938–39 was 20 boxes, packed equivalent, less than the average for all orchards included in the State-wide citrus league study.

The Ventura-Santa Barbara district normally ships a larger proportion of its lemons during the summer months than the average of all districts. In 1938–39 the average f. o. b. price during the summer months was $0.55 a box higher than during the winter months. But even after allowing for a higher average price on fresh fruit shipments, it appears certain that these 26 orchards had a substantial net loss per acre. The figures show that a somewhat larger percentage of their production was sent to product plants than the average of all districts.

In 1939–40 the Ventura-Santa Barbara district did not benefit significantly from the fact that a larger proportion of its shipments are normally made during the summer months, because in that year prices during the summer months were only 5 cents per box higher than in the winter months.

SITUATION IN 1939–40

Production of lemons in 1939–40 amounted to 11,963,000 boxes, of which 30 percent was sent to product plants. The average f. o. b. price for fresh shipments was $3.02 a box. Assuming that the cost of picking, hauling, packing, selling, and advertising was the same as in 1938–39, the average on-tree price per packed box equivalent for lemons sold as fresh fruit would be $1.69. Returns from byproducts will probably be about the same as in 1938–39, namely, $0.06 per packed box equivalent on the tree. The on-tree price for all fruit in 1939–40, therefore, is around $1.20 per packed box equivalent.

Cost of production data for 1939–40 are not yet available, and consequently no precise figures on actual costs can be given. However, it is believed that the total cultural costs per acre and per box were not greatly different in 1939–40 than in 1938–39. Average yields per acre for the State were approximately the same in both years.

On the basis of the foregoing evidence it seems reasonable to suppose that on the average growers' incomes in 1939–40 were very similar to those of the previous year.

PROSPECTIVE SITUATION FOR 1940–41

From the standpoint of growers' returns, the prospects this season are less favorable than in either of the past 2 seasons.

Using the official February 1 estimate of the 1940–41 crop and the production costs for the 1938–39 season, 2 projections with respect to prices and returns to growers are shown in table 4. Projection I is based upon an average on-tree price for fresh fruit of $1.66 a box packed equivalent and total shipments of 8,100,000 boxes. Projection II is based upon an average on-tree price for fresh fruit of $1.17 a box and total shipments of 8,700,000 boxes. While either of the situations indicated by these 2 projections is possible, it is quite likely that they represent reasonable upper and lower limits of fresh-fruit prices and shipments. It is probable that the actual average returns to growers will be somewhere between the net profit of $20 per acre and the net loss of $58 per acre shown in table 4. If the final outcome should be at the midpoint of these 2 figures, there would be a net loss of $19 per acre.

TABLE 4.—Prospects for 1940–41 lemon season

	Projection I	Projection II
Total production, 1,000 boxes	13,588	13,588
Fresh shipments, 1,000 boxes	8,100	8,700
Percent of crop shipped fresh	60	64
On-tree price, fresh fruit, dollars per box	1.00	.17
On-tree price, product fruit, dollars per box	.06	.06
On-tree price, all fruit, dollars per box	1.02	.77
Yield per acre (cost records) boxes	314	314
Gross returns per acre, dollars	320	242
Cost per acre, dollars	300	300
Profit or loss per acre, dollars	+20	−58

Discussion of the prospects this season must of necessity be based upon certain assumptions. Four assumptions are employed throughout this appraisal, namely: (1) That the money incomes of consumers in this country in 1940–41 will average 6 points higher than in 1939–40; (2) that temperature during the summer months of 1941 will be normal; (3) that exports of lemons to Europe will be negligible; and (4) that production costs per acre will be the same as in 1938–39.

The index of nonagricultural income payments in the United States in 1939–40 averaged 97.3 as against an average of 91.6 in 1938–39, an increase of 5.7 points. In November 1940 the index stood at 101.5 as compared with 95.9 a year earlier, an increase of 5.6 points. According to the United States Bureau of Agricultural Economics, a continued but more gradual improvement in the conditions affecting the domestic demand for farm products is in prospect during 1941.[1] It would appear, therefore, that an allowance of a 6-point rise in consumers' incomes in 1940–41 over 1939–40 is ample.

Summer temperatures vary considerably from year to year and there is no way to determine what they will actually be in 1941. The most reasonable assumption to make is that they will be about normal. During the summer of 1940 daily maximum temperatures in 14 cities of the United States were about normal, being just three-tenths of a degree above the long-time average.

Cultural costs per acre in 1940–41 are assumed to be the same as the average for all districts as calculated by the California Citrus League for the 1938–39 season. As already mentioned, the average cost per acre for all districts was substantially below that on the 26 orchards in the Ventura-Santa Barbara district. Costs in 1940–41 are not likely to be lower than in 1938–39 and may be somewhat higher.

In addition to consumers' incomes and summer temperatures, the average price at which lemons are sold will influence the volume of lemons which can be moved into consumption. Two assumptions with respect to the average price for 1940–41 are made: (1) That it will be the maximum permitted under the proposed Federal marketing agreement, namely, $1.66; and (2) that it will be the same as that obtained during the first 4 months of this season, namely, $1.17.

The results secured from a statistical analysis covering the years 1921–22 to 1938–39 indicate a domestic movement of lemons in 1940–41 of around 7,600,000 boxes, at a price for fruit on the tree of $1.66 a box, an index of nonagricultural income of 103.3, and normal summer temperatures. This volume, if realized, would be 3.6 percent larger than the record movement of 1939–40.

If the European markets for our lemons remain closed as now seems probable, total exports in 1940–41 are not likely to exceed 500,000 boxes. This figure added to the calculated domestic movement of 7,600,000 boxes would give a total movement in 1940–41 of 8,100,000 boxes. On this basis, 60 percent of the estimated crop of 13,588,000 boxes would be shipped for fresh consumption and 40 percent would go to products. With a price of $1.66 per box for fresh shipment and $0.06 per box for byproducts fruit, the average on-tree price for all fruit would be $1.02 per box.

The average f. o. b. price obtained for lemons sold from November 1, 1940, to February 22, 1941, was $2.50 a box. Deducting the 1938–39 cost of picking, hauling, packing, selling, and advertising of $1.33[2] leaves $1.17 a packed-box equivalent for fruit on the tree. Sales of lemons by the California Fruit Growers Exchange from November 1, 1940, to February 22, 1941, have been 11 percent larger than during the same period of 1939–40.

Despite higher incomes of consumers, large advertising expenditures, and a widespread influenza epidemic, this increase in sales has been possible only at a material reduction in prices. F. o. b. prices to February 22 this season have averaged 25 percent below those of the corresponding period last season.

On the assumption that the total movement, domestic and export combined, for the entire crop-marketing season of 1940–41 will be 11 percent larger than in 1939–40, the volume shipped as fresh fruit would amount to 8,700,000 boxes.

Instead of assuming that the average f. o. b. price for the entire season will be 25 percent below the 1939–40 average of $3.02 a box (which would be $2.27 a box), we shall assume an average f. o. b. price of $2.50 a box, and its equivalent on-tree price of $1.17 a box. A movement of 8,700,000 boxes at an average f. o. b. price of $2.50 a box may be large if consumers' incomes and summer temperature are no higher than those assumed. The results of the statistical analysis mentioned previously indicate a total movement under the conditions specified of only 8,400,000 boxes. With shipments of 8,700,000 boxes the proportion of the total crop moved as fresh fruit would be 64 percent, and the proportion sent to product plants would be 36 percent. With on-tree prices of $1.17 a box for fresh shipment and $0.06 a box for byproducts the average on-tree price for the entire crop would be $0.77 a box.

Unless some coordinated program of shipment regulation such as that envisaged in the proposed Federal marketing agreement is operated in 1940–41, there is, of course, no assurance that the average price can be maintained as high as that secured thus far this season. The volume of lemons available for shipment is far in excess of the quantity that can be moved as fresh fruit even at prices much below the current level. Without some form of industry control, the pressure of packing houses acting individually to ship all of their lemons as long as they bring anything above handling costs would tend to force the general level of prices in eastern markets close to the cost of getting the fruit from the tree to those markets.

If the proposed Federal marketing agreement is approved by growers and put into effect, it seems reasonable to suppose that an effort will be made to raise prices above the current level. While an increase in price would tend to restrict consumption somewhat and thereby increase the percentage of the crop diverted to product plants, it would nevertheless tend to raise total returns to growers.

Unless summer temperatures in 1941 are above normal, it may be questioned whether the maximum price permitted under the proposed Federal marketing agreement can be secured. Lemon shipments last season were regulated under a voluntary marketing agreement of the California Fruit Growers Exchange, and the average on-tree price for the 6 months May through October when summer temperatures were approximately normal, was $1.71 per packed box equivalent. In view of the low prices received thus far this season—$1.17 on the tree—it is evident that the price for the remainder of the season and particularly during the summer months when shipments are normally heaviest must exceed those of last year in order to provide an average on-tree price of $1.66 a box for the entire season.[3]

LONG-RUN OUTLOOK

The trend of lemon production in California is sharply upward, and for some years to come returns to growers are likely to be distressingly low.

During the 5 years 1934–35 to 1938–39, production averaged 9,316,000 boxes a year, 30 percent larger than the average of the previous 5 years. In 1938–39 production amounted to 11,106,000 boxes, in 1939–40 to 11,963,000 boxes, while the 1940–41 crop is now estimated by the United States Department of Agriculture at 13,588,000 boxes, 90 percent larger than the 5-year average ending 1933–34 and 46 percent larger than the 5-year average ending 1938–39.

Consumption of lemons in the United States has failed to keep pace with the increase in domestic production. Annual average consumption of lemons in this country was less than 1,000,000 boxes larger during the 5 years 1934–35 to 1938–39 than during the 5 years 1924–25 to 1928–29, whereas annual average production was nearly 3,000,000 boxes larger. On a per-capita basis consumption of lemons in the United States remained virtually stationary from 1920–21 to 1933–34 at around 3.7 pounds per person. Since 1933–34 per-capita consumption has averaged somewhat higher, approximately 4 pounds.

During the past two seasons, average f. o. b. prices received for lemons shipped as fresh fruit have been relatively low, $2.89 a box in 1938–39 and $3.02 a box in 1939–40, as against an average of $3.66 a box for the 5 years 1933–34 to 1937–38 and an average of $4.18 a box for the 5 years 1928–29 to 1932–33.[4]

Even to maintain the relatively low prices of the past 2 years, it was necessary, despite rising consumers' incomes, to divert large quantities of merchantable lemons to the product plants. In both 1938–39 and 1939–40, 30 percent of the total lemon production of the State was unable to find a market as fresh fruit.

In the coming years, crops of from 13 to 15 million boxes are likely to be the rule rather than the exception, unless low returns to growers lead to widespread neglect of orchards. As of 1939, the latest year for which data are available, less than one-half of the [1] U. S. Department of Agriculture Bureau of Agricultural Economics. Demand and Price Situation, February 1941.

[2] The advertising assessment of the California Fruit Growers Exchange in 1940–41 is 2 cents a box higher than in 1938–39. Hence an on-tree price of $1.15 instead of $1.17 may be more accurate.

[3] Normally 36 percent of the lemons are shipped during the 6 months November–April and 64 percent during the 6 months May–October. If on-tree prices during the remainder of the winter months average the same as from November 1, 1940, to February 22, 1941—namely, $1.17 a box—and if 36 percent of the annual shipments are made during the winter months, then the average on-tree price for the summer months would have to be $1.94 a box, or 23 cents a box higher than last summer, in order to bring the seasonal average price up to $1.66 a box.

[4] F. o. b. prices are for both packed and loose fresh fruit. Loose fruit has been converted to a packed box basis.

69,300 acres of lemons in the State was in full production, while one-fifth of the total acreage was of nonbearing age (table 5).

TABLE 5.—Acreage of lemons in California in 1939, by age groups

Age of trees in years	Acres	Percent
Under 6	14,403	20.3
6 to 10	18,325	26.4
11 to 15	4,593	6.6
16 and over	32,345	46.7
Total	69,306	100.0

As the nonbearing acreage begins to produce and as the young bearing trees increase in yield, a further marked rise in the trend of lemon production is expected.

In the past, two factors have assisted materially in relieving the pressure of increased California shipments upon the domestic markets, namely, reduction of imports and increased population. But during the coming years they will have less influence. There have been no imports during the past 2 years, and population growth is slowing down. In the future, any substantial increase in the market for fresh lemons in this country will have to come from increased per capita consumption. While it is anticipated that per capita consumption will improve, the increase, judging from past experience, will probably be slow and will not likely keep pace with the upward trend in production.

There is no assurance that prices of lemons would respond to even a strong inflationary movement in this country. During the first World War, lemon prices failed to rise along with prices of nearly all other commodities. From 1916–17 to 1919–20, f. c. b. prices of lemons averaged almost the same as during the 5 years 1909–10 to 1913–14, whereas the index of wholesale prices of all commodities was almost twice as high.

As long as the European war continues, our exports of lemons are likely to be largely limited to the quantity that Canada will take. Exclusive of Canada, the 1939–40 exports of lemons from the United States amounted to 31,000 boxes as against 398,000 boxes in 1938–39 and 371,000 boxes in 1937–38. Even when Europe is again at peace, it may be questioned whether we will be able to ship as large a quantity of lemons across the Atlantic as we did during the 2 years preceding the outbreak of war. In those 2 years Italian and Spanish exports of lemons were short, but even then our lemons had to be sold in European markets at prices considerably below those prevailing in this country.

Against Pegging the Price for Agricultural Commodities

REMARKS

OF

HON. SAM M. RUSSELL

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that Mr. Leon Henderson is contemplating and threatening to peg the price of cotton, cottonseed, and cottonseed products. I do not know what Mr. Henderson's intentions are, but it is clear to me that the publication of his alleged gestures is harmful and detrimental to the farmers at this time.

Not only would such an action be detrimental to the agriculture industry but would be discriminatory in that we have not heard of his threats or desire to peg the price of the commodities the farmer has to buy.

I say to Mr. Henderson that his alleged threatened action is now retarding the price of agricultural commodities when it seems that this is the first time in several years that the farmer stands a fair chance to receive a price for his products commensurate with the price he has to pay for the commodities he has to buy.

I want to suggest to Mr. Henderson, and I believe I speak the sentiments of this Congress, that he should be fair to agriculture, and instead of hindering this basic industry, he should use his position to help it, and in so doing he will be rendering a service in behalf of national defense.

ABILENE, TEX., July 2, 1941.

The Honorable SAM RUSSELL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

Please use your influence in putting stop to Henderson's agitation of ceiling for cotton prices. We farmers are just now in position to market our cotton at near-parity prices in line with present living cost. Have not we sold enough 5-cent cotton to entitle us 20 cents, if possible, without some new authority trying to keep us in poorhouse?

A. C. PRATT.
MORRIS AYLES.
L. M. HINDES.
J. S. EDMUNDSON.
BILL HART.
C. L. BROWN.
J. B. ACTON.
MURRAY COX.

MEMPHIS, TENN., June 30, 1941.

Hon. SAM M. RUSSELL,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

We have just wired Leon Henderson in protest against his action threatening drastic reductions in prices of cotton and cottonseed. We are sure we will have your full and active cooperation in this effort to prevent arbitrary tampering with price structures of agricultural commodities we urge that you make every effort to have this action by Henderson rescinded and that you insist upon some reasonable price-fixing procedure such as suggested in our telegram which follows:

"Representing a united and an organized raw-cotton industry, including every interest from farmer to spinner, we strongly protest recent action in which you undertake to set an arbitrary price ceiling for certain cotton textiles and threaten a price ceiling on cottonseed oil and other agricultural commodities. We recognize that in connection with our national-defense program price fixing may be or become essential to prevent inflation and to protect the consumer public. So long as cotton, cottonseed, and other agricultural commodities are selling under a proper parity with nonagricultural commodities and with wages to labor, we insist that price fixation is unnecessary and inequitable when applied to raw or processed cotton, cottonseed, or other such agricultural products. When and if price fixing becomes essential in this field we insist that proper price levels be determined only upon and after appropriate conferences with representatives of producers, processors, and consumers of cotton and cottonseed and their products, and that price levels be fixed with due regard to the interest of cotton and cottonseed farmers, handlers, processors, and consumers. The action taken by you does not even pretend to protect ultimate consumers against unreasonable and extortionate prices. On the other hand your action definitely means lower prices to cotton and cottonseed farmers, a lower consumption of those agricultural raw materials, and utter absence of protection for the consumer public. Your threat to fix an arbitrary ceiling on cottonseed oil is premature, has already resulted in drastic decline in prices, and if put into effect will mean continued low prices for cottonseed. We ask and urge that your action with respect to cotton textiles be rescinded and that you withdraw threat you have hung over the cottonseed producer. If in the judgment of the administration it is essential that we resort to price fixing, we repeat the demand that the entire subject matter be referred to an appropriate, representative, and qualified commission or commissions with authority to fix price ceilings only after appropriate hearings; due notice, and a scientific investigation. We further insist that price fixation be upon a basis that will insure at least parity prices to farmers, appropriate and equitable returns to both industry and labor, and protection of the consumer public against extortionate prices for finished products."

NATIONAL COTTON COUNCIL OF AMERICA,
By OSCAR JOHNSTON, President.

Memorial Day Services at Chatham Square Cemetery, New York

REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, on Memorial Day of this year I had occasion to address a distinguished gathering at the Old Chatham Cemetery in the city of New York, one of the oldest burial grounds in this part of the country, which contains the graves of the first Jews who came to the United States. Many Jewish soldiers and patriots of the Revolutionary War are buried there.

From the rabbi of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, Dr. D. de Sola Pool, I have obtained a list of the Jewish soldiers and patriots who are buried in this cemetery. This list is as follows:

JEWISH SOLDIERS AND PATRIOTS OF THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR BURIED IN THE CHATHAM SQUARE CEMETERY

Solomon Myers Cohen, 1745–96: Merchant; born in 1745, son of Abraham Cohen: private in Capt. Isaac Austin's Fifth Battalion, Upper Delaware Ward, Pennsylvania Militia; also private in Capt. Andrew Geyer's Company, in Col. William Will's Third Battalion, Pennsylvania Militia. Died February 15, 1796.

Jacob Hart, 1746–1822: A learned merchant; born in Germany in 1746, son of Jacob Hart, a mason. In 1781 advanced money to General Lafayette to clothe and feed his troops; thanked by the Nation through the Continental Congress May 24, 1781. Died May 18, 1822.

David Hays, 1732–1812: Merchant; born in New Rochelle, N. Y., in March 1732, son of Jacob Hays. His house and store were destroyed by Tories while he was away in Long Island with Colonial troops. He also served in the New York Militia at Braddock's Field in the French and Indian War. Died at Mount Pleasant, N. Y., October 18, 1812.

Benjamin Jacobs, 1737–1811: Merchant; born in Curacao, West Indies, in 1737, son of Jacob Jacobs. Signer of bills of credit for Continental Congress. Died in New York City December 15, 1811. (Was a member of the Continental Congress in 1776.)

Eleazar Levy, merchant: Son of Moses Isaac Levy. Private, Capt. Samuel McLean's Company. First Battalion, Pennsylvania Militia. Had an extensive interest in 1,800 acres of land at West Point, and was never compensated by the Government for the ruin that was brought to him by the conversion of West Point into a military fort. Died February 12, 1811.

Hayman Levy, 1721–89. Born in Hanover, Germany, January 25, 1721, son of Moses Isaac Levy, merchant. Vigorous, effective public-spirited man of rare integrity, trusted absolutely by Indians and white men alike. Private in Capt. Adam Foulk's Company, Fourth Battalion, Pennsylvania Militia. Signer of Non-Importation Resolutions of 1770. Died in New York City August 20, 1789.

Isaac Moses, 1742–1818. Born in Germany, son of Moses David. Private in Capt. Andrew Burkhard's Company, in Col. William Will's Third Battalion, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania Militia. Owned and outfitted privateers for preying on British shipping; advanced to the United States $20,000 in specie in exchange for Continental dollars to finance the Canada expedition, for which he was thanked by John Hancock; pledged pounds in 1780 toward forming the bank in Philadelphia to create credit for purchasing food and clothing for the American soldiers. Benjamin Franklin called him "My friend of austere culture and true knowledge." The first president of the reorganized Philadelphia community. One of the founders of the Bank of New York. Died April 16, 1818.

Myer Myers, 1723–95: Son of Solomon Myers; silversmith. Contributed lead for making bullets. Died in New York City in 1795.

Simon Nathan, 1746–1822: Born in Frome, England; son of Judah Nathan; merchant. Private in Capt. Andrew Geyer's Third Company, Col. William Will's Fourth Battalion, Philadelphia, Pa., Militia. At the risk of his life supplied the United States with canvas and powder; was thanked by Jefferson and the Council of Virginia for his substantial advance to the State; voluntarily provided $300,000 (Continental) for clothing for the soldiers at Fort Pitt, which he was repaid only in ruinously depreciated currency; his advances to the State of Virginia amounted to £320,000. Brother-in-law of Gershom Mendes Seixas. A Mason. A founder and president of Philadelphia congregation. Died September 8, 1822.

Manuel Noah, 1755–1822: Merchant. Born in Mannheim, Germany, in 1775. Son of Noah. Private in Capt. Thomas Willis' Seventh Company, Lt. Col. John Shee's First Battalion, Philadelphia, Pa., Militia. Gave $20,000 for the support of the American Army. Died in New York City January 22, 1822.

Jonas Phillips, 1736–1803: Merchant. Born in Busick, Giessen, near Frankfort, Germany. Son of Aaron Uriah Phillips. Private in Capt. John Linton's Company, Col. William Bradford's Battalion, Philadelphia, Pa., Militia. Signer of nonimportation resolutions of 1770. Died in Philadelphia, Pa., January 29, 1803.

Benjamin Mendes Seixas, 1748–1817: Merchant. Born in New York City, N. Y., on January 28, 1748, son of Isaac Mendes Seixas. Third lieutenant in Fusiliers Company, First Battalion, New York Militia. Signer of the nonimportation agreement. One of the founders of the New York Stock Exchange. Died August 16, 1817.

Gershom Mendes Seixas, 1745–1816: Minister of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue. Born in New York City, N. Y., on January 14, 1745, son of Isaac Mendes Seixas. Preached the American cause in the Revolution; closed the synagogue and removed the holy scrolls to Stratford, Conn., when the British occupied New York City; was one of the clergymen present at Washington's inauguration in 1789; an incorporator of Columbia College and for nearly one-third of a century a trustee of the college. Died in New York City July 2, 1816.

Solomon Simson, 1738–1801: Merchant. Born in New York City, N. Y., son of Joseph Simson. A Mason. Vice president of the Democratic Society of the city. Supplied cannons to New York Colonial troops; contributed lead for making bullets. Died at Yonkers, N. Y., January 17, 1801.

Mr. Speaker, on that occasion an address was delivered by Sol Masch, department commander of the Jewish War Veterans of the United States, which I should like to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

TEXT OF SPEECH DELIVERED AT MEMORIAL SERVICES OF THE DEPARTMENT OF NEW YORK OF THE JEWISH WAR VETERANS OF THE UNITED STATES BY SOL MASCH, DEPARTMENT COMMANDER, AT THE CEMETERY OF THE CONGREGATION SHEARITH ISRAEL, NEW BOWERY AND CHATHAM SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY

We are gathered here at these hallowed graves of American Jews who served in the Revolutionary War to pay our tribute to our comrades who have made the supreme sacrifice for American ideals.

Whenever the call has come Americans of every race and creed have marched forth and have gladly laid down their lives upon the field of battle because they have been imbued with a love of those principles from which this great Nation has sprung.

Americans of the Jewish faith may well be proud of their contribution to the armed forces of this country in time of war. They have fought in all the wars of the Republic with honor, valor, and distinction.

In the Revolutionary War, although Jews formed but a mere handful of the population of the country, they served on the staff of Gen. George Washington in positions of trust and command, as well as privates in the Continental Army, and they take their place among those immortal patriots and heroes who fought and bled in order that this Nation might be born.

Eagerly they participated with their fellow colonials in combatting British oppression. Many Jewish merchants signed the non-importation acts of 1765 and 1770. When the call to arms was made an aged Jew, Gomez by name, was told that he was too old to enlist. He replied, "I can stop a bullet as well as a younger man." Col. Isaac Franks, of Philadelphia was aide-de-camp to Gen. George Washington. Col. Solomon Bush of the Pennsylvania militia, after being wounded and captured was thanked by the Colonial Board of War for his services. Major Lewis Bush was mortally wounded at the Battle of the Brandywine. Manual M. Noah, besides contributing $20,000 toward the support of the Continental Armies, served on the staffs of Generals Washington and Marion. Benjamin Nones, a French Jew, was inspired by the same lofty ideals and sentiments which impelled Lafayette to offer his services to the Colonies. He enlisted as a private under Pulaski, and rose to the rank of major under Baron De Kalb.

Well do I recall my history book during my school days which contained a picture of General De Kalb being carried mortally wounded from the field at the Battle of Camden, S. C., by three American officers. Everyone of those American officers were Jews. They were Major Nones, Captains de la Motta and Jacob deLeon. And what authentic history of the period can overlook or forget Haim Solomon who came to the rescue of the Continental Congress in the darkest days of the war, and who gave every cent of a large fortune to maintain and equip the armies which were fighting for our independence.

In the War of 1812, Uriah P. Levy, in command of the brig-of-war Argus, successfully ran the British blockade with our Ambassador to France on board. After sinking 21 ships he was finally captured in the British Channel. His services extended beyond the War of 1812, and he died in the year 1862, after having achieved the highest rank in the Navy at that time, the rank of Commodore. To his everlasting credit let it be recorded that it was through his efforts that the lash as a means of punishment was abolished in the American Navy.

Jews were represented in the War with Mexico, and Gen. David deLeon was twice publicly thanked by Congress for gallantry in action and ability.

In the Civil War 10,000 Jews served with honor and distinction in both the Northern and Southern Armies. Entire family contingents enlisted, and I give you these Jewish names: The 6 Cohen brothers of North Carolina, the 5 Jonas brothers of Mississippi, the 5 Moses brothers of South Carolina, the 4 Moses brothers of Georgia, the 5 Wank brothers of New York, and Ferdinand Levy and his 3 sons of New York. For the Confederacy Judah P. Benjamin was Secretary of War, David deLeon was Surgeon General, L. M. Harby was Commodore of the Navy, and A. C. Meyers was Quartermaster General. In the Northern armies Frederick Kneffler was a major general and Leopold Blumenberg and Philip Jacchison were brigadier generals. Leopold C. Newman was handed his commission as a brigadier general by President Lincoln as he lay dying of wounds received at the Battle of Chancellorsville. Captains J. B. Greenhut, Mayer Frank, and Edwin Wertheimer were repeatedly mentioned in dispatches for bravery under fire. Leopold Karpeles, Abraham Cohen, and Benjamin B. Levy were 3 of 7 Jews who received the Congressional Medal of Honor for continuous acts of bravery during the Civil War. Perhaps one of the most outstanding acts of heroism during the entire war was performed by Lt. Max Sachs, who single-handed and alone held off an entire Texan company while he endeavored to rally his own men. Captain Ullman, of the Pennsylvania Cavalry, who fought through the entire war, met his death with General Custer when he and his brave band of troops were massacred and wiped out by the Sioux Indians in Custer's Last Fight.

In the Spanish-American War many thousands of Jews answered the call of President William McKinley. Fifteen Jews went down with the Maine. The first enemy standard lowered in the Philippines was captured by Sgt. Morris Cohen. Jacob Wilensky, a mere lad of 16, was killed in the very first charge of the Rough Riders. The first American soldier to fall at the Battle of Manila was a Jew—Sgt. Maurice Joost.

In the World War a phalanx of 250,000 American Jews served in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. Although forming but 3 percent of the total population they furnished between 4 and 5 percent of the armed forces of their country; 10,000 held commissioned rank, no less than 1,100 received citations for valor, and the rare Congressional Medal of Honor was won by 6. The Jewish wounded numbered 12,000, and 3,500 made the supreme sacrifice.

How did these thousands of Jews in the American forces measure up as soldiers, as comrades, and as men? The volume of evidence as to the high quality of Jewish courage, loyalty, and devotion on the battlefield is most impressive. No men were better qualified to speak of Jewish heroism than those American non-Jews who fought side by side with Jews, commanded them as officers, stayed with them in the trenches, shared with them the miseries of war, and rejoiced with them in the glories of victory.

General Pershing, the A. E. F. commander in chief, said that "When the time came to serve their country under arms, no class of people served with more patriotism or with higher motives than the young Jews who volunteered or were drafted and who went overseas with our other young Americans. I well remembered in my inspections of New York divisions seeing so many patriotic, well-disciplined, well-behaved young Jewish soldiers, whose commanders spoke of them in the highest terms."

Lt. Col. Douglas Campbell declared that "The Jewish boys of the Seventy-seventh Division were the best soldiers on earth. They participated in the greatest battles and emerged sound. The Seventy-seventh Division, of which 40 percent were Jewish young men, was the only American division to reach the Aisne, after having penetrated farther into the German lines than any other division." Maj. Gen. Clarence R. Edwards, of the Twenty-sixth Division, said "The Jews made an enviable record. I remember instances where formerly intolerant Gentiles asked that Jews be made officers, in order that they might be made leaders." Captain Harrigan, of the famous Three Hundred and Seventh Infantry, declared "Too much cannot be said for the boys who went across from the East Side. They stood out for conspicuous bravery and utter disregard for self when they went up against the Germans in France."

Time does not permit a detailing of the heroism of all who were decorated, but the gallantry of a few should be recalled.

The six Jewish men who won the Congressional Medal of Honor were Sgt. Sydney G. Gumpertz, of the One Hundred and Thirty-second Infantry, Thirty-second Division; Gunnery Sgt. Charles F. Hoffman, of the Fifth Regiment, United States Marine Corps; Sgt. Philip C. Katz, of the Three Hundred and Sixty-third Infantry, Ninety-first Division; Sgt. Benjamin Kaufman, of the Three Hundred and Eighth Infantry, Seventy-seventh Division; Corpl. Samuel Sampler, of the One Hundred and Forty-second Infantry, Thirty-sixth Division; and Sgt. William Sawelson, of the Three Hundred and Twelfth Infantry, Seventy-eighth Division, who was killed while performing the act for which he was posthumously decorated.

One of the brightest pages in the entire war was that written by the Lost Battalion, of which 40 percent were Jewish men. Cut off from the main body of troops, they were under fire from their own as well as the enemy's artillery. With ammunition and supplies running low, one messenger after another was sent in an effort to get through the lines to carry word of their predicament. Finally it was a little Jewish tailor from the Bronx named Abraham Krotoshinsky who got through and succeeded in getting word to the American headquarters of the plight of the Lost Battalion.

At these memorial services we pay our tribute to our honored dead—and to all of those who have lived and died for democracy. We of the Jewish faith who have fought before stand ready and willing once more to make any sacrifice which may be demanded by our country in the present emergency.

Mr. Speaker, while the gathering at the Chatham Square Cemetery was primarily in the nature of paying tribute to the Jewish veterans of the Revolutionary War, the Revolutionary War is not the only war in which Jewish soldiers participated, nor are the patriots, whose graves adorn this cemetery, the only Jewish soldiers or sailors of the Revolutionary War.

In addition to those whose names were just read, there were many who participated with the rest of the colonial Americans in fighting against British oppression and for the independence of the United States.

Many Jewish merchants signed the Non-Importation Acts of 1765 and 1770, which were such an effective boycott of British goods, and helped to create an all-American merchant marine.

One of the aides-de-camp to Gen. George Washington was Col. Isaac Frank, of Philadelphia. Another prominent member of the Pennsylvania Militia was Col. Solomon Bush, and his cousin, Maj. Lewis Bush, was mortally wounded in the Battle of Brandywine; nor can we forget the contribution of Haym Salomon, whose skillful financing of the Revolutionary War was responsible for its success. It was Major Noah who at one time acted as American consul to Tripoli, and who contributed $20,000 toward the support of the Continental Armies, and himself served on the staff of General Washington; and there are many others whose names are legion who did their share for the success of our aims and the establishment of the American independence.

The Jewish race can well be proud of its record of patriotism. While I do not think that any American citizen should be singled out for his patriotism, and all of us are willing to share in the blessings of liberty and at the same time perform our duties as American citizens of the United States, in these days when there is so much confusion, and when many people take it upon themselves to criticize certain racial groups in this country, I take more than ordinary pride in showing to Congress this official record of Jewish patriotism and devotion to American principles.

All of us who love America, all of us who believe in fair play, and all of us who place the interest of our country above the interest of any class or group rejoice in the spirit of devotion manifested by all sections of our population, and pledge ourselves forever to keep the torch of liberty alive.

Should the time come for the supreme sacrifice which any human being can give, I am sure that there will be no one here who will not echo the sentiment which Nathan Hale, the great American patriot, uttered back in 1776:

I regret that I have but one life to give for my country.

The Bible—Our Bulwark

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

ROUND-TABLE BROADCAST OVER WWDC

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following Bible round-table broadcast over WWDC Monday, June 23, 1941, entitled "The Bible—Our American Bulwark." The speakers were the Honorable JOSEPH R. BRYSON, of South Carolina; the Honorable A. LEONARD ALLEN, of Louisiana; the Honorable GEORGE H. MAHON, of Texas; and the Honorable LUTHER PATRICK, of Alabama:

The announcer, Mr. WILL GOFF. Presenting the Bible round table, a regular feature heard over this station each Monday evening. This program is under the direction of Evangelist Dale Crowley, who will at this time announce the theme of the evening, and also the participating members of tonight's round table. Mr. Crowley.

Evangelist CROWLEY. Thank you, Will Goff, and good evening, friends. Many of you are familiar with the plan of our Bible round table. From week to week we call together the various groups from the churches to discuss Bible subjects in round-table fashion. From time to time we have groups of ministers, of laymen, and of Christian young people who give their own views on Bible topics of general interest.

Tonight we have a most unusual group, and I think you will regard it, as all of the Washington newspapers have, an extraordinary feature. Seated around this microphone are four Members of the United States Congress—the Honorable JOSEPH R. BRYSON, of South Carolina; the Honorable A. LEONARD ALLEN, of Louisiana; the Honorable GEORGE H. MAHON, of Texas; and the Honorable LUTHER PATRICK, of Alabama. These men are outstanding Christian laymen, not merely because they are Members of Congress, but in their own home communities they have been for many years recognized as faithful laymen in the churches of which they are members. The subject chosen for the discussion tonight is The Bible—The Bulwark of America. And now I know that you are as anxious as I am to hear what they are going to say. Suppose we start with the gentleman first on my right, Congressman BRYSON. You won't mind opening the discussion, will you, Congressman BRYSON?

Representative BRYSON. Before the time of Christ the Jews relied upon the Old Testament as the codification of their laws. The sacred writings were oracles of God. Of course, there were predictions in the Old Testament of the coming of a Messiah. The New Testament is an authentic record of the sayings and teachings of Jesus Christ.

Representative ALLEN. If one looks on the surface alone he might be prone to accept the view that the Bible today has not the strong hold upon the nations of the world that it once had. All around us we see a trend toward dictatorship with its suppression of Christianity and most other forms of religion. All will agree that the Bible is not having much influence on Hitler, Stalin, and Mussolini, and they are now the heads of three great nations.

But this question should be viewed in its broader aspect. We should consider what may be called the indirect influence of the Bible on the nations of the world. I do not believe anybody would question the fact that the Bible still wields a tremendous influence over the people of the United States, over Canada, the British Isles and possessions, and over South America, as well as other nations. Up to this moment, these nations are free nations. The spirit of liberty which dwells in them is bound to be an inspiration to the subjugated peoples of other nations. If these subjugated people are liberated, it will be done as the result of the influence of the Bible operating directly and indirectly through the free nations of the world. So, while we may freely admit that in this tragic hour the situation is dark, I believe there is enough power in the world emanating from Holy Writ to finally assist this crazy world in righting itself. The same Omnipotent Power that led the peoples of old through sacrifices, privation, and toil will, in God's own time, again accomplish the same end.

Representative MAHON. What you say, Mr. ALLEN, is very interesting. The Bible has had a long and eventful history, and it seems almost incredible, if we look at the picture from a nonreligious viewpoint, that the Bible, this little, black-bound book, could have such a profound influence on the history of the world. Not long ago I was reading a little poem about the flag. It ran about like this:

"It's only a small bit of bunting,
It's only an old colored rag,
But thousands have died for its honor,
And shed their best blood for the flag."

So it is with the Bible. It is only a small, black-bound book, but it is the hope of the world. It has been the greatest single influence in the history of our Nation. It brought the founding fathers to this country. It has sustained us in every worthy undertaking of the past, and it is our only hope, I think, for the future. It is regrettable that we have written "In God we trust" on our money and have failed, too often, to write it in our hearts. But we must resolve to give the Bible a greater place, a bigger place, the place that it is really entitled to in the hearts of our American citizenry.

Representative PATRICK. Well, Mr. MAHON, of course we never get to where we wish to go in life. Basically we started with that sort of an idea. You know in the basic American documents the teachings of the Bible are in common living. I just got hold of, today, a print of the Mayflower compact, which is the forerunner of more than one, especially the Declaration of Independence, and noticed how that started off: "In the name of God, Amen, we"—and so on—"having undertaken for the glory of God and the advancement of Christian faith and honor of our King and country, a voyage to plant the first colony in the northern part of Virginia, do by these presents solemnly and mutually, in the presence of God and of one another, covenant and combine ourselves together into a civil body politic for better ordering and preservation and furtherance of the ends aforesaid," and so on. It was almost a prayer, that certainly was in keeping with the faith they had in coming over here. That was signed, incidentally, by some men that still live in our literature and minds. There was John Carver, William Bradford, William Brewster, Miles Standish, and John Alden—by the way, their names are right together as signers of the Mayflower compact; they were together for once, anyway. Well, you remember how it started off in the Declaration of Independence itself, "When in the course of human events it becomes necessary," and so on, you know, to which the laws of Nature and Nature's God entitles them—a decent respect for the opinions of mankind requires that they shall declare the causes which impel them to the separation. I think the entire life of America is basically set forward as an ideal in fine shape so far as our life and its connection with the Bible is concerned, and, of course, fundamentally we try to live by and think of that.

Evangelist CROWLEY. Its the inspiration, then, of our Declaration of Independence. Now, I'm thinking about the Bible influencing our Constitution. What would you say about that, Congressman BRYSON?

Representative BRYSON. Well, I believe that Columbus was prompted to seek the discovery of a new world, not from his knowledge of science, but from his reading and interpretation of the Bible. Our colonial forebears had but few books. The Bible in most instances was the only book to be found in the early settlers' homes. It is natural that our founding fathers read the Bible, and when our organic laws were written they were predicated upon the Bible. The Declaration of Independence recognized the Supreme Judge and further recognizes the protection of Divine Providence. It declares all men to be free and equal before law and in the sight of God. Our United States Constitution is the product of the brain of men who believed in a Supreme Being and relied upon God for divine guidance. All through our Constitution the Lord's Day is recognized in providing that certain things may be done at given time except Sundays.

Representative ALLEN. The coming of Christ brought a new day It was hard for humanity to break away from its exclusiveness. It took the Christ to set the example. One day He wanted to make a trip. All the traditions and teachings in Judea forbade intermingling with the despised people of Samaria, but that is exactly what the Master did. He broke down that barrier and tore down the social and religious wall of hate. Equality of man before the law and before God, liberty of thought and action, all so forcefully brought out by the Master, are cardinal principles of democracy. The Bible, therefore, is directly the inspiration for democracy. As the knowledge of and belief in the Bible is received by the people, the spirit of democracy increases. To kill democracy, you must close the Bible. Spiritual liberty will bring political liberty. Paul says, "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty."

I believe it can definitely be said that democracy is the result of Christianity. Democracy can and must look to Christianity for its very existence. In the coming days Christianity and democracy both will be tried.

Now, Mr. MAHON.

Representative MAHON. Well, Mr. Allen, I think you are right in saying that you have got to tie democracy and Christianity together, for democracy is not going to get very far without its tie—without an anchor being provided—and the Bible provides the inspiration; it provides the channel through which men may achieve the thing that we call democracy. A kite won't go very high unless you've got a string tied to the kite to direct it, and democracy won't go very far unless it is directed by the teachings of the Bible. Freedom of conscience is all right, and freedom of speech is fine, but freedom of conscience, if misdirected, and freedom of speech, if misdirected, will not produce a good world; will not produce a world at peace; will not produce liberty, equality, fraternity; will not produce democracy. We've got to link the Bible and its teaching with our living in a personal way—in a national way—if we are going to see the full fruition of what we call freedom of conscience and freedom of speech. Do you agree with me there, Mr. PATRICK?

Representative PATRICK. Oh, yes; of course I agree with you. The first thing we did when we got the Constitution of the United States—our forefathers, when they started out, they probably thought they had something in a pretty complete form, but within a little while they found that it didn't embrace the Bill of Rights. Now, the English had gotten old King John hemmed up in a cow pasture at Runnymede and jarred him loose from a bill of rights. We hadn't even got that out. Well, they started out in the first part of the first amendment:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion."

And Government's entirely two separate kinds of work. One is given to the promotion of our general good by positive action, such as is brought forth by all good and successful humanitarian legislation, becomes a very helpful part of our social life. The other is given to preventives, and prevents certain negative action. One is produced by our just desires and needs; the other is produced by our evil or wrongful acts, or maybe erratic acts. One is blessing and the other a necessary evil. And this that is necessary evil must be watched that it be not overdone. But the first is by very nature a kind and beneficial growth. Yet man is such a creature that he is always drifting into things that bring him to need of discipline. Even in his worship he got to the place that he was tyrannical toward those whose feelings toward worship led them to conclusions different from his. So the Christian religion has been the inspiration of the crusade, with insane wars and losses; and to the purge, with its inquisition, with its rack and its screw and wheel and even hot oil. With this history back of us is it any wonder that its founders decided to found this Nation so that no matter what a man's belief might be, what his love of worship might lead him to, it should be full and free. Who would have dreamed that a people with the culture and the history of the Germans would have fallen back to the practices of brute force and torture and religious intolerance that Germany is practicing today? Mr. BRYSON, would you like to expand on that a little?

Representative BRYSON. Well, yes; there is every evidence that the American citizens, generally, are ready to fight, if needs be, to preserve, protect, and perpetuate to the generations yet unborn freedom of conscience and freedom of speech. We feel that we would rather die on our feet than to live on our knees. Congress, as powerful as it is, is prohibited by the Bill of Rights from enacting any law that would "abridge the freedom of speech, freedom of conscience, or freedom of the press."

Evangelist CROWLEY. Now, I think you gentlemen have very well covered the subject of the influence of the Bible on the nations of the world and also on our own Nation. You know, gentlemen, the Bible has some enemies in the world today. I wonder if you might comment on some of these enemies which are threatening the very vitals of our national life.

Representative ALLEN. Well, the greatest enemy of the Bible that I know of is communism. Karl Marx, the founder of communism, swung from a religionist to the extreme position of a hater of all forms of religion. It was he who said that "religion is the opium of the people." His modern followers have made hatred of religion one of the principles of their philosophy. In Russia they have burned and otherwise destroyed most of the churches, and the few remaining have been converted into picture shows. Bibles have been destroyed and the sale of them forbidden, and every effort has been made to root out the Christian religion.

The philosophy of communism is the very opposite of Christianity. The one teaches hate, the other love; communism teaches that the aim and end of man is service to the state; Christianity, service to God. The one is fatalistic, the other abiding hope. The one looks to the present, the other to the future. Communism destroys the sanctity of marriage, the beauty of the home, and relegates man almost to the level of the beast. It is unquestionably the most dangerous philosophy ever evolved by man. It is worse than the paganism that existed before the Christian era. It looks only to the materialistic side of life. It seeks to satisfy the present. It destroys the philosophy of eternal life. It merits condemnation by all free peoples who have faith in the Bible.

Now, Mr. MAHON, what have you got to say about it?

Representative MAHON. Well, now, Mr. ALLEN, there is a lot of truth in what you are saying here about communism.

Representative PATRICK. What about nazi-ism?

Representative MAHON. Well, I think you can say substantially the same thing about nazi-ism. We were talking here awhile ago about the great influence of the Bible. Communism is bad because it destroys the influence and power in the nation of the Bible; and nazi-ism is bad because it destroys the strength and vigor that the open Bible will give a people. Whenever we destroy freedom of action, as is being done in Nazi Germany and in the conquered countries; and when we destroy the rights, the freedom of speech, and those fundamental, basic rights that we had felt were guaranteed to all the civilized people of this day, we are destroying the influence of the Bible; we are building up, as it were, false gods. We can remember, however, that we don't have to go to communistic Russia or Nazi Germany to find enemies of the Bible. We are all enemies of the Bible to the extent that we do not give it the part that it really ought to have in our lives and in our communities and in our own beloved country. I think, Mr. PATRICK, you share my contempt for communism and my contempt for nazi-ism, and also agree that we fall far short ourselves of what we ought to do.

Representative ALLEN. But let me say right here that communism and nazi-ism are both the biggest organized opposers of the Bible.

Representative MAHON. That's what we are getting at, the big, organized, powerful thing. That is more important than any specific individual.

Representative PATRICK. Well, godliness can organize the same as godlessness, and, so far as that's concerned, there's a wisdom of ignorance, you know. Of course, it's a kind of touchy point for discussion, because, you know, it's difficult for me to say successfully that I am wise and you are foolish. People will immediately abandon such a speaker, anyone advancing such an idea; but the wisdom of ignorance, when it is godlessness, is the cruel destroyer of faith. It's so cruel. It takes away the bread of life and gives nothing in its place, not even a crumb.

If I should take an example, I couldn't think of a better example than the godless leader of the Nazis, of this "new order," Herr Adolf Hitler. The most exalted object of affection for the heart, even for the soul, of man, is the state—that's what he says—the state is the thing; and what insufferable egotism that is in his case. He is a totalitarian dictator; thus he is the state. Now, isn't that something, the author of the major thing in the human life? A lot of comfort a religious soul will get from that source. A lot of spiritual repose to a sinner who desires to repent and turn to the hopeful life. Now this Hitler is my example of that school—a godless state worshiper, egotistic, cruel, ruthless; can't repent, for he is divorced from the grounds upon which one can repent. Hitler—not even married, nothing, no God, no wife, no hell, no heaven—all dressed up with his swastika, and nowhere to go.

Representative ALLEN. You would say, then, that he has committed the unpardonable sin?

Representative PATRICK. Well, give it that interpretation if you like. So far as I am concerned, I don't feel much inclined to pardon him for the way he is carrying on in the world right now.

Representative BRYSON. Because of the anti-American, anti-Bible influence, we are witnessing the breaking down of social standards. We are certainly facing most difficult times, to say nothing of the immediate past. It is now being suggested that America collaborate with socialistic Russia in order to preserve the Christian way of life. Russia, in whose broad lands millions of children have been born and have now reached maturity in a country denying the existence of God, is about to become our ally against the onrushing mechanized forces of Nazi Germany. Had the nations of the earth followed the teachings of the Bible, it is confidently believed that we would not now be facing the difficult days that are ahead of us.

Evangelist CROWLEY. Gentlemen, I think that what you have said about the enemies of the Bible will certainly strike a responsive chord in the hearts of all our listeners, and I would that this broadcast might have reached everybody throughout the Nation. Now, passing from that particular thought, there are certain institutions that we have in America that are honored and revered because of what they stand for, and because of what they have meant to our Nation. Now in these institutions, how can the Bible be made a bulwark? I'd like for you to discuss that in the few minutes that are left. What about it, Mr. Allen, won't you give us some word on that?

Representative ALLEN. The church was established by Christ. Faith in Christ is the very center and foundation of it. Paul spoke of Christ as "the Chief Cornerstone." Paul also said that the church was "in God the Father and in the Lord Jesus Christ." In writing to Timothy, he spoke of "the house of God which is in the church of the living God," and he added the significant testimony that it was "the pillar and the ground of the truth."

We have here the definite statement of Christ as to the divine origin of the church, and the repeated statements of the greatest mortal preacher of all time to the same effect. No one could want more evidence that the church is a divine institution.

Our people recognized the church and accepted the view that it was a divine institution. The church, since the landing of the Pilgrims, has been the center of spiritual truth and power. It has been the great pulsating heart of the Nation. Its streams of mercy, of wisdom, of love have flowed through every artery of the Nation's life, giving hope, strength, and the will to carry on. The church has sent the message of the good news of the Bible into our American life. The Bible is the bulwark of our Nation, but the church has even been the great propagating agent of the eternal truths of the Bible. It is God's divine agent to convey His message to the world.

Now, Mr. MAHON, what about the school?

Representative MAHON. Well, I agree, Mr. ALLEN, with what you say with reference to the church. You know, it has been a delightful experience for me here in Washington to discover that wherever and whenever I go to church, I find a crowd there; I find in many of the churches that it is impossible to get a seat unless you get there early. I am glad that situation exists in the Capital City of my Nation. Now, you are right in saying that the church is important. The school is another important bulwark. Here in Washington the taxpayers pay around $45,000,000 a year, and the biggest item of expenditure is for the schools. About $13,000,000 a year is required to run these schools, but they are worth more than that to the people of this city. The school is essential, it is vital. The school is necessary to democracy. And the school itself has a very definite religious turn, too. My daughter, who goes to the Washington schools, came home several years ago and said to me, "Daddy, I learned a new little poem today." And this is what she said to me:

"Father, we thank Thee for the night,
And for the pleasant morning light;
For rest, and food, and loving care,
And all that makes the world so fair.
Help us to do the things we should,
To be to others kind and good;
In all we do, in work or play,
To grow more loving every day."

I think it is commendable that such a lesson as that is taught in the schools of Washington. The schools of our country must go forward under the influence of Christianity if we are to preserve our democracy—if we are to carry on the great principles to which our country has been dedicated; and I wouldn't say that the church and the school complete the picture. Mr. PATRICK, could you make one other suggestion about important institutions in which the teachings of the Bible must have a place?

Representative PATRICK. Well, let's see, the church, the school, and, you'd say, the home; I know what you have in mind. Well, now, I'll say this: This is about the homeiest discussion I've been in. I've been in a number of these round-table discussions and they always end in a debate, each time before it went off on a hot angle, but here we've all been able to get together, so there must be something homey about it.

Representative MAHON. We are fortunate in the selection of the subject.

Representative PATRICK. You know, the home is the first institution; had you ever thought of that? It's the original, the first, institution that man knew anything about. The Bible was greatly written about the home and the home life. You remove the parts of the Bible that have to do with the home, the home life, or connected with family association, you'll have a mighty small book left. Of course, we get the jitters when a man opens up on the subject of home and mother and old folks because we think he's going to do some demagoging. But we ought to be willing to do anything we can to build up the home life in this country, for, after all, the same is its unit, and the unit determines the structure—the structure of these ramparts we watch; and the Bible is that home book—the bulwark of America; and I'll say that I think the radio is a blessing to America. The home was about to be all broken apart—just a filling station where the young folks run in once in a while. Do you remember the man that faced Judge Ashley and he was asked if he didn't have three daughters at home, and he said, "Well, Judge, I do have three daughters at one place or another, but they are very seldom at home." The radio is giving something by which you may go to your home and get entertainment and really tends toward home life. I think there is a trend in that direction.

Evangelist CROWLEY. Congressman BRYSON, do you have another word? We just have a little bit of time left. I'd like to hear you say one other word.

Representative BRYSON. It was said of the Son of the lowly Nazarene carpenter that "He went about doing good." What a different world we would be living in if it could be said of each of us that, like Christ, we went about doing good.

"So many faiths, so many creeds,
So many paths that wind and wind,
When, after all, what this sad world needs
Is but the art of being kind."

Evangelist CROWLEY. That's a very fitting climax, Congressman BRYSON. Now, ladies and gentlemen, you have been listening to our Bible round table, as our announcer will tell you within a few moments. Heard on this discussion tonight were the Honorable JOSEPH R. BRYSON, of South Carolina; the Honorable A. LEONARD ALLEN, of Louisiana; the Honorable GEORGE H. MAHON, of Texas; and the Honorable LUTHER PATRICK, of Alabama, outstanding Christian laymen from the States and from the communities from which they come. Gentlemen, I want to thank you on behalf of our listening audience for your coming here tonight. You have made a real contribution to our Bible round table, and I thank you from the bottom of my heart, and hope that some day in the future you may be able to come back and be with us again.

FOUR CONGRESSMEN IN CHORUS. Thank you, Mr. Crowley.

Representative MAHON. It did us more good than it will do our audience.

Polls on Use of Convoys and Entrance of United States in European War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KNUTE HILL

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

LETTER AND POST CARD OF HON. KNUTE HILL OF WASHINGTON

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I am including a letter and post card sent to every registered voter in the Fourth Congressional District today, Thursday, July 3, 1941.

From time to time as the ballots are received, I will make a statement on the floor of the House so that not only may the Members thereof know how my constituents stand on these two important issues, but also the constituents themselves be apprised of the attitude of a majority of the voters in the Fourth Congressional District.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington.

DEAR FRIEND: The matter of our entry into the European war is so momentous and so serious that, in my opinion, the American voters, the only sovereigns in the United States, should decide this issue. For several weeks the convoy issue has been discussed daily. The President himself has declared that "convoys mean shooting, and shooting means war."

I have voted for every appropriation for the defense program, sincerely believing that the funds would be used only in the actual defense of the Western Hemisphere I shall do my utmost to prevent an actual invasion of Hitlerism in the Western Hemisphere. In the enclosed referendum the question of entry into war means definitely on foreign soil or in foreign waters. The question as to convoys and the Navy is also definitely in foreign waters.

I have my own convictions in these matters, but I want an honest expression from the fathers and mothers and the taxpayers of the Fourth Congressional District on an issue so vital to their welfare and future security.

Kindly mark your card and return it within 3 days. All that is necessary is to mark and mail the enclosed card. You do not have to sign the ballot; sign only if you wish.

Sincerely yours,

KNUTE HILL,
Member of Congress.

BALLOT

The United States should—

Send convoys or navies abroad------- ☐
Keep convoys or navies at home------ ☐
Enter the war---------- ☐
Stay out of the war---------- ☐

Name ----------

Address ----------

(Signature optional)

Please return this ballot within 8 days of receipt.

KNUTE HILL.

Our Latin American Trade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

ARTICLE FROM CHICAGO DAILY TRIBUNE

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Chicago Daily Tribune of July 1, 1941:

[From the Chicago Daily Tribune of July 1, 1941]

CLAIMS BRITISH SELL MATERIAL UNITED STATES GIVES THEM—WAR AID FINDS WAY TO SOUTH AMERICA

(By William Fulton)

NEW YORK, June 30.—A warning that the United States must not become so absorbed in its rearmament efforts that other countries will bottle up our trade channels with South America was sounded today by James S. Kemper, Chicago insurance man and former president of the United States Chamber of Commerce. He declared the British especially are not letting the war cramp their style.

Arriving on the liner Uruguay after a 7-week visit in South America, Kemper said British firms, unworried by the war at home, were pursuing business vigorously wherever it could be found in this country's neighbor nations to the south.

WAR FEVER PUZZLES NEIGHBORS

"We certainly could take a lesson from the way the British are handling their commercial affairs these days in South America," remarked Kemper. "Their representatives down there are aggressive, keen for business, active in going after old accounts and getting new ones.

"It mystifies South Americans that people from European countries, which are right in the middle of the war, seem less excited about it than the United States. We should not get so wrapped up in this defense program that we lose our trade channels to the south."

Kemper was chairman of the United States Chamber of Commerce delegation to the Conference of American Organizations of Business and Production at Montevideo. All 21 South American republics were represented except Haiti.

PLAN COURT OF ARBITRATION

The conference decided to set up machinery for settling disputes between manufacturers, shippers, and buyers of the various countries through arbitration instead of in the courts.

Most startling of the reports which Kemper heard at the conference sessions and in his tour of the larger cities were:

First, that lend-lease materials given away by this country are filtering back into South America to compete with United States products; and, secondly, that censorship officials, opening the mails at Trinidad, are making American trade secrets available to British commercial agents.

"One representative of a large firm in the United States told me how he had bid for a large project which would take 3 years to complete," said Kemper. "The British came in and said they would do the job in 2 years. This American told me the British could underbid his concern because various materials were accessible to them under the lend-lease bill, but not to him.

FIREBRICK ORDER UNDERMINED

"Another story that came to me first-hand was about the South American concern which was planning an addition to its plant and negotiated with the representative of a United States firm for a shipment of firebrick. The representative sent an air-mail letter to his office, and 3 days later a British salesman was around calling on the South American company with an offer to supply the firebrick at a lower price.

"My friend learned his letter was intercepted at Trinidad and the censors relayed the information to their commercial attachés."

SHIP SHORTAGE HURTS TRADE

South Americans are eager to do business with the United States, Kemper declared, but are showing increasing concern over the transfer of merchant vessels under the United States flag from the trade routes to Government use for the Army or Navy. Cargoes are piling up on the docks for want of bottoms to carry them northward.

A case in point was the ship on which Kemper and his wife made their homeward voyage. Slipping into New York harbor through the sea haze, the Moore-McCormack lines' Uruguay was deep in the water with a cargo of 6,000 tons of hides, wool, manganese, coffee, and other products of South America. In normal times officials of the line said, the Uruguay carried between 2,000 and 3,000 tons of cargo.

Letter From a Soldier

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS ROLPH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

ARTICLE FROM SAN FRANCISCO CALL-BULLETIN

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the San Francisco Call-Bulletin, entitled "Letter From a Soldier."

Mr. Speaker, when anyone is away he looks forward eagerly to receiving news of what is going on among the home folks.

At the present time thousands of young Americans are separated from their family ties and are serving our country in camps and stations at great distances from where they live.

They long for letters.

The idea has been beautifully expressed in an editorial appearing in the San Francisco Call-Bulletin. The article quotes in full a letter from a young recruit and makes a number of excellent suggestions as to how we may all do our part. This article is most appropriate on the day before the Fourth of July.

[From the San Francisco Call-Bulletin of June 23, 1941]

LETTER FROM A SOLDIER—IT'S ADDRESSED TO YOU—SO TAKE PEN IN HAND AND ANSWER PRONTO

We have received the most important letter ever addressed to this newspaper.

We have received letters on national defense, taxes, power problems, relief, and other weighty matters—but none of more immediate importance to all of us than this one.

It is written under the California bear and palm tree insignia of the Two Hundred and Fiftieth Coast Artillery and comes from Pvt. Kenneth L. Moehler, Medical Department detachment, Camp McQuaide.

Private Moehler's letter contains an appeal; both a general, and, as will be seen later, a specific one. We are passing it on here in hope that it brings a response not only to him but to others of the many thousands of young men making up our armed forces.

JUST A RECRUIT

"Dear editor," his letter begins, "whenever anyone asks me if I was drafted, I always throw out my chest and say: 'Who, me? I was selected.'

"I've been in our Army only for about 4 months, but I think I am kind of growing into it. You know, the way you do with an old chair, a fishing hat, or a pipe. * * *

"It seems to me that the collective morale of our Army is based largely on little things. Things like a little dust down the rifle barrel on inspection, beans cooked maybe on the carbon side, a few inches in the fit of your pants one way or another, an extra spot on the galloping ivories. * * *

"One of these little things is mail from home.

"If a soldier gets a letter now and then, gee, it makes a lot of difference! It doesn't take long to write, but you should see some of these soldiers when they get a letter. They're a lot easier to live with. And are they proud! It makes little sparks go up your spine.

"Mr. Editor, how about reminding the folks for us? We read the Call-Bulletin, but it can't quite take the place of a letter."

POSTSCRIPT

That's the general appeal in Private Moehler's letter.

The specific appeal comes later, 'way at the bottom of the page, in a postscript:

"P. S.—Maybe she'll see it in the Call. Maybe I'll get a letter."

Whoever she is (or, if she "isn't" yet, whoever she may be) the editor and the rest of the staff hope she does and he does.

If Private Moehler doesn't get a letter from her, he should at least get one from some of us.

"Aiding national defense" is an overworked shibboleth, but this is one real way in which everybody can help—aiding in maintaining the high collective morale of these young men by bolstering the individual spirits, by making a little more load for Uncle Sam's other marching men, the boys in gray on postal collection.

EVERYBODY "GIVE"

Three cents won't buy a defense bond, but a stamp will go a long way toward the same end by bringing cheer to the fellow you know down at camp.

Private Moehler isn't an isolated case, either.

Somewhat south of him, at Camp Roberts, the camp paper—the Dispatch—recently carried a cartoon by Phil Hustis, to the same effect. It showed a soldier shrugging as he turned away from the mail window empty-handed. The caption said the same thing as Private Moehler's letter, more cynically and succinctly:

"The Army shows you how many swell friends you ain't got."

It's a wrong that needs writing, right away.

So, fall in. You—parents, girl friends, uncles, cousins, aunts—and the pal at home still in a civilian job. Squads write.

(You, too, Miss Postscript. Give!)

The Place of Agriculture in National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. U. S. GUYER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

ADDRESS OF THE HONORABLE PAYNE RATNER, GOVERNOR OF KANSAS

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of the Honorable Payne Ratner, Governor of Kansas, Conference of Governors, Boston, Mass., July 1, 1941:

It is a delightful pleasure to be here with my fellow Governors to renew my acquaintance with those I am fortunate to know personally, and to meet so many others with whom it has been my privilege to work officially.

To Governor Saltonstall and his people, I would add that I am especially pleased to be in our host State of Massachusetts, the birthplace of much of the culture and progress of my own State of Kansas.

The Commonwealth I represent is a leader in agriculture, suggesting the topic I am about to discuss. Kansas, for example, grows more wheat than any other State. But at the same time, "hyacinths as well as biscuits have come to be essential to the Kansan's well-being." To an important degree this is true because of the influence of Massachusetts people in pioneer times.

When members of a New England emigrant aid society left Boston in 1854 to aid with the settlement of Kansas, they sang these lines from Whittier, which now appear beneath a painting in my office in Topeka:

"They crossed the prairie as of old
The Pilgrims crossed the sea
To make the West, as they the East,
The homestead of the free!"

The song expressed an ideal which these New Englanders put into practice through founding churches and schools, assuring the true freedom which lies in the spirit and in the mind. Yes; Kansas owes a debt of gratitude to Massachusetts for this early stimulation which helped lead to the best that is found in Kansas today.

Through her years of growth Kansas has also assimilated many progressive ideals and ideas from other States of the Union.

In the heart of America, Kansas has an especially advantageous position with regard to agriculture. She draws to her fertile land many of the varieties and types of products grown in the North and takes many from the South. She combines products of the East with those of the West. At the crossroads of the Nation Kansas is the melting pot of agricultural endeavor.

Speaking now, however, I am not concerned solely with Kansas but with the problems of all States with relation to preparedness and more especially with the place of agriculture in national defense.

If I seem to refer frequently to Kansas, it is because, obviously, I know most about Kansas, and because the Kansas viewpoint in agricultural matters is representative of the viewpoints of our other great farm States.

This is truly an inspiring conference. Here are represented the diversified resources of the richest country in the world. Here are found the varied interests of all sections of the Nation. What is more important, here is reflected the spirit of a people more free than any on earth—a people determined to maintain that freedom through unified action.

It was unity that held the Thirteen Original Colonies together. It was unity that made possible the vast expansion that resulted in the sisterhood of States which is ours today. Only through unity can we meet successfully the present crisis that confronts this Nation from abroad.

But no such unity can be achieved without a proper balance of agriculture and industry.

As a team, agriculture and industry can pull together effectively in the harness of preparedness. But if one holds back in the traces, speed and efficiency are sacrificed. In the resulting disharmony, all may be lost.

It is of vital importance now, as always, that the people of this country be adequately fed and clothed. America also calls upon agriculture for the food and the farm products necessary for defense. If we are to alleviate the sufferings and privations of the peoples in those democracies resisting aggression, they must have food and clothing, as well as weapons. Civilians, as well as soldiers, must be helped. Here again, America turns to her farmers for aid.

To understand the difficulty of adapting agriculture to changing conditions, it is necessary to realize that farming is still primarily a business of individualists. In our national agricultural plant there are many thousands of independent units, each with its own management. Programs designed to increase the output of these units—the farms of the United States—must appeal to the many, rather than to the few. On the other hand, in certain nonagricultural lines of industry, decisions made by a few men can and do determine production.

An increase or decrease in the production of automobiles, for example, can be brought about by the decisions of a few men. But a material increase in wheat production can be achieved only when our farmers, deciding upon the matter individually, cooperate to that end.

When a large share of industry decides to concentrate on the production of certain things—such as airplanes and munitions—the change can be made in a relatively swift manner. Many of the machines and tools of normal times can, when necessary, be converted to defense work. When required, new machines can be made and installed. Thousands of workers can quickly be adapted to change duties, and thousands of additional men can be trained speedily for industrial tasks.

Industry can undertake its contracts with the prospect of comparatively quick sales, carefully guarding against overproduction.

Agriculture, on the other hand, must look far in advance.

First, our farmers must be convinced of the necessity and desirability of stepping up their production. It should be remembered that the decision must be made by millions of individuals—not just a few men.

Second, it should be remembered that farmers can do little to hurry nature.

Farmers require at least a year, and usually longer, to increase hog production materially. With beef cattle it takes 2 to 4 years to bring about an important increase at the market. Raising dairy production requires almost as long.

The long period that must elapse before farmers can realize returns on new decisions make them cautious about changing their programs. For survival, farmers must be convinced that the need will not pass while they are working with, or waiting on, the processes of nature.

The farm labor supply must also be considered. Usually the work is done by the farmer and members of his family, with the occasional assistance of neighbors. For example, in Kansas, fewer than 50 percent of the farmers normally hire any labor. Even at a time like this most of the work will continue to be done by the farmer and his family for the reason that other labor is difficult to obtain.

Many of our young men have gone into military service or to industrial work connected with national defense. Some have gone from the farms, others from cities. This has decreased the natural labor supply of the farm. At the same time it has taken away many from the cities who would ordinarily be drawn into farm work on a temporary basis.

If our farmers increase their production greatly they risk being caught short. They risk a declining market. They risk having on their hands the necessary new implements required for great production. They risk undertaking a responsibility without assurance of adequate labor at a cost they can meet. All of these hazards are in addition to the chances farmers must always take with the elements.

Unwise expansion would be a stone around the neck of agriculture. Our farmers are therefore cautious about venturing too far. Their desire is an economic plane for agriculture comparable to that of industry. This is no selfish desire, for the economic balance of the United States, and the security of this Nation, depend upon its realization.

In April of this year, the Federal Government called upon American farmers to produce more pork, dairy products, eggs, and poultry. It takes corn to make pork. It takes feed to bring about an increase in poultry, eggs, and dairy products. This request of the Government can therefore be met only through a general stepping up of the farm program.

The Government proposes to buy pork, dairy products, eggs, and poultry on the open market to accumulate reserve supplies of food. It is announced that such supplies will be needed for transfer to the British and other friendly peoples under the provisions of the Lease Lend Act; for release upon the market in case of unwarranted speculative price increases; to meet requests from the Red Cross for shipment to war refugee areas; and for distribution to some of our own people through welfare channels. The need of such food for our own armed forces, and for the workers of industry, is also taken into account.

As an inducement to farmers to enter into such a program, the Government proposes to support long-term prices at these approximate levels: Hogs, 9 cents a pound; dairy products, based on butter at 31 cents a pound; chickens, 15 cents a pound; eggs, 22 cents a dozen. These prices are subject to the customary commercial differentials for market grades and qualities, existing price relationships, and seasonal-price variations.

As I understand it, these prices are not pegged. The Government only supports this level generally. Moreover, these prices do not represent fair exchange value to the producer. They are considerably less than parity.

What the farmer gets for his products is, of course, of importance only with respect to the prices he must pay for the things he must buy. If he is poorly paid for his products, his purchasing power is reduced. He can't buy the commodities of industry. A fair profit for agriculture means more money for industry, management, and labor.

There has been a great deal of misconception about benefit payments to farmers. These payments originated in an effort to help agriculture out of a depression which also affected industry. Measures had to be taken to insure a better national farm program—not just to help the farmers, but to help achieve an agricultural-industrial balance vital to all our citizens.

But this is only temporary assistance needed to help bridge an emergency. Benefit payments are not the final answer to agriculture's problems. The real answer is a proper balance of agriculture and industry. In the past our farmers too often have held the short end of the stick.

In these days of national-defense effort along industrial lines our agricultural States, especially in the Middle West, have shared too little in the industrial expansion. This raises a grave danger that agriculture will be thrown even further out of balance.

Most of the guns, airplanes, and munitions are being made in the already highly industrialized sections of the Nation. Agriculture is contributing important materials for these purposes, and will continue to do so. But as they are furnished, there is hope on the part of the farmers that more of these products will find use in industries located in agricultural States.

Every State has agricultural interests which could be vastly benefited by a proper decentralization of defense industries. There should be a more widespread distribution of industries within each State, as well as among the States of the Nation.

Since agriculture's great stronghold is in my own section of America, I should like to cite you the case of the Midwest with respect to the need for decentralization:

We know that elementary military strategy makes it imperative to place vital defense plants and supplies in safe sectors—and there are no safer places in the United States than in rural areas such as the Midwest.

We know that it is always desirable to have production close to the source of raw materials—and many of the raw materials of defense come from the Midwest.

Both for military and industrial purposes the products of agriculture have a variety of uses. From field corn, for example, can be produced more than 60 kinds of chemicals. From oats and barley vitamin tablets are made. Livestock means not only meat but leather, fats, and glue. Clothing from wool and cotton, linseed oil from flax, sugar from beets, and plastics from soybeans are all derived from agriculture. An endless variety of products essential to defense could be mentioned.

We know that uninterrupted production often depends upon loyal labor—and there are no more patriotic or intelligent workmen than those of the Midwest.

Our farmers are unable to understand why more people are being concentrated in congested areas when better living conditions for workers and their families exist in agricultural areas.

All of these things are vital factors in defense and in our national economy. A proper agricultural-industrial balance is of prime importance to every citizen.

If our great American family is to prosper, agriculture must not be forced into the position of living on crumbs from the bountiful table it helps spread. If industry goes forward, it must not be at the expense of "poor country cousins." If agriculture fares badly, it cannot support industry. Without the buying power of agriculture, industry would be poverty-stricken.

We also know that industry and labor must make fair profits in order to buy the products of agriculture. If industry and labor become poor, then everyone suffers. A well-balanced agricultural-industrial economy must therefore be our constant goal.

At no time since the World War, except for fleeting intervals, has the farmer enjoyed a parity with labor and industry. Industrial wages have gone up tremendously. If the farmer were paid in the same proportion, he would now be selling his wheat at $2 a bushel or more; his corn at about $1.50; his hogs at around $16. Instead, he is selling at approximately half those prices.

I hope that in presenting this realistic side of the agricultural situation I am not painting a picture too pessimistic. To do so would be unfair to the farmers of Kansas and to those of other States. I hope, too, that it will not be assumed that our farmers are unable or unwilling to assume their share of defense responsibilities.

Our farmers are willing. They are able. You can count on them. America can count on them.

Agriculture is mobilized. It is prepared. It was ready long before industry and it is keeping up to date.

Agriculture has proved its capacity, proved its ability. Back of it all lies a spirit of self-reliance and independence among our farm people that is America's strongest hope for the future. Whatever may occur, our farmers will stay on the job. They will not strike. With them patriotism comes first. They find in the freedom of America not excuses to abuse that freedom but reason to work for the preservation of their independence.

If the United States is the arsenal of democracy, then our Farm Belt is the great larder of democracy. The American farmer is today, as always, our source of life-giving food. In this critical hour he is vital to our national defense, and the principal source of encouragement to millions across the seas.

In the forefront of our military preparedness are the boys in uniform—and many of these have gone out from the farm. Working with them in this era of mechanized defense are those at the machines of industry. Back of them all is our patriotic army of farmers—men in overalls who find their service on the land that gives life to us all.

Without this army of farmers there could be no air fleet to spread protecting wings over America, no ships to guard against invasion by sea, no military or industrial defense of any kind.

Farming is not a dramatic business. We read daily of the exciting race for industrial supremacy—of how bombing planes are rushed through the assembly lines, of how the fires of industry glow day and night for the defense of America. We are proud of these miracles of industrial achievement, and of the men behind the miracles. But it is food and the products of agriculture that make these things possible.

You won't find much romance in plowing corn. There are no dramatics in combining wheat. It is not exciting to feed pigs or to pitch hay. But today these prosaic acts are the things that count.

Today our farmers are playing almost as vital a role as those who left their fields and took up muskets to defend their liberty at Concord and Lexington.

In this crisis agriculture faces its greatest responsibility. In the end it will be the steady hand of the farmer on his plow that will guide America safely to her destiny.

Iowa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF KARL M. LeCOMPTE, OF IOWA

Mr. LeCOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include a short address I gave recently over radio station WINX as a part of the Iowa Salute program:

Mr. Chairman, a distinguished Iowan once said, "in all that is great and good, Iowa affords the best." This statement is so very self-evident that scarcely any elaboration is necessary. Situated in the center of the richest agricultural region in the world, Iowa has more than 25 percent of all of the grade A 1 crop-producing soil of the country. Naturally, we are not surprised to discover that Iowa ranks first in the production of corn—that great product of the Plains States.

First again is our State in oats. Naturally it follows that the Hawkeye State is first in hogs, horses, and poultry, and yields only to Texas in the production of beef cattle, and indeed we are closely pressing even Texas in total value of cattle marketed annually. It has come to be axiomatic that the choicest prime corn-fed beef comes from the Iowa feed lots. Thousands of head of cattle from the ranges are brought into our State annually to be finished before shipment to the eastern and central markets.

The great Iowa hen annually produces more wealth than all the gold and silver mines of the Pacific coast States. In recent years the marketing of turkeys has reached colossal proportions. Many farms market twelve to fifteen thousand birds per year, while the high mark for one turkey raiser may reach fifty or sixty thousand. Iowa has never been considered a wool- and sheep-producing State of the first rank, yet late statistics from the Department of Agriculture show that the State sends annually to market nearly a million and a quarter head of sheep and lambs for a total value of nearly $10,000,000, and 10,000,000 pounds of wool.

Iowa's permanent place in the field of agriculture is not seriously challenged. We furnish one-tenth of the country's food supply. Our products normally go to every important market of the globe, and invariably attract the top prices.

Easily 95 percent of the State is tillable. Certainly no other State has so very little waste land.

While the per capita wealth for the entire country, according to latest figures, appears to be something like $2,685, it is notable that the same authority gives the per capita wealth of the Hawkeye State at somewhere in the neighborhood of twice the average for the United States, or $4,322 for every man, woman, and child. Iowa is known as the richest field for the auto salesman or the manufacturer of modern equipment of all kinds. In fact, motor vehicles owned within the State could transport the entire population to distant points between sunrise and sunset without any strain upon the carriers or the highways.

But the greatest contribution is the character of the young folks. In every emergency Iowa youth has come forward to the aid of the Republic. Iowa boys poured out their blood for liberty on every battlefield from Palo Alto to the forest of the Argonne. Right now thousands of Iowa boys are in training in the gallant Army this country has assembled for defense purposes—if the defense of our Nation becomes necessary.

In the organization of the great American Legion, Iowa men took a leading part, and it has become traditional that "Iowa leads the Legion."

At the National Capital, Iowa men and women stand high in the councils and administration of the Government, and throughout the length and breadth of the land Iowa supplies leadership in industry, education, art, labor, religion, finance, and even in the field of sports Iowa men hold top rank. Perhaps at this moment followers of baseball from Maine to California marvel at the achievements of an Iowa farm boy—the great Bob Feller, who has already won 16 games in the American League this current season. But he stands ready to report to an Army camp whenever his name may be called.

Iowa came to statehood in 1846, only 14 years before the outbreak of the Civil War, or the War between the States, as our beloved friends of the old South prefer to designate the late unpleasantness. The State was still sparsely settled, yet nearly a hundred thousand men responded to the call. Again in 1898 Iowa gave her full share and more, and in the World War the Iowa boys responded from every city, town, village, and rural community. And the folks at home oversubscribed every Liberty bond drive, every Red Cross campaign, and every Y. M. C. A. effort. Iowa citizens came forward promptly and oversubscribed without any questions.

From the days of the earliest pioneers to the present moment education has been emphasized and educational facilities have been provided from the single-room country school to the magnificent State University at Iowa City. In Grinnell College the State has perhaps the oldest institution of higher learning west of the Mississippi River, and it is recognized as one educational institution whose importance is measured not in large enrollments but rather in scholastic attainments. The Iowa State College at Ames is by all odds the first and foremost agricultural college in the United States. Elsewhere there are 25 or more outstanding colleges and universities. In addition there are top-ranking grade schools, academies, high schools, and junior colleges in every county in the State. This program over a long period of years reflects itself in the very notable fact that Iowa has the lowest percent of illiteracy in the entire Union. This is not a mere accident. It was not achieved in a day. It is the result of the long-range program of education laid down by the pioneers a century and more ago and supported cheerfully by taxpayers and public-spirited citizens over a long period of time.

The region that comprises the Commonwealth of Iowa became a part of this Republic through the Louisiana Purchase by President Thomas Jefferson, and Iowa became the first free daughter or free State carved out of the Louisiana Purchase territory. The country was explored by the Lewis and Clark Expedition, and one member of this courageous band (Sergeant Floyd) is buried in northwest Iowa. His grave is appropriately marked.

In the first engagement, or the first battle of the World War in 1917, Merle Hay, of Glidden, Iowa, was one of five boys who made the supreme sacrifice on the battlefields of France.

Less than 2 weeks ago the O–9, an American submarine, was lost off the New Hampshire coast, and Comdr. Howard Abbott, of Osceola, Iowa, and his 32 companions, true heroes, true defenders, are entombed at their posts where they died in line of duty.

Iowa boys are first in every war and always the last to leave the field of battle.

Nor must we overlook the industrial products of Iowa. Her mills and factories put out annually upward of $1,000,000,000 worth of manufactured products. The State has valuable mineral deposits of coal, gypsum, lead, and limestone, and these are only partly developed. A magnificent road system, as well as thousands of miles of railways, connect every town and city with one another and with the metropolitan areas.

The great State was named by the American Indians "Iowa," meaning "beautiful land." Between the Mississippi and the Missouri, Iowa is held in the strong embrace of two mighty rivers. May heaven bless her and her devoted and patriotic citizens. Her affection, like the rivers of her borders, flows on to an inseparable union. The motto on the great seal, "Our liberties we prize and our rights we will maintain," is the watch word and the keynote as we point with pride to our glorious history and look with confidence to the future greatness of our Commonwealth and to the security of this Nation.

Dedication of Federal Building at Columbia, Tenn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WIRT COURTNEY
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

ADDRESS OF JUDGE WALTER E. KELLEY, AND INTRODUCTORY REMARKS OF HON. WIRT COURTNEY, OF TENNESSEE

Mr. COURTNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the address of Hon. Walter E. Kelley, delivered recently at the dedication of the new Federal Court and Post Office Building at Columbia, Tenn., in my district, and the introductory remarks I made at the time:

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, and friends, I am happy to escape from the stress of official duties in Washington for this brief visit to my district, Maury County, and Columbia. Before making the brief observations that I intend to make pertinent to this happy occasion, it occurs to me that you would like a short first-hand report on national and international affairs in which we are all so deeply concerned.

Until very recently, and for many months, some of us in Washington have fretted and been greatly disturbed over the inadequate aid that we are giving the embattled democracies of the world for their defense and, what in the last analysis is for our own necessary self-defense.

We have promised aid to China but that has been largely on paper and of little material benefit. At the same time we have been permitting shipments of war materials to go to Japan for cruel use against the very people we are pledged to help. Such a policy, in case of any nation with less patience and stoicism than the Chinese, would have turned friendship for us to hatred.

Our promised aid to Greece in her heroic resistance did not materialize and our country cannot escape some responsibility for the present plight of Greece.

As the vaunted arsenal to Great Britain, the munitions and supplies that have trickled through were meager, totally inadequate, and wholly unworthy of our capabilities.

Much of this inefficiency and ineffectiveness was due to strikes in our defense industries throughout the country and to the weak policy of the Labor Department as administered by its present Secretary, Madam Perkins, who is totally miscast for her part in this time of peril and emergency.

I am happy to say, however, that within the past 10 days or so, the national labor situation has greatly clarified. The speeding up of appropriate legislation in Congress and the determined action by our President and Commander in Chief, spell, in my opinion, the end of strikes in defense industries during the emergency.

A few patriotic labor leaders, too, have set about vigorously to uproot the radical elements in the unions, and I believe that from here out we will show a solid front in this country and amaze the world at our mass production of war materials and the insurance of its delivery to the place where it is most needed. I even have a faint hope for the resignation of Madam Perkins, a consummation devoutly to be desired.

Our airplane production is now up to about 1,500 a month and steadily growing. Twenty-seven shiploads of war materials are on the high seas bound for the British front in the latest theater of war. Steps are being taken to give real help to the Chinese and to cut off war supplies to Japan, and all in all I report to you that hope, faith, and determination purple the east and a spirit of optimism pervades your Capital City.

It is refreshing now to turn from the tragic horror of war to the dedication of this building, for which purpose we are gathered today. As we stand here in this peaceful city, the misty haze of the quiet hills about us, the bluegrass carpeting the good, productive earth as far as the eye can see, unscarred by bomb hole or crater, it is difficult to realize that across the seas the world runs with blood as millions of men seek to maim and wound and kill their fellows. As we consecrate this building for the lofty purposes for which it is intended, let us reconsecrate ourselves to our country and to our common purpose of keeping the peace we now enjoy under God, but further to the firm resolution of helping with every power at our command the democracies of the world that now struggle almost on their knees for the things we so lightly enjoy—liberty, freedom of speech and press and action, and freedom to worship our Creator as our own hearts and consciences dictate and command.

Permit me now to congratulate this county and city, its chamber of commerce, and its many tireless civic leaders at this consummation of a dream of many years, the dedication of this beautiful Federal courthouse and post-office building.

I wish I could claim some credit for the appropriation, but, as you know, the project was authorized by reason of the determined insistence of Senator McKELLAR and my distinguished predecessor, Judge Clarence W. Turner.

Senator McKELLAR'S state of health prevents him from being here today, although I am happy to say he has convalesced from a serious operation and is back at his desk in Washington. Through me he sends you his heartiest congratulations and best wishes. Senator STEWART expected to come, but was detained by official duties. I am sure that Judge Turner, from his present abode yonder between that last opening in the hills and beyond the last horizon's rim, looks down on us today and is happy to see the full fruition of his efforts. This project was authorized by an act of August 25, 1937. The amount allotted was $398,000. When the contract was awarded to the nationally known firm of Henke Construction Co., of Chicago, a prompt and well-done job was assured. Work began February 28, 1940. The cornerstone was laid on April 1, 1940, and the building completed May 20, 1941.

You have here now a building of rare beauty and dignity, unexcelled in the South. Not a building of stone that would crumble perhaps in half a century, but of eternal marble that generation after generation, down the corridor of time, will wonder at and admire.

We dedicate this building today to the purposes of service, truth, justice, and freedom, the foundation upon which our common country rests. We dedicate it to the living and to the memory of those good men and true long departed who have made our country the citadel of freedom and liberty that it is. We dedicate it in the full belief that those yet unborn will preserve, protect, and defend the country that it represents with their blood and lives if need be. We dedicate it in the belief that the service rendered and the judgments passed within its confines will reflect always the true ideals of America, the land that we love.

On behalf of the people of my district I want to extend sincere thanks to our distinguished guest, who will now address you, for his presence here today.

His career should be an inspiration to every young man. Coming to Washington in his youth as a stenographer, he found time to attend George Washington University and the Georgetown School of Law, where he received his degree. Attached to the legal department of the Post Office in 1914, his advance has been rapid until he is now first assistant to the Solicitor and Acting Solicitor for the Department, in which capacities he has the confidence and esteem of all official Washington. I am happy to introduce to you Judge W. E. Kelley.

REMARKS OF WALTER E. KELLY, ASSISTANT TO THE SOLICITOR, POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, UPON THE OCCASION OF THE DEDICATION OF THE NEW FEDERAL BUILDING AT COLUMBIA, TENN., ON JUNE 17, 1941

I hardly need to assure you that the present Postmaster General is no less interested in the completion and dedication of this new Federal building than his predecessor, Mr. Farley, who was here upon the occasion of the laying of the cornerstone. Due to the rapidity with which events are taking place in the field of government, it has not been feasible for Mr. Walker to be with you today. It is indeed a privilege for me to represent the Post Office Department upon this occasion, as it affords the rare opportunity to greet the public which will be served by this new structure and likewise to meet members of the postal personnel which carry on in the field the real work of the Postal Service with such efficiency.

While designed chiefly for use as a post office and as a Federal courthouse, within the walls of this building other activities of the United States will have offices. It may thus well be regarded as a symbol of the entire Federal Government. Although I am of the legal profession, it is fitting on this occasion that I speak to you for the most part upon the subject of the Postal Service. I observe from the program that later in the day there are to be special exercises in connection with the dedication of the Federal courtroom. We can all appreciate the individual viewpoint of the man who said, "I care not who writes the nation's laws if I may write its songs." Yet we all realize that the nature of laws that are enacted, and the manner in which they are administered, greatly affect the product of the song writer and also have much to do with the creation of a spirit essential to the singers. And while on this subject may I not digress a bit further to say that it appears to be not without significance that so many of our enduring songs have their setting in the South. There come to my mind My Old Kentucky Home, Carry Me Back to Old Virginny, Swanee River, and Dixie. I heartily second the thought expressed in the course of the remarks of Reverend Cantrell urging adherence to the true values of life. I think it was John Powys who asserted that more than half the misery in the world springs from stupidly placed values.

It is fitting on an occasion of this kind that I speak to you upon the subject of the United States Postal Service; and just what is the Postal Service in the minds of the American people? We all have, no doubt, a more or less definite idea of the Postal Service. However, I rather think that emphasis is laid by some on particular functions of the Postal Service. Thus, for business men and women the use of the Postal Service as an aid to their business looms large; the housewife is probably more impressed with the usefulness of the Service in social contacts; the man with a postal-savings account values most that facility; and then we must not forget the philatelist who gets much pleasure from his stamp collection. The best universal conception of it, in my opinion, appears above the portals of the City Post Office Building in Washington. There chiseled in the enduring stone is an inscription, the product of two of the best minds known to American history—a great scholar and statesman bearing the name of Woodrow Wilson and a great educator, former President Eliot, of Harvard University, collaborated in a sublime eulogistic description of the Postal Service in these words:

> Carrier of news and knowledge,
> Instrument of trade and industry,
> Promoter of mutual acquaintance
> Of peace and good will > Among men and nations.
> Messenger of sympathy and love,
> Servant of parted friends,
> Consoler of the lonely,
> Bond of the scattered family,
> Enlarger of the common life.

Perhaps you will agree that the splendor of this sentiment lies in the fact that it recognizes the Postal Service, not only in the commonplaces of life, trade, and commerce, but as having a vital bearing upon the things of the spirit. Love, sympathy, fellowship, peace, and good will, enlargement of the common life, are all spiritual factors associated with our Postal Service.

It is no wonder that those two great scholars, Wilson and Eliot, whose keen intellects penetrated things earthy and spiritual with the efficiency of a surgeon's knife, found inspiration and insight to write this tribute to the Postal Service. Think how many heartthrobs there are in the nearly 26,000,000,000 pieces of mail that pass through the post office in each year. There is nothing else on earth so vibrant with all phases of life as this flood of correspondence. In the never-ending stream of letters that flows through our post offices there is encountered all the promptings of the human spirit that make for better or for worse; every emotion that thrills or stills the human heart.

Should we not, then, occasionally give thought to the words of Woodrow Wilson and President Eliot for the discernment and the truth reflected in them. Indeed, it would be well if we could have that legend above the portals of every post office under the American flag. It would stand as a perpetual reminder that the Postal Service is not only our largest business institution but our largest human institution.

The Eliot-Wilson description was written a generation ago, since which time the Postal Service has taken on numerous other activities. Indeed, it has become a sort of general factotum for the Federal Government. To name but a few instances, you will recall that it was through the Postal Service that the adjusted-service bonds were distributed and paid a few years ago. The most recent extra-postal function was the fingerprinting of all aliens. At the time the Social Security Board began to function the Postal Service was entrusted with the work of distributing the cards and subsequently assembling the data on the cards. It may not be amiss to express my personal opinion that in the years to come the results of the Social Security Act and of the act regulating the sale and exchange of securities will throw more luster upon the present administration than will some of its more spectacular achievements.

As Congressman COURTNEY advised you, one of the functions of the office to which I am attached is to prepare reports setting forth the views of the Post Office Department upon proposed legislation which would affect it. The day before I started down here there came to my desk, by reference from the White House, a letter from a woman lauding the Postal Service and endorsing certain proposed legislation in the interest of postal employees. Although the communication was evidently from an intelligent woman, a sentence in it was slightly perplexing. She reported that recently a fire broke out in the basement of a neighbor's house and she dashed out to get assistance but the only man in sight was a letter carrier on his daily rounds. She stated that the carrier responded to her call and "distinguished the fire." I could not be certain whether she meant that the carrier had distinguished himself or extinguished the fire. Perhaps a newspaperman would say that the writer correctly stated the facts upon the theory that when a postman puts out a fire that fire is thereby distinguished from all other fires, thus affording a striking headline. But I only mention this incident as one illustration of how public servants, whether they be letter carriers, firemen, or policemen, do not in emergencies adhere to the strict metes and bounds of their jobs.

Perhaps you will not mind if I read you some details of postal history. As you know, our post office had its origin in colonial times. As early as 1639 a postmaster was appointed at Boston. The first post road was established in 1672—running between Boston and New York. In 1691, steps were taken for a unified postal system for all the colonies, under a postmaster general appointed by the British Crown. In the years before the Revolution, the system was gradually extended and improved. Post routes with regular schedules were established in all the colonies and mail boats were placed in service between American ports and the West Indies. In 1753 Benjamin Franklin was appointed Postmaster General. In 1774, just before the Revolution, he was dismissed by King George for insubordination, but when he left office, post roads were running from Maine to Florida, and from New York to Canada, and the mail was being carried to and from the British Isles on a monthly schedule.

Franklin well understood the value of an enlightened public opinion, and under his administration newspapers and pamphlets were carried in the mails free or at low rates of postage. The post office of his day was a tremendous factor in breaking down the isolation of the separate colonies, and it had a great deal to do with the creation of national sentiment leading to the Revolutionary War.

At the time of Washington's inauguration there were post offices in only 75 towns, and the mails were carried by post riders over 1,785 miles of post roads, consisting of one principal route along the seaboard and a number of cross, or feeder, routes servicing the inland towns. There were no envelopes and no postage stamps in those days. The sheet or sheets of a letter were folded and sealed and addressed on the back. Shortly after the Parcel Post System was established an attorney conceived the idea of making some money in the way of penalties by instituting a suit against an express company based on a violation of the law which gives the Post Office Department a monopoly over the carriage of "letters and packets." The attorney jumped to the conclusion that "packets" was synonymous with "packages." However, as the court pointed out in deciding the case, at the time the so-called private express statutes were adopted a letter composed of but one sheet was called a single letter, one of two sheets a double letter, one of three sheets a triple letter, and one that contained four or more sheets was designated a "packet." Thus all the attorney derived from the case was a lesson in history. Postage was paid in cash, the rate varying from 6 cents a sheet for distances not over 30 miles to 25 cents a sheet for distances greater than 450 miles. Franklin's policy of according low postage rates to newspapers still remained in effect, and during Washington's administration these were carried at 1 cent each, or a cent and a half, according to distance.

The efficiency and usefulness of the Postal Service was greatly increased under our early Presidents. Before the close of Washington's second administration, the number of post offices, the mileage of post roads, and the volume of the mails had all increased fivefold, and 15 years after Washington's death there were 3,000 post offices in the United States, the mails were carried over almost 50,000 miles of post roads, and there was scheduled mail service between the centers of population and all the new settlements which were springing up in the inland territory. Newspapers and pamphlets from the eastern cities were freely circulated in the West. Pioneers in the wilderness exchanged letters with their friends and relatives at the seaboard. Commercial and social intercourse was maintained among all sections of the rapidly growing country. The Post Office Department was a factor second to none in the settlement and development of our Nation during the period before the Civil War.

The post office of those times did not function alone in the matter of providing a communication service. It was through the post office that we laid the foundations of our national transportation system. First the stage coaches, and later the railroads and steamship lines, received contracts from the Post Office Department based nominally upon the expeditious handling of the mails, which had as their real object the creation of transportation facilities which were essential to our commercial development. Just before the Civil War, for instance, the Government was occupied in encouraging the settlement of our Pacific coast territory, and in those years a large part of the total postal expenditures was paid out on mail contracts covering ocean and overland services to California and other far-western States. In the year 1859, the Post Office Department spent $2,700,000 to provide mail service for the 650,000 people then living in the States of California and Oregon and the Territories of Utah and Washington, as against $12,300,000 expended to furnish postal facilities for the 30,000,000 people residing in the rest of the Union. It is not to be supposed, however, that this was in reality an expenditure for postal purposes. More than a million dollars was paid in 1859 to steamship companies and an equal sum to stage lines for carrying the Pacific and overland mails. The main purpose of these payments was to provide a transportation service which would accelerate colonization.

The fundamental objects were not postal—they were of much broader scope. They included the spread of our population, the extension of our commerce, and the development of our national resources. The post office was not in this instance functioning simply as a system for the transmission of private correspondence. In that period it was the great pioneering agent of civilization and progress. It functioned as the patron of trade and industry and labor to build up our great country and to lay a foundation for the security and prosperity of its future generations.

For 60 years after the adoption of the Constitution postage charges were paid in cash by the mail users. Stamps were first provided in 1847, for the greater convenience of patrons in mailing their letters and newspapers. Stamped envelopes were introduced 6 years later—in 1853. The registered-mail service was established in 1855. Railway postal cars for the distribution of letters while in transit were first used in 1863. As you will realize, this was a tremendous improvement in the Postal Service, permitting as it did the arrival at destination of pouches of mail ready for handling by a letter carrier assigned to a particular route.

Free delivery in the cities was authorized in 1863, and the money-order system was inaugurated a year later. Postal cards were introduced in 1873 and special delivery in 1885. These added facilities illustrate the policy which has always been pursued by our Government not only to employ the post office as an aid to the development of new territory and new national resources but constantly to increase the scope of its usefulness to the people in every community.

Four outstanding additions to our postal facilities have been made within comparatively recent years. Rural Free Delivery was inaugurated on an experimental basis in 1896, and by 1907 was in full operation in all parts of the country. My first assignment in the Post Office Department was in the Division of Rural Mails, and I was naturally interested to ascertain that the countryside about Columbia is served by 7 rural routes. Letter carriers now bring to 25,000,000 people in our farms practically the same house-to-house service which is available to those who live in the great cities. In 1911 the Postal Savings System was founded, and the post office of today is the depository of savings belonging to more than 2,000,000 people and aggregating more than $1,316,000,000.

The year 1913 saw the establisnment of the parcel post, largely for the benefit of the farmers and those who reside in small places not reached by railroads or express service. By weight and volume, parcel post now constitutes almost three-fifths of all the mail which the post office handles. The last important addition to postal facilities was the Air Mail System, which had its beginning in 1918, and at the present time embraces routes aggregating over 42,000 miles in length. Mails are now flown every month more than 6,000,000 miles.

There you have the background of the Postal Service, and, based upon 26 years of experience with that Service, it is my considered judgment that the Postal Service has reached its highest peak of efficiency.

In closing I wish to congratulate the committee responsible for the excellent arrangements for these exercises, and to express the hope that you will greatly enjoy the opportunity of using your fine, new building.

National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL CUNNINGHAM

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

RESOLUTION OF THE IOWA PRESS WOMEN

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted by the Iowa Press Women:

Whereas the women of the United States stand primarily for peace, but are nevertheless willing to share burdens of a war crisis: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we as members of the Iowa Press Women, in convention assembled June 21, 1941, at Ames, Iowa, proffer our services in bringing about full voluntary cooperation of women in all plans for national defense; that we urge every woman to volunteer her skill and her unusual abilities in preserving democracy to the Government of her country before an official drafting of such capacities be established.

ELLA C. TAYLOR, of Traer, Chairman.
ALICE C. WEITZ, of Des Moines.
ESTHER BELLE MACGUGIN, of Ames.

Amendment: We believe an official draft of women both unwise and unnecessary.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALFRED F. BEITER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 1, 1941

EDITORIALS FROM THE BUFFALO COURIER-EXPRESS AND THE BUFFALO EVENING NEWS

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, during the testimony at the hearings on the St. Lawrence seaway project before the Rivers and Harbors Committee last week, the opponents of the project presented some forceful and salient facts. The second witness to testify against the construction of this seaway was Chauncey J. Hamlin, of Buffalo. Mr. Hamlin is chairman of the Niagara Frontier Planning Board, and it was at his direction that this Board last year made a very comprehensive survey and report on this proposed waterway. Mr. Hamlin is a man of wide travel and interests, and among them he is president of the Buffalo Museum of Science, and chairman of the Niagara Frontier Committee for the Defense of America by Aid to the Allies.

Two editorials on his testimony have since appeared with reference to his testimony concerning the Canadian attitude toward the building of this seaway—one in the Buffalo Courier-Express, and one in the Buffalo Evening News—and under permission to extend my remarks, I include both of those articles. They follow:

[From the Buffalo Courier-Express of June 27, 1941]

SEAWAY BLACKJACK

The charge by Chauncey J. Hamlin before the House Rivers and Harbors Committee that the Roosevelt administration blackjacked Canada into the St. Lawrence project agreement evoked expressions of horror. One committee member interpreted it as an accusation that "the United States is playing traitor to a friendly nation," and another assiduously but unsuccessfully tried to make Mr. Hamlin weaken his statement.

It is to Mr. Hamlin's credit that he refused to be badgered out of his original charge, for his indictment has plenty of substantiation. The "traitor" interpretation is patently a silly twisting of what the witness actually said, for he merely pointed out that Canada has been forced to enter into the agreement because of her wartime position.

Committee Member CULKIN, of Oswego, who is perhaps the leading congressional advocate of the project, himself recalled that Premier Hepburn, of Ontario, several years ago was a strong seaway opponent. Then Mr. CULKIN read from a recent Hepburn speech in which the Premier approved the project.

The seaway carries no more economic promise today than it did when Premier Hepburn opposed it. The hydroelectric power phase of the project presents another question, for it does appear that the United States and Canada do need more electric energy for defense industries. Mr. Hepburn's overnight switch on the project, then, may be due to two factors, the need of electric power in his Province and the need of "playing ball" with the Roosevelt administration. Clearly, the seaway is extraneous to the power phase, except that Mr. Roosevelt wants the seaway. So as demonstrated by the Hepburn attitude, the Dominion has been forced into acceptance of the seaway to get its power.

Not only did the Hamlin testimony apprise the committee of the unfortunate position in which the Dominion has found itself. Mr. Hamlin also, by indirection, answered the harpings of certain seaway proponents, principally Maurice P. Davidson, of the New York State Power Authority. Mr. Davidson, pro-project spokesman No. 1 in New York State, has continued to accuse the Niagara Frontier Planning Board of representing selfish power utility interests by its opposition to the project.

Mr. Hamlin, as chairman of the planning board, told the House committee that the board did not oppose a public power development on the St. Lawrence. The board's opposition is and has been directed at the seaway portion of the proposed river development. He added that he would be sympathetic to the power plan alone "if it can be worked out equitably with Canada."

The Hamlin testimony should bear weight with the Congressmen as a recital of how the administration has illogically refused to divorce the seaway and power plans, and by virtue of its refusal to separate them, has used the power needs as a lever to pry acceptance of the whole scheme out of Canada's administration.

[From the Buffalo Evening News]

CANADA SILENT

Proponents of the St. Lawrence seaway professed to be outraged at the suggestion advanced by Chauncey J. Hamlin of the Niagara Frontier Planning Board that the government of Canada had assented to the project under duress—that the administration had pressed it on the Dominion more or less in terms of her obligation to the United States in relation to her war effort. They point to recent endorsements by Prime Minister W. L. Mackenzie King and by Premier Mitchell F. Hepburn, of Ontario, who formerly strongly opposed the project, as evidence that opinion in Canada is for the undertaking. But there is evidence that the Dominion regards it with strong misgivings.

Said the Montreal Star, some time after Canada's entrance into the war:

"It has been advanced again and again as a strong reason why Canada should embark upon this huge and expensive project that it would be a friendly gesture to the United States. The Montreal Star yields place to no one in its attitude of the supreme importance of maintaining the friendliest relations with the United States of America—but not at the expense of yielding any part of our national heritage. * * * It is difficult indeed to understand on what economic grounds any Canadian Government would venture upon an undertaking which would involve this nation in colossal expenditure without any compensating feature in sight."

One may believe that the opinion expressed by the Montreal Star, when it felt free to discuss the matter, is widely held in the Dominion. The people of Canada hold President Roosevelt in high esteem for his aid to the Dominion and Great Britain in their war efforts. Knowing that he is strongly committed to the project, one which he now urges in terms of continental defense, they refrain from any criticism of it while it is under review by the House Rivers and Harbors Committee in Washington. But it is entirely proper for Americans familiar with opinion in Canada to discuss reactions there in such terms as Mr. Hamlin employed. It is proper, too, for them to discuss the method adopted by the administration, which ignores the treaty order formerly observed with respect to engagements with the Dominion, and to criticize the timing of the legislation, when Britain desperately needs more aid. In the circumstances the procedure is not altogether seemly.

Farm Cooperatives' Stake in Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK E. HOOK
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

ADDRESS OF SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE CLAUDE R. WICKARD

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Secretary of Agriculture Claude R. Wickard before a meeting of the Dairymen's League Cooperative Association, Syracuse, N. Y., Thursday, June 19, 1941:

I welcome this opportunity of attending your annual meeting. In a world overflowing with hate and intolerance, we still are able to speak freely and frankly to one another. A meeting such as you are holding today is possible only in a democracy.

It is significant also that this meeting is under the auspices of a cooperative organization. True cooperative organizations don't do very well under the dictators. Almost without exceptions, cooperatives have been most successful in the democracies. Students of the cooperative movement are wasting time if they go to Nazi Germany or Fascist Italy.

In this country public opinion favors cooperatives and the law of the land gives them preferential treatment. As Secretary of Agriculture, it is my duty to favor true farmer cooperatives.

For me, it is a very pleasant duty. I have helped organize and operate at least two farmer cooperatives. They were comparatively small ones back in Indiana, but they have been very successful financially, and have served their members and the public interest well.

Today in the United States, some 3,000,000 members belong to about 10,700 agricultural marketing and purchasing cooperatives. My experience with the Indiana cooperatives taught me that a successful cooperative means more than talking about the blessings of cooperation. It means work, hard work, and unselfish work. It means democracy on a practical basis.

Nowadays, I have more regard for farmer cooperatives than I used to have. This is not because I ever had a poor opinion of cooperatives. Quite the contrary. It is because I have a good deal more appreciation of all things democratic than I once had. In common with millions of other Americans I have always taken democracy for granted. Lately, I have realized that the blessings of democracy are privileges, not rights, and that these privileges must be guarded carefully if we do not wish to lose them.

The cooperative movement is a democratic movement and it has the weaknesses and strengths of democracy. Like other democratic institutions, the cooperative movement changes with the times. For example, the activities of cooperatives operating in certain fields have been altered by the bringing of public powers, such as the milk-marketing agreements, into this field. This in no way diminishes the need for true cooperatives. It simply gives the cooperatives new responsibilities.

In our democracy there will always be a place for voluntary group action. This place cannot be filled by individual action or by Government action.

The public interest is served when Government agencies and farmer agencies work together. Working hand in hand, the two supplement each other. Here in the New York milkshed, cooperatives were the spearhead for the agreement which enabled the stabilization of the milk market. Producers throughout the milkshed have shared in the gains from this program.

Every so often a democracy has to make certain that it is still a democracy. This test is a simple one—do the people still rule? And every so often, a cooperative has to make certain that it is still a cooperative. This test also is a simple one—do the members rule?

Finally, a cooperative, like a democracy, must meet the most important test of all: Is it in the public interest? Does it really serve its members and, through them, the general public? If a cooperative serves its members well, it is almost certain to serve the public interest well.

I sincerely hope to see the cooperative movement greatly strengthened in the years to come. For the cooperative movement flourishes with democracy, and it can help to keep democracy vital and dynamic. The cooperative movement in the United States is still young. It is still growing It has almost unlimited potentialities. But we might as well recognize that its future, like the future of so many of the institutions we love, is bound up with the future of democracy.

Today this country is deeply involved in the struggle to defend democracy. Some of this struggle is dramatic and spectacular. There are battles at sea like the engagement between the Hood and the Bismarck; the fight that followed the air-borne invasion of the island of Crete; fights on land, fights on the sea, and fights in the sky. But the greater part of this struggle is not fighting but work, hard work. It is nothing more spectacular than the digging of coal, the forging of steel, the building of ships, and the raising of crops.

The American farmer has a vital part in this struggle to defend democracy, a place that is likely to prove decisive, just as it proved decisive in the first World War.

Today Great Britain is even more dependent upon us for foods than she was during the days of 1917 and 1918. Then the French and Japanese Fleets helped with the task of keeping the sea lanes clear, the airplane was not a major menace to shipping, and England had access to much of the food supply of continental Europe. All this has changed now.

The British demand developed much more slowly than the demand during the first World War. It developed so slowly, in fact, that some persons only a few months ago felt it wouldn't develop at all. Then we began to hear that the British might need some of our pork, cheese, eggs, and other foods. They did need them, and in a hurry, too.

This development didn't catch the Department of Agriculture altogether unprepared. Early in April the Department announced that it would support minimum prices for hogs, dairy products, and poultry products. We wanted increased production, and that means making it profitable for farmers to produce more. At the time we made the announcement funds from the lease-lend bill were not available. But we anticipated events. In addition to the increased production, the Department wanted farmers to get the benefit of any price increases which would come eventually from British buying. Farmers have received the benefits of the rise in prices and it has meant millions of dollars to them, dollars that otherwise would have gone to processors or speculators.

And farmers have responded to the appeal to produce more. The production of dairy products, chickens, and eggs has increased over the corresponding levels for 1940. We also are going to have a larger supply of pork than we looked for early last spring.

But, so far as dairy products are concerned, our worry still is the worry of getting enough. Recently milk production has been about 5 percent higher than the corresponding period last year, and it would have been still higher had it not been for the spring drought. Even so, the British need all the dairy products we can furnish them—and more, too.

In particular, they want cheese. Not long ago I requested the American people to cut down on the consumption of cheese in order to supply the British needs. Some of the responses to this request were encouraging and gratifying; other responses somewhat disappointing.

Some people seemed to feel that we were picking on the cheese industry. It's just the other way round. As a nation the British realize the value of cheese better than we do. They know there is no better food, and if ever a nation needed good food at the present time, it is the British. They have taken a terrible beating and they have made real sacrifices. The British are not asking for luxuries. They are asking for necessities. They must have food—American food—to carry on the fight against Hitler.

I asked the people to reduce cheese consumption after a careful survey of the entire situation. Because of the feed reserves stored in the ever-normal granary we can produce food more quickly and more abundantly than we could during the first World War. Yet British requirements have been higher than we anticipated and the weather has been against us. For the next few weeks or months we are not going to produce enough dairy products to supply the minimum needs of Great Britain and our present rate of consumption. We'll produce almost enough, but not quite enough.

The British want cheese first of all. They eat a good deal more cheese per capita than Americans do. Of course, we could reduce our consumption of milk in other forms, but taking American food habits into account, that would be worse than giving up cheese. When I suggested a reduction in cheese consumption I tried to make it plain that we wanted our people to reduce consumption of cheese only in cases where substitutes are readily available. If a family, for example, relies upon cheese for proteins and does not have enough income to substitute meat, let that family continue to eat all the cheese it wants. But reducing our consumption of cheese won't hurt the average American. I think I know what I am talking about, for I like cheese very much, and I eat quite a bit more than the average person.

Cheese production may soon increase to the point where we'll have enough for ourselves and Great Britain, too. The Department will do everything possible to get this increased production. And once we have enough cheese the Department will do all that it can to increase the consumption of cheese in the United States. In the past we've done this, for cheese is one of our very best foods.

I am hopeful that this discussion about cheese will have a real advertising value for the product and that it will call the attention of our own people to the value of this vital food.

The majority of our people are willing, I am sure, to cut down on the consumption of cheese and to make any other sacrifices needed to help defeat Hitler. Just a day or two ago I talked to a delegation of Wisconsin Congressmen about the cheese situation. The discussion rambled a bit and got off onto the tariff and the Democratic and Republican Parties. But after the conference was over I felt that we understood each other's viewpoint a good deal better. Naturally, the Wisconsin Congressmen wanted to protect the cheese industry; and since I wanted to protect it, too, there was complete agreement on this point. Yet during the conference I heard nothing to change my conviction that we are going to have to cut down on our cheese consumption for a while if we are to supply the minimum requirements of Great Britain.

Your own section here is one of the great dairy centers. I am certain that you will be glad to produce more cheese and to eat less—if you feel that thereby you will be helping England.

This country has made up its mind about help to England. We are going to help her with all the means at our disposal. The people have decided, and there isn't any use arguing about it any longer. We are going ahead—regardless. We are going ahead because such a course is in our own selfish interests. When we fight Hitlerism, we are fighting for ourselves.

When Hitler falls, as he will fall, one of the big reasons for his defeat will be the farmers of the United States of America. Hitler is very vulnerable in two ways—food and oil—and his most vulnerable point is perhaps food. He may succeed in getting enough oil but, so long as the British blockade holds, he isn't likely to get enough food.

The German food situation is better than it was during the last war, but it is by no means good. Germany's wartime diet is not up to the peacetime standard. The persistent lack of fats is a problem that gets worse instead of better. As the war goes on malnutrition will become widespread in Germany.

Germany probably is better off, so far as food is concerned, than almost any country in Europe, with the possible exception of Russia. So far Germany seems to have been taking a good deal of food from her vassal, Italy, despite the fact that Italy's food situation is not as good as Germany's. The Italian diet is a pretty frugal one, ordinarily, and rationing has hit the poor people very hard. I am told by persons who should know that the Italians are sick of the whole mess and want peace, but so long as they have Mussolini and the tie-up with Germany they can't hope for peace.

The situation in the other European countries ranges from bad to worse, due largely to the fact that the conquered countries have been robbed to feed the German war machine. Unoccupied France is in a terrible condition. Belgium is even worse off than unoccupied France since Belgium basically is dependent upon imported foods and feeds.

In the Netherlands, milk production may decline one-fourth in 1941, and butter production about as much. Holland is not likely to be able to supply more than half her normal consumption of edible fats. To a greater or lesser degree, these stories of shortages can be repeated for Norway, Austria, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Sweden, Finland, and so on through the list.

So long as this situation continues, Germany will be unable to organize and exploit the resources of her conquered countries. As the people realize that only the defeat of Hitler will restore peace and bring food, the people are likely to pray and work for Hitler's downfall. If the British and the United States keep control of the seas, Hitler can't win, and if Hitler can't win soon, he has lost.

Some farmers remember the beating agriculture took after the first World War and are afraid this may happen again if they produce more. They forget that we had no national farm programs in 1917 and 1918, nothing to prevent unbridled expansion and waste of soil fertility. Today farmers have the machinery to control expanded production of foods that are needed and to control marketing as well. There's no reason now to be afraid of burdensome surpluses of vital foods.

My fears are of an entirely different sort. I am afraid that we will not be able to produce enough of the foods we need. From some standpoints, food reserves are more important than reserves of guns, munitions, planes, and ships. We may never use these munitions, but we will use the food.

Just now we are trying to turn the feed reserves in the ever-normal granary into food reserves. For example, here in the Northeast the Department and your feed cooperatives have worked out a program to ship grain in from midwestern areas so that it will be available to help produce more dairy products and other food.

As time goes on, food reserves may become just as valuable a weapon as munitions themselves. If the war continues very long, famine will spread over the earth like a terrible plague. The thought of food reserves in the United States will be in the minds of millions upon millions of people in the hungry countries. The knowledge that the United States can supply food will reinforce our arguments about democracy. This struggle may finally come down to the issue—who can feed the people, the democracies or the dictatorships? In this case, the answer is—the democracies.

These food reserves will not be wasted even if peace comes just as they are put in storage. After peace, we must continue our efforts to strengthen democracy. The challenge to our system will not end with the defeat of Hitler. The real test of any system is—does it work? Forty-three percent of our people are undernourished in one way or another. One way to meet the challenge to democracy is to give our people enough of the right kinds of food. As I said a little while ago, I am not afraid of burdensome surpluses of food. I am afraid we won't produce enough of the foods we need and that Britain needs.

Before it is over, the challenge to our democracy is going to require more sacrifices than moderate reductions in cheese consumption. The people will make these sacrifices gladly—provided they feel they really contribute to the defense of democracy. But they don't want sacrifices simply for the sake of sacrifices. They want protection where protection is possible. Farmers know that we have the machinery to prevent the breakdown which followed expanded production during the first World War. They want assurances that we will use this machinery. I think they should have them.

If the Government urges the farmers to increase the production of a commodity, I think the Government should support prices for this commodity at at least 85 percent of parity—if this support is possible. Furthermore, I think the Government should assure the farmers that it won't let the bottom fall out of the market after the defense effort is over. Government should help out until farmers have had time to get things back to normal. These assurances to farmers are fair and right. They are embodied in legislation that is pending. I hope this legislation is approved.

I am for parity for agriculture. I want to repeat here today what I have said many times in the past—parity is not only simple justice to farmers; it also is essential to the strength of our whole national economy.

If government and the people are fair to farmers, farmers, in turn, should be fair. The temptation to get while the getting is good is a strong temptation. Arguments can always be found to justify an effort to charge all the traffic will bear.

Generally speaking, farmers and farmer groups have pursued a statesmanlike course during the past few years. As a result, they have public favor. Let us conduct ourselves during this crisis so that we will retain it. Once lost, it will be very hard to regain.

Farmers learned a lesson during the first World War. The inflation bug bit them and they had the speculative fever. That fever is one of the worst financial diseases and its effects are felt for a long time. In this second war farmers want prosperity, but they would like to make it a permanent thing instead of something to talk about between wars.

Fair prices, I well realize, will not solve all our immediate farm problems. Other things enter in. I am told that the labor situation isn't too good in some areas. In some cases farmers are finding it difficult to compete with industrial wages and the draft may be taking some men that are needed in agriculture.

This draft situation has been brought to the attention of selective-service officials by the Department. As a result, careful consideration will be given to the deferment of farm workers needed for the production of foods vital to the defense program. We are working on other phases of the farm-labor problem, too.

Much of this defense effort comes down to a question of production. Can we produce ships, planes, and other munitions quickly enough and in sufficient quantities? Can we produce enough food? I shall let someone else answer the first question, but, so far as food is concerned, the answer is "Yes." There may be temporary shortages, but on the whole front agriculture will win its battle of production.

After this war we are going to find ourselves with an industrial plant and farm plant bigger than ever before. We shall have all the resources for a national income of $100,000,000,000 a year. What use shall we make of this productive capacity? Shall we allow it to choke us, as it did in the 1920's, or shall we use it to feed and clothe and house our people? Shall we use it to make all America healthier and happier? On the answer depends the fate of democracy in the United States and in the world.

Iowa Farmers Subsidize Consumers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED C. GILCHRIST

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. FRED C. GILCHRIST, OF IOWA

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Speaker, radio station WINX, of Washington, puts on a program every 2 weeks for the purpose of saluting the States. On last Tuesday evening the salute was to the great State of Iowa, and I thank this radio station for the opportunity it gave me to make a short speech about the farmers of my State.

Mr. KARL LECOMPTE, the distinguished Congressman from the Seventh District, joined in the program and told us about the resources that we have out there, and then I was given 9 minutes to speak of her agricultural interests.

I append what I then said, to which I have given the title:

IOWA FARMERS SUBSIDIZE CONSUMERS

In talking about Iowa, we must not minimize the great production that her factories fetch into her economic life. For example, in 1937 they had an output of a sum approaching $2,000,000 a day in value, which included, of course, the value of agricultural products that went into this manufacture and formed the major part of it.

Nor should we forget that the traveler in the Tall Corn State will pass by a schoolhouse almost every 2 miles. These have given us the right to proudly boast that there is less illiteracy in Iowa than in any other State in the American Union. Such a wayfarer will see a church every 8 or 10 miles of travel with its spire rising upward into the sky and pointing the way heavenward to eternal life and teaching our people the blessed doctrine of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

I want to talk about Iowa agriculture. Bread is the foundation of all security and happiness. We cannot be morally minded on a chronic dyspeptic, empty stomach. A lean and hungry man looks into the dark places and sees plots, seditions, and devilry. A full dinner pail is always associated with a happy mind and a contrite heart. A country is peaceful only when it is well fed. Then the arts flourish and contented and happy homes abound and men and women live in harmony with each other and with God. Hungry men break forth in dissent and rebellion; but no one ever saw fat men heading a riot, or herding together in turbulent mobs.

When I produce food, I contribute to faith, to religion, and to God. When I produce food, I protect the Republic. All of the great captains tell us that armies march upon their bellies—and farming is therefore patriotism in militant action. A study of history will bear me out in asserting that agriculture is the basis upon which is founded all great and enduring nations. Whoever gives bread to the hungry is lending to the Lord. Therefore, all hail to Iowa! Her crops alone add more than $1,000,000 to her wealth every time the sun goes down in her glorious golden western horizon. No area of like size in this world can compare with her in this; and that is why she stands first in the things that make for a greater and grander country, a happier people, a higher civilization, and a better spirituality and religious faith.

Do you know that Iowa's soil produces more each year than all of the gold mines of the United States and more than has ever come out of Alaska during the 60 years that she has been within the protection of our flag? We give the country one-tenth of its food. Our farms are worth more than the combined farms of 11 Eastern and Southern States that I could mention. I assert that her farmers are entitled to prosperity. They ought to receive at least as much for their food products as the cost of producing them plus a reasonable profit. But they do not, and they have been at a great disadvantage when compared to other industries because agricultural prices have been on a distinctly lower level than industrial prices for more than 20 years.

During these years thousands and thousands of farmers lost their homes, and tenancy increased by leaps and bounds. We distinguish the years from 1909 to 1914 as being those upon which we base parity. When we give the farm dollar parity, then we give it buying force in the markets, so that it will buy as much of the things that farmers need and use as it did in those base years. Such things have nearly doubled in price, but bushels of grain and pounds of meat are about the same price as before. For example, a mower that used to cost $45 now sells for nearly a hundred dollars, and binders now cost $260 that once sold for less than half of that amount.

In asking for parity, farmers ask only for economic equality. They want neither alms nor charity, nor pity—they ask only for justice, a thing that the righteous pray for and the wicked fear. Why should they not be placed upon equal terms with other men? They work more hours per day and more days per week than does any other form of labor. They ought to be paid accordingly. They work as intelligently and as skillfully as anybody else does, and they have a right to equal returns for this skill and ability. Every laborer is worthy of his hire. Why should not agriculture be equal to other industries? Why should it not be at par? I affirm that society does not have the right to eat bread unless it is willing to pay the cost of producing that bread to the man who produces it. If society pays less, it is a cheat and a fraud and believes in sweatshops and scabs. No. The farmer and his wife and children have the right to live according to the best standards of comfort and culture that prevail in this twentieth century of Christian civilization.

But we find that there are a lot of calamity howlers who grieve because Congress has provided that the Commodity Credit Corporation should loan 85 percent of the value of corn as a basic farm commodity. But these calamity howlers aside from the right of it conceal the fact that such loans are nearly always repaid. They grouch and growl at the thought of giving to Iowa farmers any benefit payments because of or on account of the sacrifices they are asked to make in the conservation program. In 1939 agriculture's share was only 8.10 percent of the Nation's income, but 25 percent of our people were really dirt farmers and they were carrying 14 percent of all capital investment. And at no time since 1920 have the farmers of our State received any just share of this national income. Even now at the time that I am speaking and after the much-vaunted rise in farm-commodity prices on account of the war, I find that the prices paid by farmers for the things that they buy, including interest and taxes, are 130 percent of parity, and the ratio of the prices received by farmers to the prices paid by them, with interest and taxes, is only 91 percent of what it ought to be. These are the figures of the Department of Agriculture for June 15, this year. This is some improvement over previous conditions, but this is caused by the war inflationary trend. Congress has just passed laws which are intended to raise farm prices, but we met the determined opposition of plutocratic influence in passing such laws, although just arguments cannot be given to show that farmers should not have parity loans.

When calamity howlers speak of subsidies to Iowa farmers they are putting the cart before the horse, because during all of these later years Iowa farmers have been subsidizing consumers instead of receiving subsidies themselves. As proof of this, compare six great farm products and you will find that the farmers of Iowa have failed to get cost of production or parity, but have contributed to others what they lost themselves. The difference in milk prices between a just parity for farmers and the price received by them in 1939—the last year statistically available—was $37,000,000. On eggs we lost $29,000,000. Hogs represented a deficit of $106,000,000 in our State alone, and Iowa wheat, barley, and oats contributed another $43,000,000 of loss suffered by our Iowa farmers. In that one year Iowa agriculture got $215,000,000 less than it was entitled to have under a parity program; and received back in benefit payments only about $60,000,000, making a net loss so large that we were contributing to the consumers almost but not quite a half a million dollars per day on these six commodities alone.

The trouble has been that many of these industrialists have been supported all of these years by artificial schemes and devices that have increased the prices of the things which the farmer must buy, such as railway freight rates, tariffs, custom duties, quotas, franchises, patents, and all of the other things that bolster up manufacturing and trade and transportation and wages.

When the Congress or the country gets ready to repeal all of these artificial laws that grant benefits to a thousand different industries and groups of people, when the men from Massachusetts or New Mexico, or wherever they may live, are ready to repeal the laws that increase the prices which the farmer must pay, when they get ready to repeal the tariffs and all of the other factitious things referred to, then the farmers will not expect any sort of benefit payments. Then the farmer will take care of himself. Do not worry about that; he will feed himself and have a roof over his head. He will then be on a parity with the fellows who are constantly complaining about farm legislation, but this will be because the other fellows will be brought low and not because farmers will be brought up. It will be too bad. I am not in favor of doing this, nor of repealing these things that I refer to. I am in favor of them; they make a better America for all of us; but I do say to those who rail at Iowa agriculture that when you get ready to repeal these other things, then farmers might treat with you about repealing farm benefits.

Let everybody be on a parity basis. Special privilege for none and parity for all.

Samuel Chapman Massingale

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE, late a Representative from the State of Oklahoma

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I first became acquainted with SAMUEL CHAPMAN MASSINGALE when he entered this body as a freshman 8 years ago. One of his first assignments was to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, of which committee I have the honor to be the chairman. During his work with the committee he displayed a great degree of understanding and humanitarianism, and I enjoyed working with him.

Congressman MASSINGALE was a conscientious and painstaking public servant who gave every question that came to his official attention a thorough and unselfish study, who pondered deeply over all questions of public interest which required his care and study, and who, had he been with us longer, would have assuredly become one of the most prominent Members of the House.

Fate decreed otherwise. Stricken when his usefulness was at its height, Congressman MASSINGALE left in all of us a sense of deep conviction that in his death Congress lost a useful Member, and the country at large will long mourn his passing.

Lt. Howard Abbott

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE OSCEOLA (IOWA) SENTINEL

Mr. LeCOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, 2 weeks ago 33 brave boys of the United States Navy went to their deaths in one of the greatest submarine disasters of recent years when the O–9 submerged off the coast of New Hampshire and was not able to return to the surface. Probably no one will ever know exactly what occurred, but we can say with assurance that Howard J. Abbott, of Osceola, Iowa, who commanded the submarine, and his 32 companions met death as courageously and as unselfishly as any defenders that this Republic has ever had. They occupy an unmarked grave on the bottom of the ocean beneath 440 feet of water. It seems probable that the O–9 will never be raised and that for all time to come these men will sleep at their posts of duty.

At this time I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a tribute to Commander Abbott from his home-town paper, the Sentinel, at Osceola, Iowa. This beautiful tribute by the editor, Hon. John M. Grimes, is paid to Commander Abbott, who was appointed to Annapolis in 1927 by my distinguished predecessor, Hon. Lloyd Thurston. It may apply equally to each and every one of his companions:

[From the Osceola (Iowa) Sentinel]

LT. HOWARD ABBOTT

The whole country mourns the loss of 33 brave lads who went down to their deaths in the U. S. submarine O–9, when it dropped 440 feet to the bottom of the Atlantic off the coast of New Hampshire.

The heartstrings of every citizen in Osceola and Clarke County were touched by the tragedy because the commander of that submersible was Lt. Howard Abbott, only son of one of the most prominent and well-known families in southern Iowa.

Howard was not born in Osceola but came here when but a child. This was his boyhood home and here he went through the grades and high school. His young manhood was spent here until his ambition to join the Navy took him to Annapolis, where he won high honors. Distinctions in that institution are recognized only when they are merited.

As a boy, as a young man in his teens, and all through life Lieutenant Abbott displayed those traits of character that make a real man. His love of parents and home was idealistic. His early training instilled discipline, and it was the rule of his naval activity to recognize superior authority. He expected the same courtesy from those under his command. That he won recognition and rapid advancement since graduating from Annapolis is convincing evidence of the invaluable service he was rendering his country. His ability to climb to the higher peaks in the field of chosen activity was unchallenged till the fates decreed otherwise.

The Sentinel feels a personal loss in the death of this brilliant young man. Not so much because we knew him. Our acquaintance was only casual. He was in Annapolis when we came to Osceola to take over the Sentinel, having purchased it from F. M. Abbott, the father, who was the editor and part owner. Since his retirement from the newspaper field it has been our good fortune to know and to appreciate the fine qualities of this most estimable family. We feel the loss because the country is deprived of the services of an efficient officer and because we sympathize deeply with those whose grief is fathomless.

Lieutenant Abbott sleeps beneath the waters of the Atlantic with the 32 under his command. None came back to tell the story of the great tragedy. His rest is undisturbed by noise of engine or the boom of cannon. Careless alike of sunshine or clouds, his work is finished.

There are those of us who sometimes bemoan the fact that the burial ground is beyond the reach of the tender hands of loved ones; that flowers, the emblems of purity and devotion, must ride upon the turbulent and ofttimes violent waters of an unruly and relentless sea. Our philosophy of life is that it matters little where the "windowless palace" may be located; whether the dews of night, kissed by a morning's sun, may glisten on the blanket of sod, or whether the depth of water shuts out the light of a beautiful day. It's the life that counts.

The parents have with them always the picture of an obedient son, a fine scholar, a brilliant officer, as they, too, walk toward the evening star.

The bereaved wife and children have the comforting thought that the husband and father exhibited all the qualities of a real gentleman and a patriot.

And may we add that within the span of 31 years Lt. Howard Abbott wrote upon the scroll of time a life's work that will be remembered and serve as an example for others long after an epitaph on a tablet of marble is obscured by the icy winds of winter and the withering blasts of summer. "He sleeps well; life's fitful dream is o'er."

Wheat Farmers and the Battle for Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. HOOK

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

ADDRESS OF SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE CLAUDE R. WICKARD

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the Secretary of Agriculture, Claude R. Wickard, over Farm and Home Hour in Hutchinson, Kans., Monday, May 19, 1941:

I welcome the opportunity to speak with you today, and I only wish it were possible for us to spend the time comfortably discussing some of the ordinary problems of the world and of agriculture in particular.

Unfortunately, an ordinary problem is a luxury today. Before us are a whole set of extraordinary problems, born of a time as critical as any in all our history.

Overshadowing everything is the world crisis. The times through which we are passing will decide what kind of a future the United States will have. We are determining whether we intend to remain a great democracy and perhaps a great world power.

We must plan our lives and everything we do in the light of the world situation. What farmers plant and when they plant it is directly affected by the titanic struggle going on overseas. Here in this great granary region we must decide what to do about wheat in the light of the developments brought about by the war. And one important decision about wheat must be made very soon—the decision on wheat-marketing quotas on May 31.

This is a time of trouble and yet Americans have many things to be thankful for. One reason for thanksgiving is that the power of making decisions still rests with the people of the United States. When wheat farmers go to the polls on May 31 they vote their own convictions. They will say what is to be done. This is not true in many countries in the world today, and the number of countries in which the people speak and are heard has grown smaller and smaller within the past few years.

So while our problems multiply, let us remember that the privilege of saying what will be done about them is priceless. It is a democratic privilege. Let us use wisely this privilege so that it will be the heritage of our children. Nothing we can leave them will mean more to them, or more to the generations yet unborn over all this earth.

To make wise decisions we need to know the facts. What then, in view of the vote on May 31, are some of the facts about wheat? For one thing, we have a record amount of old wheat on hand and a bumper crop in prospect. That is something to be looked at with satisfaction on one hand and with alarm on the other. The huge stocks of wheat show that the country has an ample supply of one of our most precious foods. In this critical time the abundance of wheat should be a comfort to every person in America.

But farmers, by sad experience, have learned that large supplies can mean glutted markets, low prices, and hard times that bring almost as much suffering to farmers as scarcity of bread would bring to city consumers.

And, because of the world wheat situation, farmers this year have other reasons for alarm. They know that the usual world market for wheat has almost disappeared and that the world outside the United States has a record supply of wheat, too. From the standpoint of our exports, the wheat situation was never worse.

I spoke just a moment ago about our record carry-over of wheat. We are going into the new wheat marketing year with a carry-over of old wheat of around 400,000,000 bushels. The bins are bulging, the terminals spilling over. Another good crop is coming along. The estimates foreshadow a total crop of around 800,000,000 bushels.

Add that to the 400,000,000-bushel carry-over and we have almost a billion and a quarter bushels. What are we going to do with all that wheat? We have storage capacity for 800,000,000 to 900,000,000 bushels. Until the mills grind a couple of hundred million bushels some of this year's crop will be housed in temporary storage. Maybe some of it will be piled on the ground like Canada's 1940 crop.

We'll be lucky if we export 25,000,000 bushels during the season. To be liberal, let's say we consume 700,000,000 bushels domestically. That leaves 475,000,000 bushels to carry into the succeeding marketing year. Plain arithmetic tells us how badly we need a wheat-marketing quota.

Some farmers may ask why we need a wheat-marketing quota if we don't need a corn quota. Well, we have found a new export demand for corn in the form of meat, milk, and eggs for Britain. Bigger pay rolls in this country mean more meat consumed at home. We want to be sure there is no shortage of corn to produce this food that we need for the British and for ourselves.

Britain will need little of our wheat and we have seen to it that there will be no shortage, no matter what the demand. Because of the uncertain world situation we deliberately planted several million extra acres of wheat this year. Most of it turned out well. All danger of scarcity has passed and now the danger is the danger of glut. Farmers should not be penalized because they have provided insurance against shortages of food.

The Nation wants farmers safeguarded against unfair penalties. The Nation also wants other protection given agriculture. One expression of this wish is the national farm programs. These programs protect all farmers. Since the second World War began, commodity loans have stood between wheat producers and the economic blitzkrieg.

Without the programs, wheat prices would be threatening the low record of 1932 instead of being within striking distance of parity as they are now.

As you all know, parity is one of the most important objectives of the national farm programs and will continue to be a goal, just as soil conservation, for example, will continue to be a goal. We've been trying to reach that parity goal since 1933 and we've made a lot of progress.

This administration developed the parity concept and the President has worked for it all along. Had it not been for such setbacks as the Supreme Court decision, which killed the original triple A, farmers probably would have had parity long ago. The President is still working for parity, and in this connection I have some grand news. I talked to the President only a few hours before I left Washington. He told me he wants the basic crops to reach parity this year. He told me also that he thinks wheat farmers, taking loans and payments into account, will get parity on this year's crop.

This news is further proof—although none is needed—that Franklin D. Roosevelt is the best friend that farmers have ever had in the White House.

The President told me that he knew farmers want fair treatment and want to be fair in return. He said he was sure they did not want loans or money paid out of the Treasury to bring their prices higher than parity levels. He told me—and I use his exact words—"In this critical time, you can depend on it that farmers won't rock the boat."

If wheat farmers do get parity—and I'm sure they will—farmers should not overlook the work of farm organization leaders who have labored steadfastly for equality for agriculture. And, a lot of the credit must go to Congress. Only last week the Senate and House sent to the White House a bill calling for an 85 percent of parity loan for wheat and the other basic commodities.

But no wheat loan will be made unless wheat farmers vote for marketing quotas and without the loan there is no hope for parity on wheat in 1941. So parity for wheat is up to the wheat farmers themselves.

For all their difficulties, American farmers have the fattest pocketbooks of any farmers in the world. Take wheat farmers, for example. If we look around us a bit, we will soon see how well off, comparatively speaking, they are and how effective the wheat programs really are. We need to look no further than across our northern border at our good neighbor, Canada.

Average prices of wheat to Kansas wheat growers in mid-May were about 80 cents. This compares with about 45 cents to Canadian farmers (United States money). Leaving out Government payments, American producers probably will receive over twice as much for this year's wheat as Canadian growers.

Every wheat farmer ought to rejoice that he is raising wheat in the United States of America. I join in that rejoicing for I am not only a corn-hog farmer, I am a wheat farmer too. I hold Wheat Marketing Quota Card No. 1, and am proud of the honor. My wheat allotment is only 36.7 acres. This may seem pretty small to your Kansas people but in common with other small wheat growers, I want protection just as much as anyone else.

In return for this protection, wheat farmers must help protect themselves. Congress has said to us, in effect:

"You'll be given protection if you'll put your own house in order. You'll be given protection provided you're willing to keep the market from being glutted with surplus wheat."

The law provides that wheat loans will not be made if wheat growers vote down marketing quotas. This provision seems fair to me. If we aren't willing to protect our own farm programs, we can't expect them to protect us.

The continuance—or discontinuance—of Government loans on wheat is at stake in this referendum on May 31. To put it bluntly, no quotas, no loans. And, judging from prices in Canada, rejection of marketing quotas on May 31 would just about cut the price of wheat in this country in half.

Some other things involved in the decision wheat farmers are going to make on May 31 go beyond the wheat loan and prices for wheat. These things go to the heart of some questions that are being asked nowadays: Is democracy outmoded? Can we continue to make democracy effective? Can wheat farmers, for example, work out their economic problems through the democratic processes?

Now, of course, I am not saying that the continuance of democracy depends on the result of the wheat referendum. That would be going much too far. Yet in this period the world is looking at every move we make and how we meet every test. From these moves conclusions will be drawn as to whether our democracy has gone soft, or whether it is hard and packs a real punch, and whether it can do the job it must do to survive.

As a farmer, I know the necessity for higher prices for farm products. I know that parity prices are fair and just. But I want these parity prices to be put on a stable and lasting basis. High prices without adjustment of supply are certain to be followed by ruinously low prices. We know that from experience. We want fair prices now and fair prices later on. We don't want another Farm Board fiasco.

I wish that corn and wheat farmers were able to vote on marketing quotas before they plant their crops, instead of afterward as is the case now. Cotton, tobacco, and rice farmers vote on quotas before they plant and I see no good reason for denying this privilege to wheat and corn growers. I am sorry that the legislation authorizing loans at 85 percent of parity did not change the time for voting on wheat and corn quotas. This provision was recommended by the Department of Agriculture and we plan to recommend it to Congress again. Yet the fact that the referendum on wheat quotas comes after the crop is almost ready for harvest in no way alters the significance of the vote.

The wheat vote is significant but within the near future, farmers, and the American people, have other decisions to make that are far more significant. We must decide how the Nation is to conduct itself in a world that is on fire. Are we going to help put out the flames or are we going to wait and hope that the blaze doesn't reach us?

I know the war seems a long way off and here in Kansas a lot of us feel safe because we have the good old Atlantic and Pacific Oceans between us and the actual fighting. Perhaps some people rely also on Hitler's word that he has no designs on this hemisphere.

The ones who rely on Hitler's word must be a pretty small group after all. Chamberlain's England relied on Hitler's word. Poland relied on Hitler's word. Belgium and other conquered countries relied on Hitler's word. To Hitler a promise is something to be broken when the time comes.

"But what about the oceans?" someone may ask. They are very real things, thousands of miles wide.

Throughout our history we have been blessed by the existence of these oceans. We have been blessed by their existence, however, only because for more than 100 years they have remained in the control of friendly powers.

But if one or both of these oceans should fall under the control of powers unfriendly to us, then our friendly, protective oceans become highways of menace and invasion.

That is a simple fact, but it is of supreme importance to the future of this Nation.

For generations past the British Isles and the British Navy in the Atlantic Ocean have been friendly to us and have enabled us to keep most of our fleet in the broad reaches of the Pacific, there to protect our interests and our future. We do not yet have a fleet big enough to patrol two hostile oceans. Meanwhile, if we have the sense Yankees are traditionally credited with, we will do everything in our power to see that the British Navy remains intact and on our side.

Whatever may be said about past sins or present motives of Britain is beside the point in this present moment. What is to the point, if we are hard-headedly concerned about the interests of the United States, is our ability and determination to keep Britain and the British Navy afloat and in control of the Atlantic Ocean.

Accordingly it is plainly to our interest, let alone being a national pledge and commitment, to live up to the announced intentions of the Lend Lease Act. We agreed in that act, by an overwhelming majority, to provide Britain and other democracies with the armament and the food with which to carry on the fight against aggression and world conquest.

It is true that Hitler has not crossed the English Channel. Now, why not? We all know why. It is because he is held back, first, because of the courage and bravery of the people in Britain. Second, because he has respect for the English Navy and air force.

These obstacles stand between Hitler and the island of Britain. They also stand between Hitler and the United States.

I don't like to think of what would happen if the courage or endurance of the English gave out, and the English Navy, the French Navy, the Italian Navy, the German Navy were all under control of the world's most ruthless conqueror. Add to this navy the potential production of the shipyards in countries under German control. What does it mean? It means that men and machines could be transported to this hemisphere faster by the Atlantic Ocean than if that body of water were dry land. You could blow up railroads and their terminals and you could wreck highways. But you can't blow up the ocean and you can't wreck it.

The British Isles and the British Navy are our first line of defense. If they are taken over by any European country, our naval and air bases in the Atlantic and the Panama Canal would all be in a precarious position. If these bases fall into hostile hands, what then? You know the answer to that question as well as I do.

Together the United States and Britain can exceed the production of Germany and all the countries she has occupied from Norway to Greece. But if England goes down, Germany and her allies exceed us in productive capacity. Modern wars are won by productive power, the ability to make planes, tanks, and guns. Let those who advocate leaving Britain to her fate think about our situation if Britain should fall.

Let us not deceive ourselves. Some persons said Germany did not have the resources for a long war. She has them now, or seems to be well on her way toward getting them. Hitler is systematically exploiting the conquered countries. They are paying billions of dollars in tribute to the conqueror and millions of their citizens are working for him. Millions of French, Belgian, Dutch, and Danish farmers re working for the Nazis. They have to work for him whether they want to or not. Hitler has gained in strength from the time this war began. With Great Britain on her feet, the democracies still are stronger than the Nazis and Fascists combined. With Great Britain down the picture changes.

We are producing food and munitions for Britain as fast as we can. We will be producing in even greater volume a few weeks and months hence. But now we learn that quite a bit of this product of our sweat and toil is not reaching its destination. Some of it is getting no farther than the bottom of the Atlantic. Yet there are people who say all we have to do is produce and not bother about delivery.

But the Lease Lend Act was not merely a device by which we would increase production in this country; my recollection is that it was a pledge, a deliberate and carefully conceived pledge, to help the democracies of the world in their battle against nazi-ism. We made this pledge only after weeks of debate and careful consideration, with full knowledge that whatever the risks involved, this was the course best calculated to preserve and protect the interests of the United States.

There is no sense in producing for delivery at the bottom of the ocean. There can be only absurdity, anticlimax and danger in that course. I say, let's see that the goods are delivered. And I'm sure the people here in the Plains—you Kansans backed by the tradition of the Beecher Bible and rifle colonists of Fred Funston and his twentieth infantry—I'm sure you say the same. Your history proclaims that you will do what needs to be done in your own interests and in the national interests. It may have to be done the hard way, but that's a Kansas tradition also. Your State motto says "To the stars through difficulties."

The same spirit of determination runs through all these Plains States that are the great Wheat Belt of America. Kansans, Oklahomans, Nebraskans, Texans, Dakotans, and all the men of the Plains are ready to fight for the ideals they hold sacred. You will do what has to be done.

Some persons are saying that the odds against us already are too great; that we'd better pipe down and keep quiet. I don't think there are many of those persons or that they amount to very much. The events of recent days give new proof that the Nazis are deliberately trying to form a combination of nations to attack us. I know what the answer of the American people will be to that. The answer to any dictatorship combination aimed at the United States will be something the Nazis understand and respect—armed might.

All over this world of ours humanity is watching the United States. We are the only hope of millions living in bondage. In Latin America many countries are watching us to see whether we will make good our promises, or whether we simply mean to talk and gesture. If democracy has grown soft and flabby, why perhaps other countries will embrace a way of life that, for all its terror, seems to have iron in its soul. In Britain millions are watching us. They have fought a gallant fight, but they can't go on unless our help is made effective. The Nazis and Fascists are watching us and every sign of indecision and division fills them with joy. If we simply talk, why the rest is easy. They'll rule the world and spit on democracy every day.

I don't think the American people want to live in a world run by the Nazis. I don't think they intend to live in a world run by the Nazis. A world run by the Nazis means the destruction of freedom and democracy in the United States. We'll do whatever is necessary to protect our freedom and our democracy.

Production for National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JARED Y. SANDERS, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE BATON ROUGE PEOPLE'S WEEKLY

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. Speaker, all of us realize that the problem of production for national defense is the most serious problem confronting us. This question of production requires that management and labor should coordinate their efforts with the least possible friction.

One of the best expressions on this issue that I have read is that contained in an editorial in the Baton Rouge (La.) People's Weekly, a paper published in my home city of Baton Rouge, La., which paper usually expresses the viewpoint of organized labor.

The editorial in question is contained in the issue of June 13, 1941, and reads as follows:

[From the Baton Rouge People's Weekly]

NOW IS THE TIME

(By Ruth Taylor)

The editorial pages of every newspaper, the commentators whose voices ring out over the radio dial, all proclaim the same thing—management and labor must get together.

Prejudice or bias for one side or another often colors this clamor, but it still rises from both sides—and, far more important to both, from the great middle ground of the public, who are tired of the strife and are keenly conscious of their own danger if an agreement is not reached.

In this outcry for better understanding lies the golden opportunity for those who are honestly and sincerely trying to bring about better industrial relations. With the attention of all the people focused on this subject, there is opportunity for the forceful and accurate presentation of all the facts. No attempt of selfish interests to accomplish their own ends can succeed under steady public scrutiny. Therefore, at a time when the most important need of the country as a whole is unified action, there is a real chance for a fair and equable settlement of long-range industrial disputes.

To arrive at this solution, both management and labor must consider the problems concerned, not only from their own viewpoint but from the viewpoint of each other. The facts must all be put on the table and the arguments for each side given not in heat and anger, but with full knowledge and consideration of the common problems we are all facing.

Once they have arrived at the facts, then is the opportunity for a permanent solution. Both sides will have to be ready to give up something for the common good, for only when there is a real feeling of partnership can there be a relationship that will endure. This does not mean setting wages or hours on a permanent basis, but it does mean working out a system by which all disputes can be settled amicably and fairly.

Surely both sides have brains enough to work out such a system. All that is needed is the desire to do so.

The real leaders of labor have gone on record as to their wish for such a settlement. They are the articulate representatives of the rank and file of workingmen who make up the great mass of people throughout the length and breadth of this land. If public opinion were marshalled back of them in this effort, the day of peace in industrial relations would be far closer at hand. But they must have the support of every earnest and sincere member of union labor and the surety that their decisions will be abided by, their counsel heeded.

Now is the time for action.

The Cloakroom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, as the fog raises we see greatness in Hoover and Landon.

Shades of Doc Wirt—the welcome sign will be hung out for the comrades.

One might say that F. D. R.'s early pledge of aid to the Soviet was Russeveltian.

The HAM FISH poll of Hyde Park, N. Y., shows the people 8 to 1 against going to war.

Paderewski's body resting for the present in Arlington will add a sweeter requiem to taps.

The incongruous alinement with Russia has set our foreign war back, so Congress is planning on taking a recess.

The Government is going to tax pop and radios. After all, we were warned that sweat, blood, and toil were ahead.

Willkie and Knox have tried hard to make a donkey out of the elephant, while Great Britain easily has made a jackass out of the donkey.

The important thing about the Knox proposal to use our Navy now to drive the Nazis out of the Atlantic is, Was the President speaking?

Senator GEORGE, chairman of Foreign Relations Committee, spoke against undeclared war. This is, for peace, next in importance to the Russian situation.

The alacrity with which Cordell Hull and Sumner Welles embraced the Soviet was exceeded only by Hitler's discovery of Russian crimes against the German minority.

We pay tribute to the American people—they are no nearer to war themselves than they were 6 months ago, in spite of millions of Government money for propaganda.

According to present English and German standards and American standards of the last war, the Robin Moor was 75 percent contraband, yet that was concealed in the former chat.

Flood Protection in Northeast Louisiana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NEWT V. MILLS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, in the course of human events the group as well as the individual is sometimes made happy and at other times saddened, so this day brings new hope to my people. I especially want to thank the Flood Control Committee for agreeing to provide on pages 10 and 11 of the flood-control bill the following language:

The Boeuf floodway in the project adopted by the act of May 15, 1928, and the Eudora floodway as well as the northward extension and the back protection levee extending from the head of the said Eudora floodway north to the Arkansas River in the project, adopted by the act of June 15, 1936, as amended, are hereby abandoned, and the provisions of said acts relating to the prosecution of work on said floodways and extensions are hereby repealed.

Not only do I personally thank you but as a Representative of my people, northeast Louisiana, I feel I am expressing their feelings when I say we all thank you for including an amendment that will eliminate the Eudora and Boeuf floodways.

WHY NORTHEAST LOUISIANA DOES NOT HAVE MORE INDUSTRY DEVELOPMENT

May 3, 1937, I attempted to point out on this floor the many disadvantages and the costly results that would work on my section if either the Eudora or Boeuf floodways were constructed. Further, since 1928 northeast Louisiana has suffered a loss of industrial development, and certainly a loss of general business expansion due to the proposed Eudora and Boeuf floodways. Certain agencies of the Federal Government have refused to entertain an application for any recognition to be extended my section, and certainly a number of times private enterprise found my section desirable, since we were blessed with the largest gas field in the world, developed electric power, skilled and unskilled labor, and an abundance of varied raw materials, but as soon as private industry learned of the proposed floodways they refused to locate in my section.

LEVEES

My people are happy that H. R. 4911 proposes to raise the fuse-plug levee in Arkansas that has caused so much fear in the Delta lands of northeast Louisiana. Further, we are pleased that the entire levee-line system of the Mississippi River will be improved.

FLOWAGE RIGHTS

The Flood Control Act of May 15, 1928, left to the States or levee districts the function of providing rights-of-way and flowage easements required for set-backs on the main Mississippi River; however, realizing relocation of levee lines resulted in the loss of property to landowners, I introduced H. R. 6620 in 1937, which provided that the United States should pay for the cost of flowage easements and rights-of-way, including compensation for damages to improvements thereon. So it is with appreciation that section (d) of the flood-control bill provides:

The Chief of Engineers, with approval of the Secretary of War, shall reimburse local authorities for actual expenditures found by the Chief of Engineers to be reasonable, for providing at the request of the United States, in accordance with local legal procedure or custom, rights-of-way and flowage easements required for future setbacks of main-line Mississippi River levees.

However, I do not think we go far enough by only advocating the payment of lands hereafter taken, as a large number of landowners have been denied payment for damages done as a result of set-back or relocation levees on the Mississippi River and the Flood Control Committee of the House in 1935, after extensive hearings, came to the conclusion, as a matter of law and equity, that the payment of these lands taken from our farmers for set-back or relocation of levee lines rests upon the United States. Further, the War Department that year stated they had the utmost sympathy for an owner whose property was injured without compensation, so I contend all property owners who have been forced to furnish lands for flowage easements in the past should be paid.

RED RIVER BACKWATER AREA

I am happy an authorization of $6,976,000 for the construction of a levee and improvements from the main-line levee on the west bank of the Mississippi River in the vicinity of Shaw, La., westward and northward to the vicinity of Newlight, La., for the protection of the Red River backwater area, known as the Tensas-Cocodrie area, is included.

I do not contend this provision will solve the Red River backwater question completely, but certainly it will materially help my section.

Up to the year 1927 this area suffered little from backwater. Since then the farms in the lower part of the area have been flooded at intervals as high as 7 feet.

It seems intolerable that this new, almost yearly, damage should be inflicted on a rich farming country, so I suggest that the intake on the new Morganza floodway might be lowered to take the minor Mississippi River floods before they back up on Concordia, Catahoula, and Tensas Parishes.

OUACHITA RIVER AND ITS TRIBUTARIES

General Tyler has given us in part a favorable report on the Ouachita River and its tributaries or recommended three major improvements, namely: First, an enlarged ring levee around Jonesville, La., or a levee project for the protection of Jonesville and vicinity in lieu of the presently authorized project.

Second, that the channel of Big Creek and of Colewa Creek—Big Colewa Bayou—below Caney Bayou be improved; that a diversion canal between Big Colewa Bayou and Boeuf River be excavated, and that levees, and appurtenant drainage works for protection from Tiger Bayou floodwaters be constructed, provided local interests have organized and furnished satisfactory assurances that they will assume responsibility for all future maintenance.

Third, that channel improvement on Bayou Bartholomew and channel improvements and a new outlet channel on Deep Bayou be constructed, provided local interests have organized and provided satisfactory assurances that they will assume responsibility for all future maintenance.

I hope if the Flood Control Committee receives this report before the Senate finally adopts H. R. 4911 that you will agree to include the recommendations for works that have not already been provided, as my section is in desperate need of drainage.

Last year we had excessive rains in Northeast Louisiana to such an extent that the Federal Surplus Marketing Administration had to feed approximately one-half the people for several months; however, if we had the proper drainage improvements a large portion of this water could have been drained from the lands thereby saving our crops.

COMMENDATION

Brig. Gen. Max C. Tyler and the entire Mississippi River Commission, as well as Maj. Gen. Julian L. Schley, of the Office of the Chief of Engineers, and his excellent staff, deserve commendation from this Congress in having submitted to Congress five alternative procedures that might be adopted in helping to solve the flood problem in the lower Mississippi Valley.

The Congressional Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

WAR DEBTS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, but for the brief press notice which appeared on June 15 the war debts resulting from the first World War and which are still owed to this country would have been entirely forgotten. It so happens that June 15 is a semiannual payment debt day which accounts for the brief public reminder that the debts still exist and are still unpaid. The moratorium on war debts which was imposed at the instance of President Hoover in 1931 has virtually killed all effort at repayment, and only scattered payments have been made by the debtor nations with the exception of Finland. This little country has made payment on every debt on which an installment is due. The aggregate debts with accrued interest now reaches the staggering sum of little over thirteen and one-half billion dollars. The remaking of the European map intrudes some rather interesting problems in connection with war debts. Armenia, for instance, still owes $25,000,000, but the status of Armenia at the present moment is almost unknown. Austria owes $26,000,000, but nobody seems to know how, when, or where payment will ever be made since Austria was taken over by Germany and the latter country refuses to acknowledge the debt. Similarly, Russia in the day of czar regime owed $405,000,000, but the revolutionary Russia of today refuses to acknowledge this obligation. Similar difficulties may arise in connection with the debt of Belgium, Hungary, France, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Rumania, who have been overwhelmed by the Nazi armies. Likewise, the Soviet influence in Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania may make collection of this indebtedness virtually impossible. Thus the shadow of war falls athwart the interest of our own country.

A LESSON IN PUBLIC MORALITY

Some years ago Congress enacted a law under which payments are made to States for the purpose of conducting agricultural research. These payments aggregate $2,400,000 annually and are apportioned among the States on the basis of rural population. When the census figures for 1940 were disclosed it became manifest that some States lost rural population and would therefore lose a part of the funds under the above-mentioned law. In fact, 22 States and 1 Territory would lose a total sum of $63,708. Then began a hue and cry that, notwithstanding the census figures, these States should receive the same amount that they had heretofore received, and a concerted effort was made in this direction. The basic law still stands which provides apportionment of the funds on the basis of the rural population. But Congress was called upon by persons in such States to ignore its own enactment and provide the extra funds for the States involved. Would you call that a lesson in public morality?

THE WORLD'S GREATEST SHIPBUILDING PROGRAM

The long-range program of the United States merchant marine, which was initiated in 1938, calls for the construction of 500 ships, to cost $1,250,000,000. Eighty-six of this number have actually been delivered. The second part of the ship-construction program calls for 200 cargo vessels, referred to as ugly ducklings because they will be of box-type design and render themselves to speedy construction. The third component in this program calls for 222 ships to be built under the Lend Lease Act for transfer to Great Britain. In addition, 60 cargo vessels are under construction, which were ordered by the British Government, and 86 vessels are being built for private account without the aid of the Federal Government. There are 760 merchant vessels that are being built or that are on order in the United States today, and to carry on this construction program has required the building of 103 new shipways, either in existing shipyards or on new sites. This is by all odds the most colossal ship construction ever undertaken by any country at any given time.

PARADOX

The dictionary defines a paradox as something which appears contradictory. It is something which appears to be what it is not. Well, it would seem to be a paradox to say that the more money we spend on national defense, the more unemployment we are likely to have. That sounds unbelievable, but let's take a look. The list of items on which defense has priority seems to be growing larger with each week and is now as long as your arm. Take aluminum, for example. Suppose you were a manufacturer employing 500 men making kitchenware out of aluminum and suddenly you found that you could not get the material with which to work. You would have a choice of shutting down or using other materials or getting some defense contracts. But suppose your machinery was not adapted to other kinds of material and could not be used on defense contracts. Then what? Obviously, you would have to shut down. But what of the 500 men in your employ? They would be jobless. No less an authority than the Assistant to the Chief of the Defense Contracts Service stated recently to a meeting of the field officers of this agency that—

Already not less than 10 entire industries whose supplies have been drastically curtailed or completely shut off must either close down or enter a new line of production.

It is intimated that one-third of all American industry is confronted with the grim reality of lack of materials. The defense program is only now getting into high gear. What will the situation be 6 months hence? And what about the idle men and idle machines that will result? Did you say paradox?

Independence Day, 1941

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. GRANT

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, 165 years ago this Independence Day the Thirteen Original Colonies unanimously declared:

When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

On this Independence Day our President has said:

As the birthday of American independence draws near it is altogether fitting that we should rededicate ourselves to defend and perpetuate those inalienable rights which found true expression in the immortal Declaration. Those words never had a deeper or more solemn meaning for America than they have in this hour of anxiety and peril.

Would that every American would read these words of our President over and over again and ponder well their meaning and their full significance. On this Independence Day 1941 the call goes out for men whose chief concern is not to cure all the ills of international society but rather to preserve the American system of government—a system that has secured to the people of this country more freedom and more of the physical comforts of life than the people of any other country in the world since the very beginning of time. Let us rededicate ourselves to its preservation and say again with Daniel Webster:

Thank God, I, also, am an American

Office of Civilian Defense Director LaGuardia has announced that following the President's address on Independence Day veterans and other patriotic organizations have planned to have all the people in the Nation simultaneously sing the national anthem at exactly the same time, wherever they may be.

I wish that following this singing of our national anthem the people might repeat in unison these words of George Washington, for they, too, were never more fitting than today:

If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

Many people have been asking questions as to what is wrong with our defense program, why our production program has not moved faster. The placing of men like Harry L. Hopkins, as Administrator of the Lease-Lend Act, over and above our production experts who have been summoned to Washington in this emergency has served to focus attention in this direction.

It has been charged that the defense organization, through constant change and the continued creation of additional agencies, has become confused with no responsible head. It has also been charged that such a program should not be under the control of the New Deal type of administrators, but instead should be under the guidance of a man or men with practical business experience.

The House Committee on Military Affairs has been studying several different aspects of the defense program. The committee has just released a most interesting report, which is particularly directed to critical and strategic raw materials needed for national defense. This is not a partisan investigation, but rather comes from this committee of 15 Democrats and 10 Republicans. Below are some interesting comments from the report of this committee:

It is a sad commentary on the wisdom, judgment, and initiative of the industrial and political leaders of this richest and most resourceful Nation on earth, that in the first year of her defense effort and nominally at peace, rationing of civilian supplies, priorities, price control, conservation and substitution are found necessary. * * *

Emphasis over the past few years has been made on the more immediate problem of recovery and social reform rather than national security. As a Nation we seem to have forgotten that without national security, social reform might well prove meaningless. * * *

It was painfully apparent through the testimony given before this committee that a lack of coordination and absence of a responsible head with authority and power to fix responsibility in this as well as in other matters, has been largely responsible for the deficiencies we now are experiencing all along the line. The administration has been too prone when difficult problems arose to easily dispose of them by creating another board, only to add to the confusion of the sprawling assortment of agencies we now have. We are now plagued with and will continue, evidently, to be harassed because of the absence of a coherent organization. We are overblessed with boards and committees and with a legion of liaison officers feeling the necessity of consulting first with this or that agency. All of this has resulted in a deadly consuming of time and in the end we still have a divided authority.

Our Government agencies are not amateurs in the methods of propaganda but they have failed in that they did not long ago begin educating the public as to the necessity of not squandering the materials used in our defense effort.

The entry of Communist Russia into the European imbroglio should settle once and for all any question about our entry into the war. The interventionists will most certainly not be able to induce the American people to go to war to make secure the four essential human freedoms for Soviet Russia.

A joyous Independence Day to you and yours. May we continue as a free and independent people that you may enjoy many more.

Federal Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. W. (RUNT) BISHOP

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, again I call attention of the House to the need for more sympathetic consideration of the W. P. A. appropriation bill. The fact that many people now employed were unable to get employment previously is very fine, but we still have the question of taking care of those who, through no fault of their own, are unable to get jobs. I refer to that great class of our citizens who, just because they happen to be a little over 45 years of age, cannot get work in private industry.

The reduction in the appropriation bill has but little effect on the young men of our country, who are right now the idols of national-defense industries and corporations engaged privately in peaceful pursuits, but it is going to cause the hand of poverty and want to rest on many humble homes in America—unless those on W. P. A. are adequately protected.

18-MONTH LAY-OFF IN W. P. A.

Congress has modified the 18-month lay-off requirement in the W. P. A. to provide that such workers shall be removed only in the numbers necessary to provide employment for employable persons with the same or similar job qualifications who have been certified for a period of 3 months or more as in need of Work Projects Administration project employment and who have not in such period been given employment on work projects.

That is, in no case can a person who has been on 18 months be removed at the expiration of 18 months unless, first, there is a person with his same job qualifications available; that is, if a man who has been on 18 months is a bricklayer, you would not take him off and give the job to a piccolo player, if you would give a piccolo player a job at all. That is a wise provision. You would not take him off on account of the 18-month provision unless there are persons certified who have been waiting for 3 months with the same job qualifications.

MORE PROJECTS FOR THE TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT

The Work Projects Administration has announced the allocation of $99,497 to the Southern Illinois Normal University at Carbondale for the purpose of improving grounds at the school in connection with the site for the new training school. At the same time it was also announced that $464,709 had been allotted to Randolph County to take care of the project sponsored by the county board of commissioners for the improvement of roads, streets, and alleys. The work in Randolph County is to include clearing, grading, ditches, construction of storm sewers, catch basins, and gutters. Provision was also made for the construction of sidewalks.

THE MARINES HAVE LANDED AND HAVE THE SITUATION WELL IN HAND!!!

The Navy Department has announced a United States marine detachment of 3 officers and 60 men has been sent to London to facilitate communications between the various United States offices located there. The marines will also assist as fire watchers to relieve the already overburdened embassy staff the Navy informs us.

SELECTIVE-SERVICE DEFERMENTS

Selective Service headquarters, in a memorandum to State directors clarifying national policy on dependency deferments, states all selective-service registrants with one or more dependents to whose support they make "any substantial contribution" should be deferred from military training. The only exception to this rule is that of a registrant married after the registration date who cannot prove this new status was acquired "in a manner consistent with the ordinary course of human affairs," Selective Service headquarters said. The ruling applies to both future classifications of married men and to the reconsideration of such cases already in class 1-A, the announcement said.

COMPARISON OF BRITISH DEBT TO OUR DEBTS

The total British debt, national and local, on March 31, 1941, was $63,788,843,000. On the same date, according to the Joint Congressional Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, the total United States debt, Federal and local, was $67,056,094,169.

WE REALLY SPEND IT

Each minute, the clock around, the Government now is spending $23,000 for defense and Britain; by fall it is planned to spend $32,000 to $37,000 a minute; early next year somewhere between $46,000 and $58,000 a minute, perhaps rising to $69,000 a minute before the year is out.

TELEVISION IS NOW HERE

The Federal Communications Commission has announced visual broadcast service will be inaugurated on a full-fledged commercial basis July 1 when two television stations in New York will begin the new service. Three more stations, in Los Angeles, Chicago, and Philadelphia, expect to make the transition from experimental to commercial operation in short order, the Commission said, and 17 other stations in various parts of the country have announced their intention to begin commercial operations as soon as possible.

SHOWS FOR SOLDIERS

The War Department has announced a comprehensive program of stage shows for Army camps throughout the country and civilian contributions of various kinds to the comfort and convenience of soldiers in the camps will, when nationally organized, be coordinated by the Citizens Committee for the Army and Navy, Inc. The Citizens Committee is a subordinate body within the Joint Army and Navy Committee on Welfare and Recreation and its activities will not affect the initiative of local groups or individuals who wish to contribute materials or services to the camps adjacent to their own communities.

Outstanding men in the theatrical field have been consulted and arrangements made for five road shows to travel among the camps with stage equipment built into specially constructed trucks. Experimental shows have met with such wide approval that the committee is extending its activities and establishing regional councils, headed by prominent citizens of each section, assisted by paid executives.

F. B. I. ON THE JOB

F. B. I. Director Hoover has announced the arrest of 29 men and 3 women—24 of them German—on charges of conspiracy to undermine national defense by acting as spies to obtain confidential information that concerned many phases of national defense, including factories that produced munitions, planes, tanks, and defense materials, as well as latest military devices. Nineteen were arrested in the New York area, 5 were taken into custody in New Jersey, 1 in Michigan, 1 in Wisconsin, and 1 in Brazil. All will be brought to Brooklyn, N. Y., for arraignment, and the remaining 5 are already in prison for other crimes.

Some of the ring acted as couriers and traveled to and from belligerent countries on trans-Atlantic planes of the Italian air line operating to South America, as well as on United States flag steamships and on ships of other neutral countries. Of those under arrest 2 were born in the United States, 2 were naturalized citizens, and, besides 24 Germans, the prisoners are French, Austrian, and South African. He said the most important of the prisoners is Frederick Joubert Duquesne, whose record as a spy extends for more than 40 years.

WIRE-TAPPING BILL

The efforts of the administration to have the right to spy on citizens of the United States by wire tapping was turned down in the House by a vote of 154 against to 146 for it.

OFFICIAL VISITORS TO THE OFFICE

John H. Jones, Du Quoin; John Gruelmefer, Jacob; Jack Smith, West Frankfort; Mr. and Mrs. Henry Perkins, Benton; Circuit Judge Joe Hill, Benton; Robert Hill, Benton; George Hill, Sesser; Mary Layman and Grace M. Layman, Tamaroa; and Betty Ann Winegarner, of Anna.

Why Should Not the Treasury Department Collect All Gasoline and Liquor Taxes at Their Source?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE T. ELLIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE ARKANSAS GAZETTE

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, for several years I have advocated the feasibility of the Federal Government collecting at their source all gasoline, liquor, and perhaps, other taxes on the commodities which are universally taxed by both the Federal and State Governments. In the first place, the collection would be much more efficient; in the second place, the Federal Government would deduct a small service charge and refund the State's portion to it.

Thus the people would realize much more from the tax which they levy upon themselves.

On June 14 there appeared in the Arkansas Gazette an editorial entitled, "With 48 States Collecting Varying Taxes" and in which the Arkansas Gazette endorses the idea. I quote it in full:

Secretary Morgenthau's suggestion that the Treasury take over the collection of gasoline, liquor, and certain other taxes now collected separately by Federal, State, and sometimes local governments is in line with what the Gazette has been saying on this subject for a long time past. This newspaper has, however, urged the advantages not only of Federal collection of all consumption and other taxes adapted to this method, but Federal levying of all such taxes at uniform country-wide rates, with distribution of due part of the proceeds among the States. Only in this way, it seems, could the administrative difficulties that arise when such taxes are higher in some States, and lower or entirely lacking in others, be eliminated once for all. Federal taxes would presumably be collected at the source, as the Federal cigarette tax is now collected at the factories. Collection expense and opportunities for escaping payment would be reduced to a minimum, and tax conflicts and rivalries among States would disappear.

In announcing that a group of outside tax experts has been brought in to assist the Treasury in making a detailed study of centralized collections, Mr. Morgenthau spoke of the saving that might be made in bookkeeping expense under such a plan. Bookkeeping is only part of the expense.

Last year the cost of running Arkansas' State revenue department amounted to more than $810,000. Of this total, more than $512,000 represented salaries, and more than $122,000 represented travel expense of the department's field force of agents, inspectors, and auditors. If the Federal Government collected sales taxes, income and inheritance taxes, tobacco taxes, liquor taxes, gasoline taxes, and motor-vehicle fees, a comparative handful of State employees could handle all the collections that would be left for the Revenue Department—chiefly such levies as oil, feed, and other inspection fees, in-transit vehicle taxes and severance taxes. And Arkansas is only one of 48 States now compelled to maintain large and expensive revenue organizations.

Connecticut's No. 1 Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. TOLAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE HARTFORD (CONN.) COURANT

Mr. TOLAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Courant, of Hartford, Conn.:

[From the Hartford (Conn.) Courant of June 26, 1941]

CONNECTICUT'S NO. 1 PROBLEM

The coming to Hartford of the Special Committee of the House of Representatives on Migratory Labor provided an opportunity for a survey, however superficial, of virtually all the problems that have arisen in the State as the result of the boom in the defense industries. From the evidence presented, the people of the State can only reach the conclusion that unless the situation is wisely handled now it will produce conditions that will plague Connecticut not for a year but perhaps for a decade or more to come.

The salient facts would seem to be these:

First, although more than a hundred thousand workers from outside the State have come into it in the past 18 months, at least 50,000, perhaps a hundred thousand, more workers are needed if the plants now built or building are to be operated at maximum efficiency and if the normal business of the State, which has lost workers to the defense industries, is not to be undermanned. The need for agricultural labor promises to be especially acute.

Second, the influx of workers has produced a housing shortage of extreme acuteness not only in the urban centers but in the towns surrounding them. With this shortage has developed, in varying degrees, a shortage of essential services, from sewerage facilities to educational facilities. The shortages do not mean simply that hundreds of skilled workers, upon whom rests the primary responsibility for building a strong national defense, are compelled to live under conditions that impair efficiency, to say nothing of normal family life. They also mean that the whole community is faced with the dangers that ensue from crowded living quarters, inadequate health facilities, and unstable social conditions.

Third, despite the pressing need for trained workers, the industries of the State are not taking full advantage of the labor resources at hand. Evidence was adduced at the hearing to show that residents of the State who already have established homes are denied work on grounds both of their race and of their national origin. The result is that while workers from outside the State are being drawn here by the thousands despite inadequate living facilities, workers already on hand are unable to get work, with the result that they must not only stay on relief but in some cases give up their homes to workers from the outside because they cannot pay the higher rents that the boom makes possible.

No one solution for the problem exists. Rather, it must be attacked from many angles, from reconsidering the laws governing settlement through efforts to stabilize rents and to increase housing up to changing attitudes toward racial minorities. Not a little hard thinking has been done on the problem by many agencies, and more will have to be done. A point to be stressed is that neither the State nor the local communities can hope to shift the responsibility wholly to the Federal Government, as some of the witnesses seemed disposed to do. The Federal Government can probably do a good deal, particularly in the fields of housing and of providing for the extension of public services that local communities cannot afford to finance.

Yet most of the burden will have to be borne by the State and the local communities. A first step in the matter might be a greater coordination than seems yet to have been accomplished of the several agencies, public and private, that are willingly or unwillingly involved. Alone, they can do relatively little to meet the situation so graphically pictured in the Senate Chamber the other day. Together they might go far to alleviate a condition that, unless sanely dealt with in the near future, will produce consequences that will affect the State for years to come.

Fourth of July Address by the President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

ADDRESS BROADCAST FROM THE FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT LIBRARY, HYDE PARK, N. Y., ON JULY 4, 1941

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the address delivered by the President of the United States at Hyde Park, on the Fourth of July, and also in connection therewith an editorial from the Washington Evening Star.

There being no objection, the address and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My fellow Americans, in 1776, on the fourth day of July, the Representatives of the several States in Congress assembled, declaring our independence, asserted that a decent respect for the opinion of mankind required that they should declare the reasons for their action. In this new crisis, we have a like duty.

In 1776 we waged war in behalf of the great principle that Government should derive its just powers from the consent of the governed. In other words, representation chosen in free elections. In the century and a half that followed, this cause of human freedom swept across the world.

But now, in our generation—in the past few years—a new resistance, in the form of several new practices of tyranny, has been making such headway that the fundamentals of 1776 are being struck down abroad and definitely they are threatened here.

It is, indeed, a fallacy, based on no logic at all, for any Americans to suggest that the rule of force can defeat human freedom in all the other parts of the world and permit it to survive in the United States alone. But it has been that childlike fantasy itself—that misdirected faith—which has led nation after nation to go about their peaceful tasks, relying on the thought, and even the promise, that they and their lives and their government would be allowed to live when the juggernaut of force came their way.

It is simple—I could almost say simple-minded—for us Americans to wave the flag, to reassert our belief in the cause of freedom—and let it go at that.

Yet, all of us who lie awake at night—all of us who study and study again, know full well that in these days we cannot save freedom with pitchforks and muskets alone, after a dictator combination has gained control of the rest of the world.

We know that we cannot save freedom in our own midst, in our own land, if all around us—our neighbor nations—have lost their freedom.

That is why we are engaged in a serious, in a mighty, in a unified action in the cause of the defense of the hemisphere and the freedom of the seas. We need not the loyalty and unity alone, we need speed and efficiency and toil and an end to backbiting, an end to the sabotage that runs far deeper than the blowing up of munitions plants.

I tell the American people solemnly that the United States will never survive as a happy and fertile oasis of liberty surrounded by a cruel desert of dictatorship.

And so it is that when we repeat the great pledge to our country and to our flag, it must be our deep conviction that we pledge as well our work, our will and, if it be necessary, our very lives.

[From the Evening Star of July 5, 1941]

KEEPING THE FAITH

For 8 solemn minutes yesterday afternoon America lived with its past. It was a truly stirring experience.

From the newly dedicated library at Hyde Park the President spoke briefly of the example of our ancestors, of the needs of the present, and of the perils of the future. A people who seem not yet to have comprehended the magnitude of their danger were cautioned once again that "the United States will never survive as a happy and fertile oasis of liberty surrounded by a cruel desert of dictatorship." When the President had finished, the scene shifted to far-off Estes Park in Colorado, where the Chief Justice of the United States led in reciting the pledge of allegiance to the flag. And then, in conclusion, Lucy Monroe sang one verse of The Star-Spangled Banner.

That was all—brief, simple, and yet so profoundly moving that millions of Americans must for the moment have been lifted out of themselves.

As they lived for a few minutes with the memory of the great men, the bitter sacrifices and the lofty ideals from which this Nation was forged, they must have sensed that today's threat is a deeply personal one. For freedom is a personal thing. We cannot lose freedom as a nation and yet retain it as individuals. And we will not keep it, either as a nation or as individuals unless we are willing now to make the sacrifices, great and small, that have ever been the price of liberty.

It was because this is true and proved by all of our experience that the President called upon the people for a pledge—a pledge of "our work, our will, and, if necessary, our very lives."

Upon this generation of Americans falls the necessity of keeping faith with the past by responding wholeheartedly to that appeal. But the time is short. We are in great danger of losing the freedom for which brave men in an earlier day worked and fought and died unless we act—and act now—to safeguard it.

After the War, What?—A. V. A. and Similar Developments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE T. ELLIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE SOUTHWEST AMERICAN, FORT SMITH, ARK.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, one of the most brilliant discussions I have seen of "What Shall We Do After the War?" appeared this week as an editorial by Editor Clarence F. Byrns, in the Southwest American, Fort Smith, Ark. I quote it in full:

[From the Southwest American, Fort Smith, Ark., of June 29, 1941]

OFF THE RECORD

(By C. F. Byrns)

There's a world of encouragement in the fact that many people are thinking seriously about what we'll do with this country when the war is over. We didn't think enough about that in the last war. Most of us seemed to assume that an armistice would usher in the millenium without too much effort on anybody's part. And it didn't.

In another column on this page, Peter Edson, Washington correspondent, tells about serious planning for the after-war future now going on in Washigton. There are plenty of other people carefully weighing possibilities of a more abundant economy when the shooting stops.

You have read quite a lot in recent months—if you read this page—about the proposed Arkansas Valley Authority proposal, now pending in Congress. It is a plan to create a Fedcral agency with the power and the finance to use the waters of the Arkansas, the Red, the St. Francis, and the White Rivers in the Southwest for flood control, for power production, for irrigation, and for aid to navigation.

If you have thought of A. V. A. as a defense project for this war, you have missed the timing. If you have thought of it as merely another Federal boondoggling project, you have missed the idea entirely. Fundamentally, A. V. A. is a project for building an after-war economy vastly more satisfactory than we have ever known in this area before.

It is not the purpose of the sponsors of A. V. A. to build a lot of dams and powerhouses immediately. The construction of the flood control and power dams now under way in the area certainly should be pushed to completion. That can be done and will be done whether A. V. A. is ever approved or not. These dams, such as Norfork Dam on the White River in Baxter County, are being built by the United States engineers with funds provided by Congress as a part of the general flood-control and power program.

Norfork is being built now as a flood-control project. Pending in Congress are proposals to appropriate $13,500,000 more to make it a power project, too.

Nimrod Dam on the Fourche La Fave River in Arkansas is being built for flood control, but with provision for making it a power project when the money is provided by Congress.

Blue Mountain Dam on Petit Jean River in Arkansas is a flood-control project only.

Denison Dam on the Red River between Texas and Oklahoma is a dual purpose project, for which the funds are already provided.

All these are being done by the United States engineers. Their completion does not depend on the approval of the Arkansas Valley Authority. They may be finished before the war emergency has ended. But the great majority of the projects which are contemplated in the A. V. A. proposal would follow the war emergency, and would be designed to remake the economy of the Southwest so that our people may have a higher standard of living than they have ever known before.

Every schoolboy knows that when this war is ended there must be gigantic and comprehensive plans for the use of the productive capacity of the Nation which will no longer be needed in military production. It is not difficult to conjure up visions of millions of men thrown out of work and millions of dollars of investment idle because there is no longer any demand for the products they have made in wartime.

But it's ridiculous to assume that there must be a long period of starvation and disintegration before we find out how to put those productive forces to work making things that people need to raise their standard of living.

We are proving just now that we can produce a great deal more than we were producing before the defense emergency arose. The Federal Reserve index of industrial production is up almost to 150, the highest in history. A great deal of it is going into armament production. It is possible, although difficult, to use that productive capacity for the improvement of the standard of living of our people, if we go about the job with intelligence.

Here in the Southwest our per capita income is low, and always has been. One reason is that there has not been enough industrial employment for our people. There has not been enough use of the resources which Nature gave us. The waters of our streams have flowed down to the sea, wasting tremendous power, devastating the productive fields in the lowlands. If we can utilize that power and prevent that destruction, we have a net economic gain for our people which can be translated into a higher living standard.

That, fundamentally, is the purpose of the Arkansas Valley Authority proposal. It proposes to create a Federal agency with the power and the finance to do what the States alone can never do—combine flood control, power production, aid to navigation, irrigation, and industrial development through construction of water-control projects over the entire drainage basin of our great rivers.

In the period when war demands slacken and work is needed for men, A. V. A. will provide the work. In the years that stretch out ahead A. V. A. will make possible a standard of living which we have never known.

Salute to Kansas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. ARTHUR CAPPER, OF KANSAS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by myself entitled "Salute to Kansas," which was broadcast as a part of the Kansas program carried over station WINX, Washington, D. C., on July 3.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Need I tell you I am very proud of Kansas, and of the Kansas people—after all, States are not great, except as men may make them. Kansas was born in the fierce crucible of the contest over slavery; it was the admission of Kansas as a State, followed by the election of Abraham Lincoln, that precipitated the fratricidal conflict.

John Brown, of Osawatomie, probably was the first Kansan to become nationally known. John Brown, they say, was a fanatic; he broke the law; he defied his Government. But John Brown had convictions; he had the courage of his convictions. He was willing to die for his beliefs—and he did. There has been a strain of John Brown that has run through most of the history of my native State of Kansas. Puritan Massachusetts contributed much to the early settlement of Kansas, in territorial days. After the Civil War, Union veterans flocked to the State, taking homesteads by the tens of thousands. In the John Brown line I might mention two women who in their time swayed Kansas and electrified—or shocked—the Nation: Mary Ellen Lease, a great political orator, who advised the farmers to "raise less corn and more hell;" and Carrie Nation, who wielded her hatchet with devastating effect in her fight against the demon rum.

Not all the Kansans you have known or heard of have been John Browns and Carrie Nations. William Allen White, of Emporia, has been known to the Nation and beloved by Kansans for nearly a half century, and all that time I am proud to say he has been my very dear friend.

Amelia Earhart, first woman to fly the Atlantic, was a Kansan; Martin and Osa Johnson, who hunted big game with cameras and whose pictures and stories of animals in the wild stretches have intrigued millions of Americans, came from Kansas. Gen. James G. Harbord, of the Radio Corporation of America; Walter Chrysler, of the Chrysler Corporation; Glenn Martin, the world's greatest aircraft manufacturer—they were Kansas boys. A Kansan, Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, of Topeka, wrote In His Steps, a book of which millions of copies were sold, more even than of Uncle Tom's Cabin.

I speak as a Kansas publisher for more than 45 years when I say Kansas has more daily newspapers, and more weekly newspapers per capita, than any other State in the Union—and believe me, freedom of the press is freedom of the press out in my home State of Kansas. Some of the columnists you Washingtonians read daily are Kansans—Gen. Hugh Johnson and Raymond Clapper were born in Kansas; Ernest Lindley, son of the late chancellor of our State university, started his newspaper career on former Senator Henry J. Allen's Wichita Beacon. From John Brown to William Allen White, Kansas has helped the rest of the country to think, sometimes to act.

Why, do you know that Kansas right now has six United States Senators? Well, we do. Senator CLYDE M. REED and myself were elected to the Senate from Kansas by the people of Kansas. Senator CARL HATCH, born in Kansas, was elected to the Senate from New Mexico; Senator EDWIN C. JOHNSON, born in Kansas, represents Colorado; Senator JOHN THOMAS, of Idaho, is a Kansan; W. LEE O'DANIEL, of Texas, is from Kingman, Kans.

Walter Johnson, famous baseball pitcher, is a Kansan, also Glenn Cunningham, who broke records as a fast runner; Ina Claire, the late Jean Harlow, Fred Stone, Buddy Rogers, Marion Talley—these also came from Kansas, as did Dorothy Canfield, Brock Pemberton, and a number of other well-known authors. Swen Birger Sandzen, and John Steuart Curry, and Albert T. Reid, artists, are all Kansans.

I have no thought of making a political speech tonight, but just to keep the record straight I think I should tell you Kansas is a pretty good Republican State; has had 21 Republican Governors and only 5 Democratic Governors. It usually sends Republicans to Congress. Right now both Senators are Republicans, and 6 out of 7 Representatives are Republicans. Incidentally, I am proud of my Kansas colleagues in Congress—every one of them—and of our Kansas Governor, Payne H. Ratner.

This may be nothing particularly to brag about, but in the latest four presidential elections my home town of Topeka witnessed three notifications of presidential or vice presidential candidates of major political parties—though it is true only one of them "took," if I may use the expression: The late Charles Curtis was Republican nominee for Vice President in 1928 and 1932; Alf M. Landon the Republican nominee for President in 1936. Seems to me that Earl Browder, Communist nominee for President a time or two, also is a Kansan.

My friends, I could spend the evening telling you of the glories of Kansas, the resources of Kansas, the greatness of Kansas—and the peculiarities of Kansans. But you have not the time for all that. I must hasten on.

I could tell you that we furnish one-fifth of the wheat produced in the United States; and Kansas farmers' income from livestock is even larger than from wheat; we have tremendous resources of petroleum, natural gas, coal, etc. The winds blow cold in Kansas in winter; they blow hot in summer—always the wind blows. I could give you statistics by the ream, but I won't. In closing I just want to say a word about the Kansas people as I know them.

I have lived among these Kansas people for more than three-quarters of a century—I was the first native-born Kansan to be elected Governor of Kansas, and, incidentally, let me say I was born there at a time when it took some nerve to be born in that part of the country. You may travel all over this great country of ours without finding a finer group of American citizens; right thinking, clean living men and women; nowhere a people more anxious to meet every obligation of citizenship, and to meet it bravely, fairly, firmly, unselfishly.

I say there is no place in America where the average man and woman is taking a broader view of our problems, or is striving harder, or more unselfishly, to determine the merits of these questions on the broad standpoint of the greatest good to the greatest number. I know of no people striving always for better things, more prone to lead in movements to advance human welfare—and not afraid to blaze the way, even though the way be unpopular.

I love Kansas because of the Kansans who live there, and it is these whom I salute tonight in closing this modest tribute to the State which gave me birth.

Our Republic: It Must Be Preserved

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK VAN NUYS

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

FOURTH OF JULY ADDRESS BY HON. JOSIAH W. BAILEY, OF NORTH CAROLINA, AT ASHEVILLE, N. C.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, on the Fourth of July, at Asheville, N. C., the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] delivered a very able and patriotic address on the subject, Our Republic: It Must Be Preserved. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow citizens of the United States of America, as we enter upon the one hundred and sixty-sixth year of our independence, we must realize that the American people have, for a decade, been grappling with one of their severest domestic tests, and now must face another of a foreign character even more severe. We must labor under the difficulties of the one while overcoming the other. One is reminded of that early day when the Father of our Country, seeing its difficulties, declared that if our Republic should be so fortunate as to survive 20 years, its preservation and progress would be assured for many decades to come.

It did survive the tests of that period, and it has survived many others, showing to all the world the value of that new order which it expressed. In a progress without precedent, it has proved a blessing not only to all the increasing millions of its inhabitants—the best of governments in the best of forms in the best of lands—but also has proved a light to all humanity, lifting everywhere the aspirations of men and leading them forward to higher ranges of right of hope, and of achievement. One may pause a moment to ask, What sort of world would this be, had this Republic not existed?—and a more intimate question, What sort of life would any one of us live but for the blessings of our Republic? And what sort of future would there be for the human race or for any one of us, should this Republic cease to exist in its historic form and character?

Since that first 20-year period, we have assumed that our Republic could not fail, disregarding the fate of all its predecessors. Many today take for granted its continual existence, ignoring not only the menace of the economic collapse within, but also failing to appreciate the jeopardy in which it stands by reason of the menace of mighty conquering nations, well armed and unrestrained, save as they may be restrained by more than equal force, and overlooking no less the activities of disintegrating forces operating from within. We have been so secure and so happy that we have forgotten that while kingdoms may continue to exist by means of wealth or force or other factors material, republics by their very nature, live only by the will, the intelligence, and the devotion of the people who constitute them, for a republic is founded upon the spirits of men, and notwithstanding the outward appearance and equipment of its power, it is at bottom and essentially a creation of the spirit whose dwelling is the mind of man—the spirit of its people.

As we celebrate this anniversary, let us realize that we do so in an altered world, in the midst of swift and unsuspected movements, and of rapidly changing circumstances, the outcome of which none can foresee. Two events, predetermined by many lesser ones, but unforeseen, have brought about a far-reaching and perhaps a fundamental alteration in the constitution of human society, embracing every nation and affecting every individual. As the consequence of those events, we are in the midst of world revolution, social and economic. Vast change now suddenly confronts the human race—confronts us of this Republic no less than all others.

The first of those events is the break-down, the failure, of the economic order which, arising in more remote centuries, culminated in the economic system under which our country flourished for 130 years. For want of a better name, it is called the system of free enterprise, or capitalism, known to each of us as the individual profit system and free competition, and recognized as of the essence of the Republic itself.

We must recognize that the collapse in the United States, first realized in 1929, occurred under that system, and that while this collapse has been ameliorated since 1933, we have by no means established recovery from it or remedy for its recurrence. We have softened its conditions but have found no remedy. Whether the method pursued was wise or unwise, or whether some other method would have served better are political questions and not for discussion on this occasion.

The fact of the break-down of our historic economic system stands out to threaten and to challenge us. It happened in our land last of all. It had failed in Britain and on the continent of Europe years before. And in its stead other systems had been erected on that continent—communism in Russia, fascism in Italy, and nazi-ism in Germany. These were in great measure consequences of the failure of the systems which they replaced. And they were the first political manifestations of that failure.

Since 1932 the Republic of the United States has been feeling its way to find recovery from this break-down and adjustment to its consequences in Europe and in the Orient. At the moment we continue only to feel our way while we labor under the necessity of dealing crucially with the other event causing fundamental alteration in human society. We cannot put aside our economic problem, however desirable that may be, while we face another that demands instant and undivided attention. We must endure its hardships and bear in mind its perils, until we shall have established our national security in a world in which anything may happen. Meantime we must hold to the faith that our form of government is not only not at fault but also that, insofar as a people may establish a sound and happy economy through their government, ours offers by far the most hope. There is nothing in the Italian, the Russian, or the German experiments to induce us to emulate them, and much to induce in us a fresh access of devotion to our historic institutions—much to warn us against the radical.

The other of the two events to which I have referred is the revelation in the summer of 1940 of the significance of mechanized warfare as employed by unrestrained nations. We saw the fortresses of Belgium and France fall within 30 days under the attack of bombing planes and tanks of the totalitarian Axis. We perceived with amazement, not yet fully expressed, that the stabilized defense of the great fortresses of Belgium and the Maginot Line, the great guns and ramparts manned by magnificent armies, amounted to nothing before the German lightning strike. Since then we have seen the pass of Thermopylae yield to the same forces, and even more recently Crete has shown that the warship cannot be relied upon to resist the bombing plane, and on the other hand, that by way of the air an invading army may cross a broad expanse of the sea, and overwhelm a well-defended island. The defense of the fortress and the defense of insularity have fallen together before the new weapons of war.

When the means of attack, by reason of the development of gunpowder and guns, became superior to the means of defense by moat and wall, feudalism's doom was sealed and way was made for nationalism, even for democracy. There was fundamental economic revolution. What will be the ultimate consequences of the new superiority of attack by air and tank remains to be seen. But the immediate consequences are plain enough.

We have a new sort of war, called total war—total in its effort and total in its consequences. Noncombatants are as fully exposed as combatants—the children, their mothers and the aged no less than the skilled men who bear arms. And total war has brought to full flower a new sort of government to carry on that war and that war's economy, called totalitarian. All of Europe is under its force; all of Britain is marshaled against it in desperate struggle; and all the peoples of the earth are face to face with its threats, its intimidations, its terror, its treacheries, and its manifest ambition to dominate sea and land, every nation, and every tribe.

It is with this tremendous fact that our Republic must instantly reckon in total effort.

In such a situation it is not enough to declare that this Republic must be preserved: it is imposed upon us to see to it that it shall grapple with these events and all that they predicate; incumbent upon us as individual living units of our Republic so to grapple with them, that as a whole the American people will come through not only unconquered but uncontrolled by any nation or power. It is our duty now so to overmatch their forces as to preserve all the rich meaning of our Republic to ourselves and to mankind—yea, to the God who brought it forth.

We must now give our attention to the place of our country amongst the nations, and particularly to its course, its duty, and our duty as its members, in the world situation, of necessity holding in abeyance the crucial and pressing economic problem, so far as we may. We can and we must proceed as a people at once to avoid the economic threat to our defense of overborrowing. That is, we must pay heavier and heavier taxes, we must buy our country's bonds, we must reduce the nondefense expenditure; and each of us must learn to live on smaller incomes. We must spend less, not only in order that our industrial energies may be geared to the demands of defense, but also to be able to pay taxes and buy bonds.

It is essential that the American people shall comprehend their situation. We must clear away a certain confusion. Disarmament and pacifism as a national policy passed out, under the influence of the Axis menace in the autumn of 1939, when the arms embargo was repealed. Isolation as a policy was ended in March 1941, when the lease-lend bill was enacted providing for all-out aid to Britain and other nations. Those debates are behind us.

The question now is, Shall the United States enter the war as a belligerent, and if so, will the young men go? It is this question that underlies the agitation now going on.

We must be candid. No one desires to get into a war. No one prefers to send men into battle. It is quite clear that the Axis Powers desire to avoid war with us—now. It is the Hitler policy to pick off the nations one after another—one at a time. He is the world's No. 1 isolationist.

But whether our Republic shall become a belligerent is not a question to be settled by our wishes. All agree that belligerency is the last recourse and ought to be avoided if possible. The question will be determined by events, by action, and not by debate. It depends to a great degree upon what Hitler shall do. If he takes a step that involves the security of our Republic, the decision will be made for us and by fate. For this Republic must be preserved; and we preserve it by defending its security. We are not agressors and do not intend to become agressors. We are not appeasers either. We will defend our country in our own way, in our own time, and ask no other nation how. This policy is the one policy best calculated to avoid involvement as a belligerent. For the Axis Powers are tempted by a show of weakness, but stand back upon a show of strength.

Whether we are prepared for the responsibilities of a belligerent is another essential factor in the present equation. I cannot here discuss this question. But I must make one remark: No nation is prepared for war under modern conditions so long as the right to strike against the national defense is recognized and exercised as it is now in this Republic. For full industrial production is as essential to a successful conclusion as ships and men. It is the day of the plane and the tank, the motor, the machine, their operators.

The second factor in the equation of war by this Republic is the common consent of its people. A divided Republic is beaten to begin with. Unity, not a mere majority vote, is indispensable to victory, and, therefore, to belligerency.

The other question is, In event of belligerency, shall our sons go forth to battle on the Old World continents? It does not now seem likely; indeed, there is even question whether that is possible. We have neither the ships to transport them nor the ports to land them. Every vessel is required for other purposes, and will be so required for at least a year to come. All the ports of the European continent are either in Axis possession or under the Axis guns. We do have a great Navy, but it is not equal to war in the two great oceans, east and west.

But we cannot assure Hitler that if and when we must fight we will not fight to the utmost of our power—to the last dollar, the last man, and the last day of our existence. For here, again, the show of strength is the one thing that will deter him and the show of weakness is the one thing that will invite him—and, let us remember, it is he and not us who will determine whether we fight or not. For while his motive is conquest and dominion, our motive continues to be peace and security. We are saying to him only that our Republic must be preserved, that we know that to preserve it we must preserve the means of its security. We prefer to do this without becoming a belligerent; but if he shall make it necessary, we have no choice, for we will preserve this Republic, come what may.

Moreover, we must realize that once in the war we cannot say how far we will go, for we must do all that is necessary to victory.

The theory of our policy is that by full material aid to Britain and other resisting nations we may confine the war to Europe and stop Hitler there; and, further, we are training our Army, building our ramparts, and enlarging our Navy to the end that if Hitler shall not be stopped in Europe we will be ready to resist any encroachment upon the Western Hemisphere that he may attempt. This we consider to be the policy necessary to our peace and to our security.

If this Republic shall now be preserved, its people must rise to every demand of its defense—and that without delay. This may or may not mean war; it means defense in our own time, in our own manner, and without asking the advice or permission of any other nation, whether friendly or unfriendly. This is the only means of our security, war or no war. We must defend and defend promptly and effectually, or take the risk of the most powerful menace in our history.

For the present we defend by way of all-out aid to Britain recognizing the value of her character, her courage and her fleet as a barrier between us and those who would otherwise drive us into a corner to our undoing. We defend by aid to China because she is a threat to the third arm of the Axis of total war. We will defend by aid to other nations so far as we can, if thereby we may help to arrest the Axis progress. And we will defend by appropriate action of our own the right of American ships under the American flag to go their ways on the free and open seas of the globe, because the freedom of the seas is essential to American freedom. If such defense means war, then we have no choice. For defend we must. And we know if war must come, it will come not by way of what we may do, but wholly by way of what we fail to do—not by reason of our defense but whenever Hitler shall consider that he is strong enough to take us over.

At the moment our country is not a belligerant, and while all hope it may escape actual warfare, it ought to be realized that we are gravely affected by the world revolution and gravely involved by way of responsibility for the security of our people; we must know that at any moment we may, without departure from our present necessary course of defensive action, become involved as a belligerent and further, that once so involved the greater responsibility for a successful conclusion will devolve upon the United States. We must, even while hoping to avoid war, gird our Republic to the utmost and seek in every way to stay the hand of the would-be world conqueror until our power shall overmatch his—in which event he would not fight. Let us understand that we cannot provoke him by show of strength, but can tempt him by display of weakness.

Our President, in his recent address, drew the line of our defense, beyond which the Axis Powers may not step without war—giving necessary, timely, and plain notice—"Thus far and no farther." We will preserve, he said, our freedom of the seas, because our security is at stake in its preservation. We will not permit the control of the Atlantic or Pacific to pass to the Axis Powers, because with that control would pass also the security of our people and the destiny of their country. We will not fail in all our material aid to Great Britain, because to fail her seems to mean nothing less than surrender the seas to the Axis. We will not permit certain strategic island bases to pass into Axis control, because control of those bases by the Axis Powers would put our country in jeopardy.

Such is the notice given; and it remains only for the Axis Powers to bring on war by disregarding that notice. "We will not yield," said the President, in a more recent message to the Congress; and he meant what he said, and all America meant it with him. We will not yield. It is right that he gave this notice; it is wise that he gave this notice. And giving it for all concerned he gave it no less to the American people, in whose behalf and for whose interest he gave it.

It is time, high time, that every one of us fully realized the gravity of the hour. We are at the end of our first year of preparation for the crucial demands that the ordeal imposes. But there are lamentable evidences that few realize what confronts us. We have made only a start upon our program, and are far behind the Axis in armed force and in power to produce planes, tanks, guns, and ammunition. We are passing from the special depression economy to the defense-preparation economy, but we have not made the transition. We produced only 5,000 fighting planes in the year and only 1,000 tanks. We are short of ammunition. Our shipping program will not be adequate, so far as produced ships are concerned, within 18 months. We are struggling with the immense task of arming our Republic and other nations at the same time. On every hand we hear of bottlenecks, congestions, shortages, and delays. And, most regrettable, certain labor leaders and agitators are insisting upon the right to strike against the defense of their country, notwithstanding every possible assurance of just treatment. The subversive element, the saboteur, and the Communist are active; and it is of the gravest significance that the headmen of one great labor organization have declared against ridding it of its Communist members—that is, men who are committed to the overthrow of our Republic and cannot be trusted by it. It is no less perilous that we have so far departed from the spirit of our Republic as to encourage a system under which loyal Americans are not permitted to work unless they join an organization, pay its tribute, and take its orders.

Fully 80 percent of the American people are wholly loyal and desire to serve their country's need. The same ratio applies to the workers of America. As a rule, they are as loyal and true as their other fellow citizens. It is now for them to demand a leadership that puts the defense of their country above any class or personal interest or program, and the rights of men above class-struggle for power. It is not patriotic to seize upon a great people's distress to make profits or to advance one's interest—and this goes for all, rich or poor, capitalist and worker. It is not right to coerce men for any cause in this land save by the compulsion of law in due process.

We must find our unity now without delay—unity in the common sense that informs one that the security of one's country is indispensable to the welfare of every person and every class; unity in the will to defend our land at whatever the cost, unity in the example of the soldier's sacrifice to which he is bound no more than every other inhabitant, each in his own way, each in all that he has and is, each according to what he is capable of doing for his country. We must prepare to meet the challenge of the Axis powers with total American effort. We must show the ages how this Republic may put forth total effort without becoming totalitarian, and thereby win our title to lead mankind for 1,000 years to come. We may bend its structure, but we will not suffer it to be broken. We will strain it under the pressure of dire necessity, but in doing so we will so provide that once the pressure shall be removed, it will right itself, resume its normal character and proceed on its course as the Republic of liberty.

There is such a thing amongst men as that which is called Americanism—definite and distinguished, a blessing to all who share it, and known to its beneficiaries even though we have difficulty in defining it.

Perhaps it is not to be defined; but to attempt it today is not out of order. Politically it is government by representative democracy, restrained by a Constitution that defines the limits of the power of those who govern; that erects, as against the Government itself, a bill of inalienable rights in behalf of each individual; a Republic of States, sovereign in their spheres but united in one Nation, that finds its unity in the assent of its people rather than by force of law. It rests upon the power to serve rather than the power to compel. Its sources are moral rather than physical. Morally its purpose is to free the energies and the aspirations of its people. Its rewards are well-being and content, not power and riches. It recognizes the divine spark in every man and woman, every boy and girl, and gives each a share in sovereign right, sovereign power, and sovereign duty. It proclaims a liberty that demands tolerance of opinion, of race, of religion, of occupation; and in this liberty it finds the source of its most cherished aspiration—equality of right, equality before the law, equality in education, equality in religion, equality of opportunity to work, to save, to rise, to prosper. It proposes a justice that goes far beyond the courts, an economic and social justice for each and all, the weakest no less than the strongest.

This Americanism is the ruling spirit of a land in which no force is exercised save under laws approved by the people and by officers responsible to them; in which there is no compulsion and no coercion except the compulsion and coercion of law under due process, and not of men; in this land no individual nor any group may take the law into its own hands; here even the people themselves are bound to preserve the inalienable rights of every man; here there can be neither exercise of arbitrary power nor any sort of tyranny; here is, indeed, a land of liberty and justice, where every man may work out his destiny in the earth, only provided he support the Republic under which he enjoys liberties so full and privileges so great.

Of such was that new order of the ages which was set up in our land 165 years ago, and the reminder that it was conceived as a new order of the ages appears in the Latin inscription upon the great seal of the United States, reproduced upon our dollar bills. Favored by natural conditions, but favored more by the political, social, and personal climate of the principles of this new order, we have built here the greatest and richest, the most liberal, the most progressive, and the happiest of empires. Only 6 percent of earth's population, we do 40 percent of earth's commerce. We have had the benefit of the dynamic of individual incentive to the pursuit of happiness, of the self-reliance, and the self-respect guaranteed in our Bill of Rights, and also the sense of individual dignity in the realization of responsibility for our Government, and, in a wider realm, of man's relation to his Creator.

So greatly has this new order succeeded that wholly by example and emulation its influence has extended throughout the earth. The peoples of China and Russia, of Japan and Germany, of Britain and France would like to do things the way Americans do them. American liberty, American wealth, American industry, and American opportunity are the goal of the peoples of all nations.

Often have I thought these 10 years—often I think these present days—that our Republic is more than a mere government or form of order; that it is the flowering of the aspirations of mankind throughout the ages; the culmination of the prophet's vision and the reformer's hope, the product of that conception of man in his responsibility to his Maker which is written large in that Book of Books found in every American's home. Often do I think of it as a treasure in trust, and exceedingly precious, a priceless possession, a matchless heritage; not just because it is my Government, but because its character and form, its meaning and processes provide freedom and security for the minds and souls of its people, not less than for their property and their lives.

Such an institution of government is worth all that may be exacted to preserve it—to its inhabitants, to mankind, and to the Creator of men. No sacrifice is too great in such a cause. And, must I remind you, the instant of sacrifice is at hand. From now until the menace shall have disappeared, every citizen of this Republic must think and act not in terms of what he may enjoy for himself nor in terms of what his Government may do for him, but in terms of what would be his fate and his children's fate if economic breakdown should impair our Republic's character or the Axis Powers should gain any degree of dominion over it; in terms of what he must do to preserve the Republic in its true character and the blessings of its liberty to himself, if he shall be spared, and, at any rate, to his posterity—precisely the spirit which moved the fathers to bring forth the Republic.

And so, my fellow Americans, I summon you in this one hundred and sixty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the best of governments in the most blessed of lands, as you desire security, as you love peace, as you cherish your homes, as you owe a heritage to your children, as you fear and would serve the God of Nations and of our fathers—to the defense of your country. The Republic of the United States—it must be preserved; and by no less than the sacrificial service of none other than ourselves.

The Late Senator Robinson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

MEMORIAL RESOLUTIONS OF ARKANSAS BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD memorial resolutions adopted by the Arkansas Bar Association with respect to the late Senator Joseph T. Robinson, of Arkansas, which were presented to the Supreme Court of Arkansas on June 30, 1941, by J. F. Loughborough, Esq.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN MEMORIAM—JOSEPH TAYLOR ROBINSON

MEMORIAL RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED TO THE SUPREME COURT JUNE 30, 1941, BY J. F. LOUGHBOROUGH

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR HONORS:

During the summer vacation of 1937 the people of this State and of the Nation were shocked by word from Washington that Senator Joseph T. Robinson had been called from his important public work at the zenith of his career and would be with us no more. Thereby another vacancy in the roll of attorneys at this bar and the passing of one of its most distinguished members is noted. His associates of the State bar, through a committee of the State bar association, have adopted resolutions expressing their feelings on the occasion, and have added thereto a short biographical sketch of Senator Robinson's career, and appointed me to present a copy to this court, which, with your permission, I will now do.

RESOLUTIONS OF ARKANSAS BAR ASSOCIATION, JUNE 30, 1941

On July 14, 1937, after a strenuous day in the Senate, during which he was called upon to make a great effort, Senator Joseph Taylor Robinson laid down his earthly burdens and surrendered his spirit to his Maker; and thus came to an end, at the age of 64 years, a life filled with accomplishments, adorned with honors, and known by a reputation for sterling personal worth, great achievement, and remarkable public service that was appreciated, not only within but far beyond his own State and Nation, in nearly all of the civilized world.

Apart from the great loss to his devoted wife, the members of his family, and his host of personal friends, his State, his country, and other nations cherish his memory and mourn his loss as that of a great statesman who had earned and had the highest rank: Therefore be it

Resolved by the members of the Arkansas Bar Association, That in the death of Joseph Taylor Robinson the State of Arkansas has lost a great lawyer and its foremost statesman, whose counsel and leadership will be missed by all; be it further

Resolved, That in the loss of this distinguished citizen we recognize and acknowledge that the State has been deprived of her greatest leader in public affairs; be it further

Resolved, That the deepest sympathy of the members of the Bar Association of Arkansas be extended to the widow and other relatives of the deceased, and as a token of their respect for the deceased that a copy of these resolutions be sent to his widow and a copy thereof be presented to the Supreme Court of Arkansas.

That the outstanding achievements and events in Senator Robinson's career may now be called to mind in his memory and preserved for the permanent records of this court, the members of the committee appointed to present the foregoing resolutions add thereto the following biographical sketch:

Joseph Taylor Robinson was born in the rural community of Concord, in Lonoke County, Ark., on August 26, 1872. He was the youngest of 10 children of Dr. James and Mrs. Matilda Jane Swaim Robinson. His father was a physician, with a large practice. He and Mrs. Robinson were both sturdy characters with strong religious leanings. In fact, Dr. Robinson was a minister of the gospel as well as a physician. Their son, Joe, was brought up in surroundings where intrinsic worth was highly regarded, and where industry, proper self-denial, and wholesome living ruled in the upbringing of children and certainly were adhered to in the raising of Joe Robinson.

Joe was a strong boy and young man; he was a good hand at all kinds of farm work and proficient in the athletic games played by the boys of his day. He was naturally endowed with and his habits further developed a strong constitution that stood him in good stead in after life, when the very great strains of his public work made large demands upon his physical strength.

Joe early had a thirst for knowledge and was a very good student for a boy of his physical activity. He began attendance in the public schools at an early age and continued that attendance and his studies with unusual regularity and zest. At the age of 16 he was licensed to teach in the public schools of Arkansas and was given a first-grade certificate; and he began teaching at that early age. By nature he was deeply religious, and his surroundings in that regard were thoroughly congenial. He joined the Methodist Church when he was 12 years old, and later, when he began teaching in the public schools, he also taught a Sunday School class and served as a church steward. Information from his eldest sister, now living, is that he frequently led the family prayers and often assisted his older brother, who was a Methodist minister, in the preparation of his sermons. Her testimonial to him about those youthful days is that he was a splendid boy.

Joe early fixed his ambition to be a lawyer, and while he was still quite young he was known as a good speaker and debater. He was a student at the University of Arkansas, where he paid his way by working. He also attended the University of Virginia law school and completed a summer course there. He continued his study of the law in the office of Judge Thomas Trimble, of Lonoke, Ark., and was admitted to the State bar in 1895, and immediately formed a partnership with Judge Trimble for the practice of law, which continued until he moved to Little Rock to serve as Governor of Arkansas. A year previous to his admission to the bar he had been elected to the State legislature. He was admitted to practice in this court December 24, 1900. In 1896 he was married to Ewilda Miller. From 1895 until 1902 he devoted all of his time to the practice of law. In the latter year he was elected to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, to which he was reelected for four successive terms. In those days the Congress was not in session more than half of the year, and during the vacations of that body Joe Robinson was busily engaged in court work and other duties of a practicing lawyer.

In 1912 he was elected Governor of the State of Arkansas while still a Member of Congress. He resigned from Congress on January 14, 1913, and was inaugurated as Governor a few days later. On January 28, 1913, he was elected United States Senator by the Legislature of Arkansas to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Jeff Davis. His election to the United States Senate was the last one made by a State legislature, as the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution providing for such elections by direct vote of the people was ratified on May 31, 1913. He continued to serve as Governor through the session of the legislature, resigning on March 10, 1913, to take his seat in the United States Senate. Thus, within a period of 10 days he was a Member of the National House of Representatives, Governor of Arkansas, and elected to the United States Senate—a unique experience, doubtless unequaled in the political history of the Nation. There was some criticism of his action in accepting the election to the Senate instead of serving his term as Governor, and, solely on that ground, his election to the Senate at the next election was opposed by a distinguished and worthy opponent, but Senator Robinson carried that election by a large majority. He was reelected to the United States Senate five times by increasing majorities, and finally, in the election of 1930, he carried every county in the State, and that without making a speech or sending out a circular letter to the voters.

Thus Senator Robinson served 10 years in the House of Representatives of Congress and 24 years in the Senate, a continuous service of 34 years in national lawmaking.

During that period, at intervals, he made campaigns for reelection, and in the recesses of Congress he made many speeches at public gatherings on various occasions in different parts of the State; and so he was in constant touch with the people all over the State.

From the traditions of the section of the country in which he was born and lived and by his own inclinations and beliefs as they developed with his maturity, he was a Democrat, and his loyalty to the principles and procedure of that party continued throughout his life, and all of his political races were for nominations to or election on the Democratic ticket. He was a delegate to five Democratic National Conventions—the one in San Francisco in 1920, the one in New York in 1924, the one in Houston in 1928, the one in Chicago in 1932 and the one in Philadelphia in 1936. He was chairman of those conventions in the years 1920, 1928, and 1936. He was the only man in the history of the Democratic Party who was made permanent chairman of each of three of their national conventions. He was minority leader of the Democrats in the Senate from the year 1923 to 1933, and was Democratic majority leader there from 1933 until his death. He was nominated by acclamation by the Democratic National Convention in 1928 for Vice President of the United States.

He was appointed by President Hoover as a delegate to the London Naval Conference in 1930, the other members of the delegation being Secretary of State Stimson, Secretary of the Navy Adams, Ambassador Dawes, Senator Dwight Morrow, and Senator Reed, of Pennsylvania. It was generally agreed that it was largely due to his tact, good judgment, and behavior that the dissensions in that conference were finally overcome.

In 1927 the Secretary of State designated Senator Robinson a delegate to the World Trade Conference in Rio de Janeiro, and from there the State Department sent him on a good-will mission to Argentina, Chile, and Peru. He was a member of the Commission appointed to set up a complete system of government in Samoa in 1929. The many legal questions involved in that work aroused his intense interest, and his services there were a great success. He attended the inauguration of the Government of the Philippine Commonwealth in Manila in 1935 as a congressional delegate and made many warm friends among the officials of that new nation. When he died their national assembly adopted touching resolutions expressing their grief and their sympathy with our Government in the loss of Senator Robinson and immediately adjourned as a token of respect for him. He was vice president of the Interparliamentary Union, a member of the United States Constitution Sesquicentennial Commission, chairman of the Joint Committee on Government Reorganization, and a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The degree of doctor of laws was conferred on him by the University of Arkansas in 1922.

He continued his membership in the Methodist Church, and was a Scottish Rite thirty-second degree Mason.

He died in Washington on July 14, 1937, during the session of the Seventy-fifth Congress. His body lay in state in the Senate Chamber, and impressive funeral services were held there on July 15. The Senate was in special session for the occasion, and the ceremonies were attended by the President of the United States, the members of the Cabinet, representatives of the Supreme Court, the members of the diplomatic corps of other nations, the Chief of Staff of the Army, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Major General Commandant of the Marine Corps, the Commandant of the Coast Guard, and Members of the House of Representatives in a body.

Preceding the adjournment of the House and the Senate in his honor immediately following the death of Senator Robinson, some 17 Senators arose and spoke feelingly of their sorrow and the Nation's loss on his passing. On April 20, 1938, the day for memorial exercises in the Senate for those Members of that body who had died during the preceding year, some 16 Senators paid other glowing tributes to the memory of Senator Robinson.

At the times of his funeral services and memorial services in Washington, 34 Members of the Senate, from 26 different States, eulogized Senator Robinson, all expressing deep feelings of personal loss and giving high praise to his life and work. Senator Lewis, of Illinois, was unable to be present at the time of the memorial services, and he delivered his eulogy in a nationally broadcast radio address. The proceedings and the remarks made on these occasions were ordered printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and are permanently shown there.

His burial and the religious services therefor were in Little Rock, and more than 80 of his colleagues and Members of the National House of Representatives came here to be in attendance upon them. After simple impressive funeral services in the First Methodist Church at Eighth and Center Streets in Little Rock, the funeral cortege moved to the burial place in Rose Lawn Cemetery, a distance of about 3 miles. People, several deep, lined both sides of the street and road all the way from the church to the cemetery, standing with uncovered heads and sad countenances as the melancholy procession passed. This feature of the solemn occasion was so striking that it brought home to all who saw it the affection and the high esteem in which Senator Robinson was regarded by all classes of people. Their sorrow was beautifully expressed by the editor of one of the Arkansas daily papers, thus:

"It has been said of some beloved and honored men in history that when they died little children cried in the streets. There were literal tears when the sad news came that Joseph Taylor Robinson, Arkansas' beloved and honored son, had been taken away. The people of this State were moved by feelings so deep and poignant that it far transcended all ordinary public regret at the death of a distinguished public officer."

Immediately following his death it seemed there was a lament among all classes of people in all parts of the United States. A remarkably striking evidence of that was the editorial comment that was made upon the character, life, and accomplishments of Senator Robinson by newspapers in all parts of the Nation. A friend of Mrs. Robinson rendered her the service of securing clippings of these editorials from newspapers in different parts of the country and putting them in a scrapbook. That book shows some 650 editorials obtained in that manner. They are from all parts of the United States, many of them by editors who were ardent Republicans or who belonged to parties other than the Democratic Party; but in none of them is anything said of Senator Robinson that is not in admiration of his character, praise of his accomplishments, and sorrow over his loss.

In the House and in the Senate he was a loyal supporter of the Democratic Party's measures, and his leadership of the party in the Senate was marked by aggressiveness; but such was his candor and fairness and scrupulous fulfillment of his promises that at the time of his death it has been truly said he did not have an enemy in the Congress.

In addition to the testimonials from his countrymen, 18 foreign countries sent messages of condolence, either directly or through their embassies here to our Secretary of State, offering their sympathy to the Nation in its loss. Mrs. Robinson also received many personal messages of sympathy and regret from citizens of other nations. Of his reputation abroad the editor of another of our Arkansas daily papers stated:

"In Europe he was considered one of the few really outstanding statesmen this Nation has produced during the last three decades."

As minority leader, and afterward as majority leader in the Senate, Senator Robinson had occasion for many contacts with those who were Presidents of the United States during the time of his service in the Senate. In fact, when he was a Member of the House of Representatives his counsel and assistance there were sought by the Presidents of the United States much more than is usual from the membership of that numerous body.

The attachés in the White House related an incident that occurred during the Presidency of Theodore Roosevelt. The Arkansas delegation, headed by Senator Berry, called on the President, requesting that he rescind an order he had issued that adversely affected some of their constituents. After impatiently listening to their plea, the President replied impetuously, "If you were not such estimable gentlemen I should say you were a set of asses." Senator Berry was very much taken back, and informed the President that he withdrew his request, and left the Executive offices, followed by nearly all of the delegation. Only Representative Joe Robinson remained. Turning to Robinson, the President curtly said, "Well, what do you think of it?" "I think, Mr. President," replied young Robinson, "that your treatment of that old Confederate soldier was a gross act of discourtesy to a fine old gentleman. You did not give him an opportunity to fully explain the case." The bold speech arrested the attention of the President, who then performed one of his characteristic acts—he stated positively to Robinson, "You are right, my boy," called his secretary, and dictated a telegram granting the request Senator Berry had made. Whereupon Robinson said that he felt he had used too strong language. But the President brushed that aside with the remark, "Don't apologize when you are right. You are right in this instance; I was too hasty." The acquaintance thus formed ripened into friendship, and the President often called on Representative Robinson for his advice and valued his opinions highly.

When Judge Trieber died and a vacancy was created on the Federal bench for the eastern district of Arkansas, the thought of nearly everyone was that certainly a Republican would be appointed to the place. Urged by some members of the State bar and because of his own wishes in the matter, Senator Robinson went to President Coolidge with the request that he appoint John E. Martineau to fill the vacancy; and such was the influence of Senator Robinson that President Coolidge made the appointment, over strong opposition from prominent members of his party.

After the World War Senator Robinson seriously considered retiring from public office and devoting his time to the practice of law. When the rumor that he would not seek reelection was reported to President Wilson, he wrote to Senator Robinson urging that he stand for reelection, and stated:

"It would be regrettable to lose your services to the country, for I consider you the moral and intellectual leader of the Senate."

It is well known that President Franklin D. Roosevelt, as well as the Democratic Members of the Senate, greatly relied on Senator Robinson's leadership. The President held him in the highest esteem and continually sought his counsel and advice. On his death, President Roosevelt immediately wrote and caused to be published a tribute to him, in which he said:

"In his going Joe Robinson has left a record as high in achievement as it was faithful in performance. He never temporized with principle nor bargained where the public interest was the issue. But, day by day, through long service in high office, he brought to the national councils the contribution of great learning and sound wisdom—a leadership inspired by courage and guided by consummate common sense and a devotion to duty given without selfish interest.

"And so death found him at the last with hope unfaltering, with vision undimmed, and with courage unafraid. Of him well may it be said: 'He has fought a good fight; he has finished his course; he has kept the faith.'"

There is no doubt that the President intended very shortly to appoint Senator Robinson to the vacancy on the Supreme Court of the United States caused by the retirement of Justice Van Devanter. He was the choice for that appointment of everyone in the Senate; and the appointment would certainly have been made following the adjournment of the Seventy-fifth Congress.

Thus the work, career, and achievements of Joseph Taylor Robinson were largely in the public service—and what an imposing array of accomplishments he has to his credit in that field! No man from Arkansas has had anything near equal to it.

Yet—and this is interesting to bench and bar and is well worth noting in our record of his career—during all of his public life his leaning was toward and his greatest professional interest was in the practice of the law. In his early manhood his interest in the law as a science was most noticeable, and in his more mature studies—in the public schools, at the University of Arkansas, in Judge Trimble's office, and at the University of Virginia—he showed those traits of devotion to the work of the advocate and the administration of the law that mark the lawyer. From the time he was admitted to the bar until he made his campaign for Governor and on his election moved to Little Rock, he was actively engaged in the practice in his judicial circuit and in other parts of the State as a partner in the firm of Trimble & Robinson. He moved his home to Little Rock in 1913 and lived here until his death. While he resided in Little Rock, he still attended to such private practice as his time would permit during the vacations of Congress; and, contemplating retirement from public life, was associated in name but not in the partnership with the firm Coleman, Robinson & House from 1919 to 1926, and with the firm Robinson, House & Moses from 1926 until 1934. In the later years of his life his time was so completely occupied by his duties in public affairs that he retired entirely from private practice. But he was greatly interested in the law as a profession, took pride in the fact that he was a lawyer; he liked to associate with lawyers and talk about questions of law and experiences in the courts; he enjoyed a debate; and was a pleasing, efficient, and successful advocate. He was very industrious, and investigated his cases fully and carefully and took great pains that they were well prepared for trial. In examining witnesses and otherwise in developing the facts of a case, he was exceedingly good; and his arguments in the courtroom were clear, forceful, and convincing.

He had a well-knit body; a strong and pleasing cast of countenance; bright, flashing eyes; a strong and likeable personality; a clear, resonant voice; a gift for expressing himself clearly and in pleasing terms; and he could call on plenty of dramatic ability when its use was desirable to present his points and impress his hearers. In the debates in which he participated, whether in the courtroom or in legislative bodies or on the stump, he was candid and fair and his desire ever was to get to the real merit of any matter in dispute and present it clearly. His arguments were noticeably free from resort to quibbles or mere technicalities. His knowledge of parliamentary law was profound, and that, with his other fine qualities for such things, made him a presiding officer with few peers and probably no superiors during his time.

One of his outstanding characteristics, commented on by all who knew him well, was his high courage and his willingness to face any issue that arose. Again, his life was marked by a constant feeling and conduct of loyalty to all who had any claim upon him. His industry was so exceedingly great that few who ever came in contact with him did not wonder how he found the time to do the things he undertook; yet his disposition was such that things he undertook were never left uncompleted. His intelligence was high, his mind strong and independent, and he had the rare virtue of being a careful and interested listener to the opinions of others. His sense of humor constantly enlivened his conversation. He had a fund of good stories and anecdotes, and appreciated the stories of others, laughing heartily over anything funny. His feelings generally were most kindly, and if he came in contact with a person or situation where there was anything pathetic, his sympathies were immediately aroused and he was generous in his expenditure of time and trouble to aid those who needed help. His influence was so great that there were many occasions when his assistance was sought in securing offices and employment for friends, acquaintances, and many others. For really thousands of people he secured employment important enough to support them; and it was one of his greatest pleasures to be able to do so. He was beloved by very many, in all walks of life. In his political campaigns it was most noticeable how many people volunteered to help him, and were willing to stop whatever they were doing and devote their time and efforts to his cause. His manners were natural and unassuming, and his behavior on all occasions was characterized by becoming dignity. He liked company, and keenly enjoyed an evening with a circle of friends, where his wit, humor, and fund of good stories added greatly to the pleasure of the occasion. For recreation he liked hunting, fishing, and golf. He was a fine shot, particularly with a shotgun; he liked a good dog, and some of his happiest times were in hunting quail or duck.

As has been noted, he was married to Ewilda Miller in 1896. There were no children of this union, but, as is often the case in such a situation, the love and devotion of each to the other far transcended any other interest in life. Senator and Mrs. Robinson were together on all occasions. Each had supreme confidence in the other; their congeniality was perfect; their married life was beautiful.

As a leader, a trusted and beloved citizen, and in his many successive positions of power and influence, he was paid a great deal of homage, given much deserved applause, and doubtless was the recipient of a great deal of flattery; but with all of his power and all the homage that was paid him, he remained unspoiled. He was easily approached and had time and interest for the humblest matter that came to his attention; and this was completely so up to the very time of his death. It has been well said of him, that he continued to grow from the time he started in his young manhood until he died.

J. F. LOUGHBOROUGH,
Chairman,
HENRY M. ARMISTEAD,
J. R. WILSON, Committee.

Addresses Bicentennial Celebration at Manheim, Lancaster County, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by me on Saturday evening last at Manheim, Lancaster County, Pa., on the occasion of the bicentennial celebration of Manheim.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen; observances such as this help to give all of us a perspective upon our own history. I shall leave to others more qualified the pleasant task of tracing the rise of this community over the course of two centuries. Nor need I point out that while this fertile land was still being reclaimed from wilderness the artistry of Baron Stiegel of Manheim in glass was renowned wherever things of beauty are recognized and appreciated.

In coming here I am reminded that when my paternal ancestors passed through this countryside before the Revolution, en route over the Alleghenies to seek a home near Fort Ligonier in what is now Westmoreland County, the community of Manheim was already well established as the hub of a pioneering farm community. I feel a kinship for this countryside because my maternal forbears settled in Lancaster County, on Conoy Creek, and several of them are buried in the old Donegal Church Cemetery not many miles from here.

Two hundred years of the toil and perseverance of a hard-working, determined people have gone into the creation of a prosperous center of industry and agriculture out of the pioneering settlement erected by the founding fathers of Manheim.

We must necessarily feel, today, that this very history of struggle imposes upon all of us a duty to make certain that such sacrifice and toil was worth while, to carry forward the work of those who have gone before, to enrich the heritage we have received for the benefit of those who will come after us.

We know it was not an easy task to break the rich soil of this countryside to the plough, to clear away the woodlands, to fend off hostile savages, to erect civilized habitations and establish a government of law and order in the wilderness. We know it took fortitude, courage, and rare persistency. Those pioneers who undertook to conquer the soil could not have hoped in their generation to have all the civilized advantages enjoyed in the Old World. It was enough for them that they were free men, governing themselves in their own way, worshipping in their own churches without compulsion or persecution. It was enough that their government was their own, created by their own will and not forced upon them by the will of another. It was enough that they were free to speak and write as they chose. Their life was hard, but it was their own. The land they conquered with their rude farming implements took its toll in sweat and labor, but it repaid their efforts with rich harvests, and it was theirs, a living for themselves and a heritage for their children. We can guess what that freedom, that lordship of each over his own acres, must have meant to the many who were refugees from persecution in foreign lands.

In the years that followed those early beginnings the men of Manheim fought to make their new Nation independent, in order that their own independence might be assured. They fought still later to maintain the freedom of the seas, which was indispensable to their national life as the youngest member in the family of nations. When the time came to fight for preservation of the Federal Union upon which their free democracy rested, they were ready and quick to respond.

The years brought growth and change. Broad farm lands succeeded the forests, old communities grew, and new ones were started. More and better roads opened new fields for development of commerce and exchange of ideas. Even the most outlying settlements were brought closer in point of time to the centers of urban life and to the seats of State and National Governments. Out of this growth and this interchange came a unity of purpose—an expression in concrete form of the aspirations which had sent men and women into the wilderness to find "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

Modern inventions, modern ways of life, the narrowing of horizons through swift communication and travel by land, sea, and air—all have contributed to make life more complex, and at the same time to make the application of the simple, straightforward principles of the founding fathers more difficult. Yet we have seen those principles woven into the fabric of our lives, and the more complex our problems the more those principles appeal to us as common sense, practical, honest, and just. As the years go on and as our national problems increase, we come to appreciate them the more because they stand up under everyday wear and tear. Often we don't think of them consciously. In fact, we rarely do except when they are threatened. Without even thinking about them, we use them as a yardstick in measuring both men and nations. If an employer mistreats and exploits his workers, we despise him, for our judgments are guided by the principle that men were not made for either chattel slavery or wage slavery. If one man's right to speak and write as he chooses is threatened, we are up in arms, for we know that whoever challenges that right is challenging our own liberty as well. We never think in terms of religious persecution because for generations it has been entirely foreign to our thoughts, but when we see it practiced in foreign lands we condemn its wickedness. We accept it as a matter of course that no man can be deprived of his property without due process of law, and that everyone accused of crime shall have, as a matter of inalienable right, a fair and open trial before a jury of his peers. Habeas corpus and trial by jury are so much a part of our lives that we never think that they are not by any means universal, but instead are guaranteed under a form of government which must be maintained if they are to survive. We have enjoyed the blessings of liberty as naturally as we enjoy the air and sunlight, and it is only by searching back through history that we come to realize they are not gifts of nature but man-made creations, born of mankind's thirst for justice, won and maintained by our ancestors on many a bloody battlefield. How many of us, who indifferently neglect to cast a ballot on election day, realize that men died to win that right, and that millions in dictator-ridden lands today would give all they possess for such a mighty weapon.

If there is any truth in the repeated assertions of the European dictators that the democracies have grown soft, it lies in this, that we have so long enjoyed the fruits of democracy that we have lost sight of the principles upon which they rest. If it is inconvenient to go to the polls, we permit corrupt political machines to thwart our will. If someone expresses beliefs contrary to our own, particularly in times of anxiety and stress, we feel inclined to waive the principle of free speech and even to cheer when someone cracks down on him, even though we know, or should know if we thought about it, that we may also have need some day to speak out against the wishes of the majority just as he does. We are too often tolerant of the oppression of minorities without realizing that we, too, may sometime find ourselves in the minority and similarly oppressed.

This, then, is the real danger to a free America, the danger that without realizing it we will hold our own free institutions too lightly, and will blindly go forward with "business as usual" when they are threatened. There were peoples in Europe who had such institutions and did not appreciate them until they were gone.

We are too easily disposed to look upon our democracy as something in terms of history, of great sayings by our great men, of orations on patriotic occasions. If that were all, we could inter it in the Library of Congress and forget it except on ceremonial occasions. It is more than that, much more.

It is our right to live and breathe without fear, knowing we will not be carried off in the night to a concentration camp, knowing our lives are not being shadowed by secret police, knowing the race or creed of ourselves or our grandparents will not be called into question. It is our right to think as we please, say what we please, write what we please, worship as we please. It is our right to earn our living in our chosen calling, to obtain the rewards of our labor and enterprise, and to be secure in our right to our homes and our possessions.

These are fundamental natural rights, but not universal rights. They are denied to millions living in otherwise civilized lands in other parts of the earth. It is not inconceivable—in fact, it is highly probable—that we, too, would be denied them were we so unfortunate as to accept or have imposed upon us the philosophy underlying the dictatorships.

Let no one suppose that a determined effort is not being made to have us accept it. The attack is both direct and indirect, and in both cases it is constant and unrelenting.

The direct attack is an appeal to fear, ignorance, bigotry, and discontent. No effort has been spared to terrorize men and women in this country whose loved ones are under the domination of dictatorship abroad. No appeal has been too fantastic to make to those who, in their ignorance of the blessings of democracy, can be persuaded to believe that one-man government is better than government by the people. No means of encouraging class, racial, religious, or political bigotry has been overlooked. No opportunity to prey upon the discontent of the underprivileged has gone unnoticed.

Even more dangerous, because more subtle and insidious, is the indirect approach. Many otherwise patriotic but faint-hearted Americans, unmindful of history and unable to comprehend the meaning of democracy, counsel compromise. They forget the basic principle of Christianity, that there can be no compromise with evil. Some of them sincerely believe that in lending aid to the defenders of democracy abroad we are embarking upon an idealistic missionary adventure. Nothing could be farther from the truth. We are thinking in hard-headed, deliberately selfish, and calculated terms, in terms of saving our own democracy. We are thinking in terms of having other nations bear the brunt of the battle against dictatorship in order that our own young men may not have to march out on the firing line. It is as simple as that. Appeasers have contended all along that we were motivated by a desire to help Britain for sentimental or commercial or other reasons apart from our own defense. The latest turn of events, the outbreak of war between Germany and Russia, has shown how false and hollow that argument was, for we are now pledged to help Russia, and no one can possibly contend that we have any special interest in the defense of the Soviet form of government. We simply recognize that every soldier who bears arms against Hitler is defending us by helping to destroy a regime which has exploited and sacrificed the German people to a mad ambition on the one hand and oppressed millions of Europeans on the other. We know that if Russian soldiers were not fighting to stem the Nazi advance in the Ukraine, if British R. A. F. flyers were not bombing the invasion ports on the French coast, if Australians were not storming the Nazi strongholds in Africa, the so-called wave of the future would be even now rolling over us in full tide.

Can anyone doubt that Hitler desires the great riches of the American continents? The recent history of his conquests should leave little doubt of that. Can anyone doubt that he would fulfill that desire if he were able? No one who has read the daily newspapers in recent years could deny it. And can anyone doubt that if he were master of Europe, with the Asiatic part of his Axis under his control, and with no armies in the field opposing him, no British fighters and bombers disputing his mastery of the air, no British Fleet to disrupt his shipping, he would hesitate for a moment to prepare for new conquest on this continent? We would like to believe he would not. Many who blind themselves to facts have persuaded themselves that he would not. We cannot afford to deceive ourselves with such wishful thinking.

Every foreign soldier on the firing lines against Hitler, every foreign sailor harassing his raiders on the high seas, every foreign pilot bombing his supply lines, means one less American soldier, one less American sailor, one less American pilot needed to sacrifice for the defense of America. And if our help to those foreign soldiers and sailors and airmen reaches them soon enough, in sufficient volume, our own American boys will be spared. That is why I am for all-out aid to everyone who is fighting Hitler on land, on the sea, under the sea, and in the air. That is why I am for convoys. That is why I am fighting so hard for adequate aid to the defenders of democracy abroad, for if we are successful in that I shall not only have kept my pledge never to vote to send a single American soldier to fight on a European battlefield, but, what is even more important, it will not be necessary to send our boys out to fight and die on American battlefields for the defense of their homes and firesides against an aggressor.

As we meet here today we look back over two centuries of progress in this community, where the arts and sciences of peace flourish, where men are free and the orderly processes of self-government prevail. I think these things which Manheim has, and upon which it looks with such pride today, are worth preserving. When we look back upon those pioneering days some of us may wish it had been given to us to live in those stirring days, those glorious days when the foundations of our democracy were being laid by men of courage and vision. But we need not look backward, for to us also has been given a great historic mission—the preservation of our democracy against the flood tide of dictatorship which has already rolled over a great part of the civilized world. We, too, stand at Armageddon. Let us stand firm. Let us bear ourselves with courage and fortitude through this period of world upheaval, ready and willing to make some small sacrifices for those who are offering their lives to democracy on foreign battle fronts, and with the help of Divine Providence our democracy shall be preserved for this generation and generations yet to come.

Flag Day Address to Miami Lodge, B. P. O. E.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. ERNEST W. McFARLAND, OF ARIZONA

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able and eloquent Flag Day address delivered at Miami, Fla., on June 14, 1941, by the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. McFARLAND].

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Brother Elks, and fellow Americans, it is a distinct honor, which I very highly appreciate, that I have been invited to address this patriotic audience under the auspices of your lodge. I told Senator PEPPER when he invited me that I was a little embarrassed in coming to his State to speak where you are accustomed to hearing such distinguished speakers as he and Senator ANDREWS.

We are assembled to commemorate the anniversary of the adoption of the flag of the United States and to renew our pledge of allegiance. It is fitting and proper that we, on this day, honor the flag of the United States. It was 164 years ago today that Congress met in Independence Hall in Philadelphia and adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the flag of the United States be 13 stripes, alternate red and white; that the union be 13 stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation."

The words "13 stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation" are the very soul and spirit of the American flag. Like twinkling stars in the heavens, the stars in our flag signal to humanity the birth of the first Nation on earth dedicated to personal and religious liberty of mankind, a Nation founded upon eternal principles of fredom, equality, justice, and humanity.

Following the admission of Vermont to the Union in 1791 and Kentucky in 1792, Congress, by resolution, added 2 stars and 2 stripes to the flag. This was the design of the flag flying over Fort McHenry, Md., during the bombardment on the nights of September 13 and 14, 1814, that inspired Francis Scott Key to write The Star-Spangled Banner, but as other States were admitted into the Union it was decided that the flag must be brought up to date. So again, in 1818, Congress passed another flag resolution fixing the number of stripes at 13 to represent the Thirteen Original States and providing for the addition of a new star for each new State. Thus, today we have a flag of 13 stripes and 48 stars, my own State, Arizona, representing the forty-eighth star.

Our flag is beautiful, not solely because of its design and its colors, but because it is an emblem of a great Nation, a Nation founded in the Thirteen Original States by our forefathers who, for 6 long bitter years, struggled and endured hardships that we might have this land of freedom and justice. It is, therefore, particularly fitting that the 13 stripes symbolize those Thirteen Original States.

The red in our flag proclaims the courage which the men and women of our race have always shown; the courage which has inspired the men and women of our country to face danger and to do what was right. George Washington explained the white in our flag by saying "We take the stars from heaven, the red from the mother country, England, separating it by white stripes, thus showing that we have separated from her, and the white stripes shall go down to posterity representing liberty." The blue stands for loyalty, telling the story of thousands of men and women who have been loyal to their country through thick and thin, no matter how great the sacrifice.

Just as the 13 stripes represent the work of our revolutionary forefathers, each star stands for the work of their children who followed in their footsteps. Each star tells a story of struggle, toil, danger, and hardship in a state of the wilderness that presented to us the flag of this country.

Our flag as a symbol of our Nation is what we make it. If, through our aspirations, conduct, and achievement, we make this country great, then our flag is great. If our aims are not lofty, if our conduct and achievements as poor, then the flag of our country means little or nothing.

May I pause to tell you that recently I was happy to report for the Judiciary Committee Senator ANDREWS' bill which amended the legislation prohibiting the desecration of the flag and its use for advertisement, which applied to the District of Columbia, and extending this law to the whole of the United States. So we now have, for the first time, through the efforts of your own Senator, national legislation for the protection of our flag.

Our flag typifies the courage, the initiative, and the resourcefulness of an American people who have, through years of hardship and toil, established and perfected a kind of government which has so well answered our needs that it has proved a model for other nations seeking liberty and individual freedom. In us rests the responsibility of seeing to it that our Nation continues to be a nation of liberty and individual freedom.

I need not tell you that America faces one of the gravest crises in her history. We have men gone mad come to leadership in nations across the sea. We have seen these men strike down and destroy by brutal might and force their weaker neighbors. We have seen the lights of liberty and freedom go out one by one in the Old World, until there is left but the faltering flame that still burns in Britain. So long as we have madmen at the head of nations, we cannot know the future of America.

Very recently our President and our Congress were called upon to decide what we were going to do about the situation which we have been discussing—the future of America. The question presented itself in the form of the decision to be made on the lend-lease bill. It was a momentous decision for anyone to be called upon to make. The advocates of the easy way, the way of postponement and of hoping for the best and of appeasement, were organized in their effort and loud in their clamor that we adopt the policy of pretending that the dogs of war were not loose, as if by ignoring them we could escape their lust for blood and butchery. To differ with these people was to earn for yourself the name of "warmonger" and "king lover" and other names not nearly as flattering.

I am happy to announce that when our leaders answered they did so with courage, and Senator PEPPER was one of the leaders in the fight. They accepted the challenge fearlessly. They told the world in no uncertain terms that America stood with the cause of freedom and liberty and justice, and that democracy embattled in other parts of the world would have at its back the strength and resources of the most powerful nation on earth.

This means that we will be called upon to make sacrifices. Each one of us will have to give a little more than his accustomed efforts. Each will have to take a little less material gain than he has learned to expect. Those of us who have been quick to criticize must learn to be tolerant.

We are again testing whether this Nation, conceived in liberty and in justice, shall continue to endure. Today, as never before, do the American people need to be united in their efforts for national defense, in our efforts to see that we are able to produce the goods to aid Great Britain. Without a united effort we must necessarily fail.

We have seen what happened to France, Holland, and those other countries when their governments were undermined. Today we read in the newspapers, we hear over the radio, that Communists are responsible for delays in our national defense. At this time I want to compliment the people of Florida for having ruled the Communist Party off the ballot. I am proud that my own State was the first to take this action. It was the opinion of our attorney general, Joe Conway, followed by our secretary of state, Harry Moore, which first blazed a trail in ruling the Communist Party off of the ballot in the last election. We have no place upon the ballot in any State in the Union for such a party, one which would undermine our Government and does not stand for the principles of our Government. I say that it is time that we make the United States of America 100 percent American. I say that it is time we rid ourselves of those subversive interests in the United States of America. When we have done this and when we have adequately prepared our Nation, then, and then only, will we be safe from attacks from the other side.

We have no place for a party which stands for:

1. Hatred of God and all forms of religion.
2. Destruction of private property and inheritance.
3. Promotion of class hatred.
4. Revolutionary propaganda through the Communist Internationale, stirring up Communist activities in foreign countries in order to cause strikes, riots, sabotage, bloodshed, and civil war.
5. Destruction of all forms of representative or democratic governments, including civil liberties, such as freedom of speech, of the press, of assembly, and trial by jury.
6. The ultimate and final objective, by means of world revolution, to establish the dictatorship of the so-called proletariat into one world Union of Soviet Socialist Republics with the capital at Moscow.

These are the principles of communism. If the Communist Party in America does not stand for them, why don't they change their name? And may I add that we have no place in America for aliens who believe in these principles. If they don't like our form of government, let them take the boat back to the other side.

So today, when all of the "ism" nations would divide us by propaganda, we must recognize but one "ism"—Americanism. We must present a united front. We must and will prove to the world that a democratic nation can meet the test, for we see in Old Glory not only a beautiful silken banner with lovely, inspiring colors and insignia, but we see the symbol of a free and independent government standing for liberty and justice.

Our flag represents the highest ideals possible for a nation. It represents the ideals of our forefathers, who through hardship and work gave us this Nation. It is the flag which has never come down. The spirit of those who have gone before, from the blood-marked snow of Valley Forge down to those resting in Flanders Field, cry, "Long may Old Glory wave o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

Address Before Commonwealth Club at San Francisco, Calif.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK VAN NUYS

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

ADDRESS BY ASSOCIATE JUSTICE DOUGLAS

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, on June 20, 1941, Associate Justice William O. Douglas of the Supreme Court of the United States delivered an inspiring address before the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco, Calif. I ask that the address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There probably have been but few generations which have felt as poignantly as ours the challenge in the poet's dictum that—

"Each age is a dream that is dying
Or one that is coming to birth."

We know that we are more than mere spectators on a world revolutionary scene. We know that those revolutionary forces are infections in the world blood stream and that we shall be profoundly affected even though that disease will not ultimately triumph.

For these reasons we are all thinking deeply and profoundly about our responsibilities in this present world crisis.

Not so long ago I heard a professional group cheer the boast of a speaker that he had not mentioned once in his address the word "democracy."

Democracy, however, is no empty word, no mere shibboleth. It is a word to fill the heart with pride.

It reflects the faith of nations in the common sense of the common man.

It carries the precious cargo of equal justice under the law, the right freely to speak and write and to worship God, the right of free assembly, and equality of political and social opportunity.

It is the way of life which respects the dignity of man, which recognizes no special class of citizenship based on wealth or poverty, or color, race, or creed.

These are commonplaces to us. We are inclined to take them for granted as we are the sun, and moon, and stars. But in these days of world upheaval unguarded assumption of the permanency of any institution is hazardous.

For these reasons, now is the time for open avowal of our faith, not for silence. Now is the time to utilize vigorously our constitutional rights so as to preach and practice incessantly the truths of democracy.

As Francis Hackett has put it, "We, the democrats, have not supposed that we must assert ourselves aggressively. Our faith has been sapped because of that" (I Chose Denmark (1940)). Aggressive assertion of an unbounded devotion to this way of life not only replenishes the people's faith—it helps create the alertness in thought and action necessary to transform that faith into a work-a-day creed.

With the world on fire we know it is not enough for us to vote and pay taxes and earn a living. Fifty years ago the thought was current that the Nation could afford the luxury of having little skill in government because it required the use of its best brains and talents in the development of the country. But we know that we can ill afford any such diversions from active participation in this current campaign.

The needs of democracy cannot be filled merely by service within the normal orbit of our daily lives. Those needs must also be satisfied through civic, municipal, county, State, and national activities. And, somehow or other, our contributions must be made through those channels by devoting at least a part of our reserves of energy to public enterprises.

We have it in our power, by giving only a part of our lives, to provide a leadership in thought and action which will create a genuine—a spiritual—renaissance of the democratic faith. Those millions of Americans who have a real appreciation of the blood and sweat and sacrifice which through the centuries have ingrained into our present society the noblest ideals of mankind are the strongest sort of bulwark against those forces which would dislodge society from its moorings.

1. We must make sure that our citizens retain their old tradition of participating in the important decisions which affect their lives, their property, their ideals. The gap between local democracy and national representative government must not be allowed to widen. The people must remain part of an integrated national system, so that they feel an intimate contact with their Government, so that it does not become a thing apart—removed and remote from them. One of the ways of maintaining that bridge is through the many articulate but unofficial groups concerned with some aspect of our social, economic, or governmental problems. Through them many a citizen can become an active participant in the body politic and actually share in the decisions which affect his own welfare. Such groups help make democratic government the imperishable possession of each citizen. Hence they are strong underpinning for an aroused and alert democracy. May the leaders of community thought, devoted to democratic ideals, assume responsibility for making them effective agencies through which the people may undertake active daily roles of citizenship.

2. The function of democracy, unlike totalitarian governments, is to train men—little men as well as big men—not for subjugation but for independence. We know that therein lies the great strength of democracy. We know that only in that way can the great spiritual values of a whole people be cultivated and preserved. Yet we also know that that requires great skills in view of the complexities of a technological age. It means that every citizen must have a stake in his country adequate to justify in his eyes the sacrifices which any contingency may entail. It means that some way or other big men and little men must work as partners in our national endeavors. It means that powerful men and weak men must be joint venturers in preserving America in its own image. It means that government must serve a whole people—regardless of lines of wealth or poverty, strength, or weakness. And our endeavor must be not the detection of motes in each other's eyes but an objective, united assault on common problems.

To integrate the energies of little men and big men, share and share alike, into all local, State, and National undertakings is a task which requires continuous statesmanship. But success in that effort is a permanent achievement. It means that no caste system takes root. It means that equality and fraternity are given practical recognition. It means that men from all walks of life will find common adventure and thrills in serving jointly a great cause. It means that the eyes of men will be lifted from mean objectives to lofty ideals.

The sense of fraternity, the desire for service, the adventurous instinct are deep in the soul of America. They have been successfully appealed to before by offer of far less noble causes than the democracies now tender.

3. There must not grow up in this country any second or third or fourth class of citizenship.

There is only one class of citizenship in this Nation. There is no room for any inferior grade. Where one has been allowed, the result has been the downward spiral of disunity. Then hate and intolerance have been incorporated. Under those conditions the enemies of democracy invariably have risen to power. Under those conditions there is an insistence on a conformity which is the beginning of a disintegrating process.

Every nonconformist who is beaten, every practitioner of the right of free speech who is jailed, every unpopular exponent of a religious faith who is deprived of his constitutional rights bring every free man a step closer to incarceration or punishment, or discreet and frightened conformity. Infraction of the Bill of Rights knows no terminal points. We know from the experience of other peoples that what starts as suppression of an unpopular minority swings as easily to persecutions on the right or on the left, until few can afford to be nonconformists. Those who started as instigators of oppression of a minority often turned out to be the next victims. We know that the concentration camps of Europe are not operated on racial, economic, social, or intellectual lines.

We should ever be mindful that all the battles for freedom are not won in the courts. "Only a persistent, positive translation of the liberal faith into the thoughts and acts of the community is the real reliance against the unabated temptation to straitjacket the human mind." (Frankfurter, Law and Politics, p. 197.) Vigilant patrol of the domestic scene against infraction of these fundamental constitutional rights will guarantee that the American sense of fair play will carry the day.

4. A contemporary observer has said that as a result of the incredible sophistries and the brutal and ruthless attacks by totalitarian leaders on the democratic processes, "The Declaration of Independence may now be referred to without apology, and even policemen on the beat are becoming dimly aware that there is such a thing as the Bill of Rights."

Certainly, those assaults have made us all realize more keenly than ever before that there is only one liberty, and that is liberty within the law. Without that cementing element there can never be confidence in order—the real basis of all security. And without a common sense of security there can be no effective compact among men based on conceptions of equality and fraternity. That entails, as a practical necessity, a constant recognition of the responsibilities as well as the rights of citizenship. There will be some who will be willing to exploit the Bill of Rights in order to destroy or mutilate the system which makes the Bill of Rights possible. But the defense against them is vigorous assertion by millions of Americans of their constitutional rights so as to preserve our basic freedoms, not to defile them. It is to be found in an alert and aroused citizenry intent on making the democratic processes function in any and all crises and resolved not to permit the forces of discord, fear, hesitation, or inaction to paralyze the operations of government.

Those who appreciate the human sacrifices which have made our free institutions possible know that rights are accompanied by responsibilities. They know that recognition of those responsibilities is the certain method of preserving and nurturing those rights. When rights and responsibilities go hand in hand, there is the strongest guaranty possible that liberty within the law is not mere temporary luxury but a permanent necessity for a free people. When the energies of the people are absorbed in that common endeavor the whisperers of hate and intolerance loom no more important than the occupants of psychiatric wards.

Whatever may be the specific ways and means, whatever the effort, the pole star will always be the ingredients of the democratic faith. These have recently been stated by an eminent American, Carl Becker, as follows:

"To have faith in the dignity and worth of the individual man as an end in himself, to believe that it is better to be governed by persuasion than by coercion, to believe that fraternal good will is more worthy than a selfish and contentious spirit, to believe that in the long run all values are inseparable from the love of truth and the disinterested search for it, to believe that knowledge and the power it confers should be used to promote the welfare and happiness of all men rather than to serve the interests of those individuals and classes whom fortune and intelligence endow with temporary advantage—these are the values which are affirmed by the traditional democratic ideology."

In final analysis our individual and joint efforts must have as their end product the way of life which underwrites those eternal truths.

In 1775, when this Nation was uniting against the tyranny of that age, a great patriot said, "We are not weak if we make a proper use of those means which the god of nature hath placed in our power."

Today those words ring as true as they did then.

The means which God has placed in our power embrace not only material resources but also great inner spiritual strength, an abiding sense of fair play, an abundance of common sense, a deep sense of fraternity, a great reserve of ingenuity, a desire for service. To evoke these qualities from all the people in times of peace as well as war will mean that our rich heritage of freedom will remain imperishable. Utilization of those tremendous reserves of strength will guarantee that this age is not a dream that is dying but one that is coming to glorious birth.

The Paderewski Testimonial Services

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

ADDRESS BY THE POLISH AMBASSADOR

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by His Excellency, Mr. Jan Ciechanowski, Polish Ambassador to the United States, over the blue network of the National Broadcasting Co. on July 3, in connection with the services for Paderewski. I hope every Senator will read the address paying tribute to this remarkable man.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On Sunday the 29th of June, in New York, 1 hour before midnight, the heart of Paderewski ceased to beat.

The whole world knew and admired this indomitable Pole. He will always remain the symbol of a Poland fighting for freedom, justice, and legality.

The sad news flashed around the world and his personality was so great that for one tense moment the news of his death seemed to rise above the clash of arms and the hiss of burning hatreds unleashed by human madness.

It is impossible to define genius, especially when, as in the case of Paderewski, it embraces so vast a scale of accomplishment. One cannot speak of him as of the undoubtedly greatest musician of his time without saying that he was also an eminent statesman, a great diplomatist, a highly cultivated classical scholar, one of the greatest orators of his day, a marvelous linguist and especially a man, intensely human, noble, pure, full of simplicity, accessible, whose magnetic personality, powerful and brilliant mind and infinite charm of manner, allowed him to hold with sublime dignity a unique rank among his contemporaries on personal merit and distinction.

Such was Paderewski, whose untimely death deprives his beloved Poland, at this time, of her most dire need, unprecedented even in her so tragic history, of his unfailing courage, his ardent patriotism and his unerring wisdom.

I had the signal privilege of working under Mr. Paderewski's direct guidance as chief of his secretariat at the Paris Peace Conference and later in Warsaw. During those thrilling months I had the opportunity to observe day and night the versatility of his genius and his untiring activity in establishing Poland's restored independence on the basis of President Wilson's 14 points. History will undoubtedly determine in what measure Mr. Paderewski contributed to inspire President Wilson to declare the independence of Poland to be one of the basic conditions of European peace.

The generous and friendly gesture of President Roosevelt in offering the hospitality of the national cemetery at Arlington to Paderewski until Poland, once more free, can open her arms to receive the mortal remains of her great citizen—is an act of American friendship and sympathy which the Polish people will forever keep in grateful memory.

It appears to conform to tradition that the life of Paderewski, as that of Poland's foremost fighters for freedom, should have been so closely linked with this great American democracy.

Next to Poland, he regarded the United States as his spiritual homeland. This would seem quite natural because his outstanding qualities, his simplicity, his sincerity, his generosity, his accessibility are qualities so typical of the American people.

Through the death of Paderewski, music has lost one of her greatest masters. Poland has lost her greatest citizen and ambassador, and the world of beauty and culture is deprived of a soul which was the most perfect expression of the highest ideals of humanity.

Poland will fight on.

Independence Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF ATTORNEY GENERAL JACKSON

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix a radio address delivered by Attorney General Robert H. Jackson in connection with the Independence Day celebration at Washington, D. C., July 4, 1941.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For nearly 2 years now many of us have been bewildered by the headlong course of events in Europe and not a few of us have been confused as to the course of wisdom at home. We have seen a nation which 20 years ago had been vanquished rise up with a ferocity seldom seen in the history of mankind. We have seen vaunted armies smashed as if they were so much paper. We have seen Europe overrun and England placed in grave danger. We have seen the dictator idea spread in the world. At first its two principal proponents, communism and fascism, appeared to be mortal enemies. Then, one day, they turned up as partners. Now they battle each other.

For nearly 2 years Americans have been asking each other which way safety and security lie. We have pondered the problem, weighing risk against risk and danger against danger. Now at last on this Fourth of July in 1941 the truth of our situation is coming home with increasing clarity to all Americans. We are learning the overwhelming fact that now, as in 1776, our Nation, together with our sister republics on this hemisphere, faces a preponderantly hostile and undemocratic world. Now, as in 1776, we can turn to the Declaration of Independence for the principles which should guide our action.

You are lifted and inspired, like generations before you, by the majestic cadence of the boldest, the noblest, and best known of all American writings. The Declaration of Independence speaks strong doctrine in plain words. It is the world's master indictment of oppression. The fervor of its denunciation haunts and challenges dictators everywhere and in every field of life.

But the Declaration of Independence does not stop with mere denials and negations. It sets forth great affirmations as to the permissible foundations of power and political leadership among freemen. It lays down a fighting faith in the rights of man—merely as man—a faith to die by if need be, or even more bravely to live by. It impresses upon all political power the high obligation of trusteeship. It established an accountability by the governing few to the governed many. That is why men abroad who wield dictatorial powers over subject peoples would silence the reading of the Declaration of Independence, would tear all mention of it from the record, and torture all recollection of it out of the minds of men. Even at home there are some who hope it will not be read too loudly.

But the masses of warm-hearted people are reared on its strong doctrines of equality and human rights. It has exceeded every other modern pronouncement in its profound influence upon our lives, our culture, and our relations to the world. When the Constitution of the United States was adopted, its foundations were laid in the democratic idealism of the Declaration. It has been the inspiration for every later recognition of broadened human rights and for the extension of justice and security to all men. We do not claim to have reached a perfect fulfillment of its high principles. But we have achieved the nearest approach among all the nations to a classless society, to equality of rights, and to a fair distribution of opportunity and prosperity. Whenever we reproach our own imperfections, as we ought often to do, we must not forget that our shortcomings are visible only when measured against our ideals, never when put beside the practical living conditions of the rest of the world. We have by Constitution, by legislation, and by judicial decision translated the Declaration out of the language of abstract philosophy into the idiom of everyday living. We have validated democratic principles by our success.

America's position in the society of nations is unavoidably that of a champion of the freedoms. The reason is aptly stated by Carl Becker, who says:

"In the Declaration the foundation of the United States is indissolubly associated with a theory of politics, a philosophy of human rights, which is valid, if at all, not for Americans only, but for all men."

When our national success demonstrated that freedom is an attainable goal, we made it the ultimate goal of all peoples everywhere. The "four freedoms" are not local nor transient incidents; they are universal and timeless principles if they are valid at all. A blow against their existence in Europe is a blow at their validity everywhere. On the other hand, the example of a great and powerful people governed by their own consent through lawmakers of their free choice is a standing incitement to overturn tyranny anywhere. Malevolent conquests by dictators are silently undermined by our confession of faith in democracy as stated in the Declaration. That carries hope to subject peoples in whom there would otherwise be a noble, but unavailing fortitude. Overridden countries find a bid to insurrection in its assertion of the right of the people to alter or abolish an existing government that is destructive of life, liberty, and happiness. They read words of invitation in its statement of their right "to institute new government, laying its foundations on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness." No wonder the Declaration of Independence is the nightmare of conquerors.

Some will say that the decision faced by the patriots of 1776 was an easier one than ours, since they had nothing to lose but their intolerable situation. Our task, some will argue, is to protect rather than to win our freedom and that for that reason we should be cautious.

But if the patriots of 1776 risked little by action, we risk much by indifference. Today we risk the loss of a physical, cultural, and spiritual heritage of freedom far beyond the most inspired visions of the leaders of '76. And the more of the world that ceases to be democratic, the greater our risk will be. We do not need to be imprudent or foolhardy, but we should recognize that no amount of cautious behavior, no amount of polite talk will earn for us the friendship and good will of dictator systems. Ultimately we must come to the day when we shall face their threats and their enmity for no other reason than that we persist in living the kind of life we live.

One fact emerges clear above all others. We Americans cannot cease to be the kind of people we are, we cannot cease to live the kind of life we live. We are not the kind of people the dictators will ever want in the world. They will never have any use for our kind of life, nor we for theirs.

Every American knows now, as he knew it in 1776, that there is nothing for him in that way of life.

There are those who shrink from the risks of standing for a forthright, practical application of democracy. They point to the striking power and efficiency of foes abroad. But the enemies of American democracy today cannot begin to assemble a force so relatively powerful and so encircling as were its foes that day when the signers of the Declaration pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honors in its support.

The most strategic points in our own country were then in possession of the King's armies. Canada was a base for his operations. Florida, Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the mouth of the Mississippi were occupied by forces of Spanish monarchy—no lover of democracy. And the unsolved problem of the Colonies along their whole precarious frontier was the Indian. American democracy then had no navy, only an empty treasury. Its army was composed of untrained volunteer backwoodsmen who could not get shoes, clothing, or substantial arms to fight the invading British regulars. There was no national unity. There were cabals against Washington, a "fifth column" of Royalists was powerful and respectable, and the States were jealous rivals who did not act, nor even think, as a unit. But in such an hour our forefathers who believed in freedom did not fear to stand alone and to become, as they continued for many years to be, the world's only real democracy. But the American forces had power—the unseen power of the earnest individual—the individual with what Mr. Justice Holmes called "fire in his belly." Only when these fires go out need we fear the lawless forces of dictatorship. Democracy's strength is in man-to-man measure. None other draws such initiative from its way of life, none invents, and none has so generally and fully mastered in its daily life the technique of handling modern machine transport and production. And we dwell among resources as incredible as acres of diamonds.

But there is at home and abroad an antidemocratic influence even more cynical and sinister and dangerous than Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin combined. I refer to those who think democracy is a fair-weather ideal—to guide us in soft times—but that when the going is tough we cannot save it without losing it. This doctrine has every base quality of fascism without either its candor or courage. Let us in America never forget that liberties trampled by conquest may be regained, but liberties abandoned by an indifferent people are never recovered. Nor are they deserved.

Let us not forget the example of our forefathers. They, too, heard the argument that time of external danger was no time to advance freedoms. But their answer was to give liberty a new birth not only in the midst of a war but in the very darkest hours of that war, because they knew that what wins struggles are the last ounces of endurance and the reserves of power that come to the common run of men on fire for a cause. Such men do not count costs nor watch the clock. We must keep our freedoms, keep them in face of foreign dangers even more tenaciously and jealously than in calmer times—keep them because it is our liberty that lifts our cause above material ends and anchors our efforts in timeless things. We know that in the unfolding book of destiny, just as in the closed book of history, it is written that tyranny and oppression bring forth their own downfall and that the irresistible moral forces of the world march always on the side of resolute men when freedom is their goal. We know that the spiritual strength and the moral power of our democratic tradition, authenticated by a century and a half of progress, will not long yield the field anywhere in the world despite the temporary devastations by enemies of the fundamental philosophy of our Declaration of Independence. As Kipling has said:

"Though all we knew depart,
The old commandments stand:
'In courage keep your heart,
In strength lift up your hand.'"

Americans Rededicate Themselves

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST W. McFARLAND

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF COL. CHARLES H. RUTHERFORD

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address broadcast from station KTAR, in Phoenix, Ariz., on July 3, by Col. Charles H. Rutherford, civilian aide to the Secretary of War, speaking under the auspices of the Arizona Division, Committee to Defend America. The subject of the address was Americans Rededicate Themselves.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Tomorrow will be the anniversary of the first dedication of the American people to the principles of democracy. More than a century and a half ago our forefathers, by their signatures to the Declaration of Independence, dedicated themselves and their descendants, their country and its future, their fortunes and their sacred honor, to set up and maintain a country where man and his freedom is supreme and the Government is his creature and servant.

Today the world is faced with the threat—yes; the imminent danger—that unless we defend ourselves with every ounce of our strength and resources our Government, our cherished liberties, our prosperity, and our high standards of living are liable to be swept away by the resurgence of barbarism revived and mechanized by the Nazi hordes.

Hitler calls his system of slavery the new order, but it is not a new order. The system of the Nazi dictator is merely a revival, in a more horrible form and with more terrible forces, of the oldest and crudest forms of despotism. Hitler has usurped the rights of his own people by stratagem and force, and trained a generation of them to enthusiastic subservience to himself. He has overrun and enslaved the peoples of more than a dozen nations, and has announced that he intends to overrun and dominate and enslave the world. He has specifically stated that democracy and his new order cannot exist in the world and that he will destroy democracy.

I regret the necessity of painting this terrible picture, but it is necessary to warn the American people of their imminent danger—that they may again dedicate themselves to the principles of human freedom, that they may again determine, as their forefathers did, that tyranny shall not rule them.

Tomorrow, the 4th of July, the anniversary of the first dedication of the American people to the principles and practices of democracy, it is especially fitting and appropriate for our people to rededicate themselves to the same ideals for which our fathers fought. For this purpose the Office of Civilian Defense, under the leadership of Mayor LaGuardia, of New York, has arranged a 10-minute program for 2 o'clock tomorrow, July 4, in which the people of America will again solemnly rededicate themselves, their country, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to every endeavor and every sacrifice that may become necessary in defending and the maintaining of human rights.

A few days ago the President of the United States issued this statement concerning the rededication ceremony for tomorrow:

"The approach of Independence Day this year will kindle in all American hearts an appreciation of the dark days that preceded and followed July 4, 1776. Those were the times that tried men's souls, even as are these times, in another crisis in American life.

"But these are also days of hope, and as the birthday of American independence draws near it is altogether fitting that we should rededicate ourselves to defend and perpetuate those inalienable rights which found expression in the immortal Declaration. These words never had a deeper or more solemn meaning for America than they have in this hour of anxiety and peril.

"The Fourth of July has always been a day of joy and exaltation in which all Americans have caught something of the spirit of liberty which the fathers of the Republic proclaimed to the world on that midsummer day in 1776.

"I am glad, therefore, to learn that the Office of Civilian Defense is to lead the Nation this year in the grand rededication to liberty on the Fourth of July. I commend this celebration to Americans everywhere, to the end that, in this solemn commemoration we may find renewed faith in the blessings which are ours because of the struggle and sacrifice, the courage and fortitude and vision of those who made this Nation a reality."

That is the President's statement on the ceremony of rededication for the people of America. And here is the plan.

The ceremony will commence at 2 o'clock. All radio networks will carry it. Tune in then as the President will speak for 5 minutes. Following, the United States Marine Band, in Washington, will play the national anthem, and bands everywhere will join and play with them, and the people all over America and her possessions will sing the Star-Spangled Banner. Then the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States will lead the people of America in repeating the Oath of Allegiance to the United States.

As an American you have a part in this rededication, wherever you are—at home, abroad, at the lakes, in the mountains, at a Fourth of July celebration, on a picnic, at the theater, or wherever you are, see to it that the radio is turned on at 2 o'clock and take an active part in this great and patriotic ceremony.

By thus rededicating themselves and their country to the principles established by their forefathers, the American people will tomorrow serve notice upon the ruthless exponents of force that, in the words of the immortal Lincoln—

"A government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth."

Time and T. V. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

ARTICLE BY ERNEST L. MEYER

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Progressive of Saturday, June 28, 1941, entitled "Time and T. V. A.," written by Mr. Ernest L. Meyer.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Progressive of June 28, 1941]

TIME AND T. V. A.

(By Ernest L. Meyer)

One of the minor miracles of the hour is the shift in sentiment of the "big boys" toward the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Time was, and not so many moons ago, when the "big boys," contemplating Mr. Roosevelt's pet dream, jumped up and down in anguish, screamed "socialism," and offered voluminous and convincing proof that the Tennessee Valley was already supersaturated with electrical energy and that additional kilowatts would merely be sluiced into an economic waste pipe.

But today the "big boys," instead of slapping on a hundred injunctions against the great experiment, cry "Pax vobiscum," and all up and down the valley the same industrialists and newspapers who once branded T. V. A. a mad vision and a waste now clamor for expansion and more and ever more power, power, power.

The secret of the fantastic shift is, of course, defense. Not only has there been a tremendous expansion in the aluminum, powder, and aircraft industries in the area served by T. V. A., but the slogan of defense has been seized upon by the "big boys" as a handy and holy motive to explain their about-face. They have pulled in their claws as patriots, and thus add piety to whatever harvest in dollars they may reap.

T. V. A. IS REAL DEFENSE

Thus Mars has brought belated sanction to the President's pet dream. This is good, and yet it is also too bad. Because years before the present emergency and before the boom in war industries, T. V. A. was already launched on a vital program of defense. Real defense—the salvaging of vast acres of wasted soil and the reclamation of the lives of the stunted people who inhabit the backwoods.

What is too bad is that such a program fails to seize hold upon the imagination. To the "big boys" and to most of the "little boys," alack, defense holds meaning only when it is translated in terms of bullets and bayonets and battleships.

Yet T. V. A. dams and Navy dreadnoughts differ. A modern first-line battleship costs at least $75,000,000 and its useful life is about 20 years. Norris Dam in the T. V. A. chain cost $31,000,000, and its useful life at the very lowest estimate is 100 years.

And during their long lifetime T. V. A. multipurpose dams are productive. They not only create power for many uses, but they also regulate floods and drought and navigation, serve people at peace as well as industries in war, build up the earth of America instead of solely creating products to blast the earth of a potential foe.

IT IS DEMOCRACY, PLUS

What is just as important is the method through which T. V. A. operates. It is democracy, plus. T. V. A. has no power in a political sense. In its far-flung plans to raise the economic status of the region it cannot enforce compliance on the part of the inhabitants. No penalties are provided for noncooperation.

Yet by virtue of its vision and its accomplishments T. V. A. has gained vast and voluntary cooperation of land-grant colleges, of county agents, of farmers' cooperatives, and, what is most important, of the people of the sterile acres whom it seeks to reclaim from pauperism and pellagra.

Some months ago I took a long journey into the highways and byways of the great sprawling area served by T. V. A., an area as great as that of entire Great Britain. And I found a ferment, an articulate excitement of a once hopeless people now on the march toward a definite and attainable goal—security.

I attended meetings of farmer groups where not even the blistering Alabama heat could lessen the demonstration following the reading of a report that the electrical cooperative, through the magic of cheap T. V. A. power, had extended its services to a hundred more isolated farms, and that the cooperative treasury showed a sizable profit at the end of the fiscal year.

The communal high spirits on that occasion were matched by the individual elation of an ancient and lone lady a county agent and I visited in her Tennessee log cabin. T. V. A. meter and lights had just been installed, and the woman was trembling with delight at the sight of her electric lamp. When the county agent, in checking up, reached down to remove the floor plug, the old lady cried: "Don't you go pulling out that stopper. The juice will run out on the floor and be sheer wasted!"

TOWARD SOUND INNER DEFENSE

That journey left me exhilarated. I felt that if T. V. A. had been created, say, in Russia, or in Sweden, voluminous tomes would have been written of the gigantic experiment, and pilgrims and political junkets would hasten there and return with breathless reports. But here in America, until the recent cry of "defense," T. V. A. fought its way, at times almost hopelessly, against public inertia and political hatchetmen.

Especially at this time am I heartened by what I saw and learned. For people sometimes say to me: "You oppose armed involvement in the European war. You say that America must look first to her inner defenses. What, exactly, would you propose?"

The answer is easy. Revive the plan for 11 T. V. A.'s. If possible, have each under the direction of a man as able, energetic, and enlightened as David E. Lilienthal. That would be a step toward sound inner defense. Not the whole way, but what a gigantic stride.

Lesson for America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK VAN NUYS

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

ARTICLE BY PAUL G. HOFFMAN

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix an article by Paul G. Hoffman, president, Studebaker Corporation, entitled "Lesson for America," published in the Pathfinder of July 5, 1941.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Pathfinder of July 5, 1941]

LESSON FOR AMERICA

(By Paul G. Hoffman, president, Studebaker Corporation)

The outlook for China was dark. Shanghai had just fallen. Nanking, the capital, was threatened and, as subsequent events proved, doomed. It was hardly the time to expect a Chinese statesman to be viewing the future calmly and objectively. But my eyes more than my ears told me that the man to whom I had just put a question that was on everyone's lips at the time was completely confident. He was Dr. Hu Shih, who is now the Chinese Ambassador to the United States, and I had inquired if China could successfully defend itself.

"Certainly," he replied. "But it depends entirely upon the heart of the Chinese people. They must unite and develop that nationalistic spirit which knows no defeat." As I said, my eyes rather than my ears told me that Dr. Hu Shih was not disturbed. He knew his people, for while he qualified his answer his countenance was serene as he gave it. He has not been surprised by the events which history has recorded since that conversation took place.

Last July I was reminded of it. Hitler was ready to launch his invasion of Great Britain. Complete victory over the Allies was to be his by September 15, the world was unequivocally told. Recalling Dr. Hu Shih's simple but immortal diagnosis, I could not help but feel that those who envisioned the fall of Great Britain were calculating without a knowledge of the one vital factor.

Hitler's aerial blitzkrieg against England has been carried on relentlessly for almost 1 year. Great cities have been wrecked by mass bombings. Thousands of civilians have been killed. Tens of thousands have been wounded. But England's determination to fight on to ultimate victory has never faltered. Why? Because the spirit of the people has not been broken—it has been strengthened.

For 4 long years Japan has waged a war on China with a brutality unparalleled in modern times. Three million Chinese—1,000,000 of them civilians—have been killed. Uncounted millions have been wounded, and because of lack of medical supplies thousands of major operations have been performed without anesthetic. Fifty million Chinese left their homes in the coastal areas and are refugees in the western provinces. Two million Chinese children have been orphaned. And yet, despite all these disasters. China fights on with dogged courage, confident that it will turn back the Japanese hordes, win the war, and maintain its independence. Why? Because the spirit of the people has not been broken—it has been strengthened.

What is the lesson here for America? It is clear and it is challenging.

As a nation, we are building a huge arsenal for defense of our democracy as well as others resisting totalitarian aggression. We are resolved to safeguard our way of life against those who would destroy it. We are preparing for any eventuality that may arise.

It would likely be fatal for us to be blinded by the synthetic prosperity which this policy will bring. There is nothing sound about an armament-produced prosperity. It is ephemeral and fleeting and serves no economic purpose although the necessity of it admits of no argument.

America's need lies in a resurgence of courage and self-reliance on the part of the individual and a rededication of leadership to the greatest good for the greatest number. The dominant characteristics of the American people always have been those qualities so requisite today, but for too long and for too many they have been allowed to lie dormant. The emergency of the times, as well as the record of the last two decades, calls for more inspired and unselfish leadership in government, business, agriculture, and labor. Too often, organized business, organized labor, organized agriculture, and bureaucratic government have pursued their own selfish objectives without giving thought to the general welfare of all of the people. But if we are going to have enlightened leadership—and have it we must—then the people must earn the kind of leadership which will safeguard their welfare, spiritually and materially, from attack within or without. Self-reliance and enterprise must take the place of bread lines and circuses. Group antagonisms and class jealousies must be throttled.

The character of a nation is but the composite of the individuals who comprise that nation. Our greatest hope for the future rests not upon the airplanes, battleships, tanks, and cannon which we are so fervently building at the moment but upon each and every one of us embracing a new attitude toward our country and its welfare. We can rightfully take vast encouragement from the statement made by William S. Knudsen, Director General of the Office of Production Management, who, when he was asked during a congressional hearing how he came to give up a highly remunerative position in industry to accept the very trying job of directing defense efforts, replied:

"I hope this doesn't sound sentimental. I've been here 41 years and this country has been pretty good to me. I was in a position to work without salary. I felt that if I could do something, I'd like to do it."

Not many of us can afford to work without wages. But every American should be able to extend his vision to include not alone the personal interests immediately ahead but also the lasting welfare of himself and the community. In the final analysis, only that which is good for the whole is good for any part thereof.

If that be our philosophy, then America can become not only the arsenal for democracy but the guardian of democratic ideals.

Farm Cooperatives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

LETTER FROM M. D. LINCOLN, SECRETARY OF THE OHIO FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, some time ago in a study which I was making of cooperative institutions as they appliy to farmers, and also as they apply to consumers, in preparation for an address I expected to deliver in the Senate on the subject, among other things, I had a letter from Mr. M. D. Lincoln, secretary of the Ohio Farm Bureau Federation, in regard to the work of various cooperative farm organizations, particularly the one of which he was secretary, which is one of the largest in the country. I find, for instance, among other things, although not referred to in the letter of Mr. Lincoln, that this cooperative organization of farmers, feeling aggrieved at the price they had to pay for fertilizer, invested $275,000 in the building of a fertilizer plant, and the price of fertilizer immediately went down, so that the farmers for that year saved $750,000 in the price they had to pay for fertilizer; the investment they then made being only $275,000.

I had a very interesting letter at that time from Mr. Lincoln and I ask unanimous consent that the letter may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OHIO FARM BUREAU FEDERATION
Columbus, Ohio, May 2, 1941.

DEAR SENATOR NORRIS: I have made some studies of the T. N. E. C. reports on the concentration of economic power in the insurance field. It seems to me that the Committee has done a splendid piece of work in making an analysis of the facts, but they did not include cooperative insurance as one of the solutions to the problem.

I think it is essential, to round out the picture, to present some of the facts with respect to the present accomplishments and methods of business of the cooperative insurance services, as well as the things which they can accomplish in the future in providing consumers with the most desirable kind of insurance service at reasonable cost.

Insurance companies have come to be one of the most important institutions in our economic life. The legal reserve life insurance companies have assets of 28 billions of dollars. Their annual income is almost as large as the income of the Federal Government.

In these few institutions is concentrated economic power over millions of people, over vast areas of economic life. The 26 largest companies alone hold 12 percent of all Federal Government bonds, 17 percent of railroad bonds, 18 percent of utility bonds, 12 percent of industrial bonds, 19 percent of the farm mortgage debt, and 13 percent of the urban real estate debt.

This is not economic democracy. It gives vast power to a mere handful of people to decide who shall and who shall not receive credit, to determine what businesses shall flourish and what businesses shall not, and to regulate interest rates, policy terms, premium costs in their own and not in the interest of policyholders.

Among the facts brought to light by the T. N. E. C. investigation was the situation that 13 families in America hold control over the Nation's 200 largest corporations, which in turn hold over half of all American business assets.

These 13 families own stock valued at almost $3,000,000,000. On the other hand, half the stockholders of America's 200 largest corporations own only 3 percent of their value. Five percent of the stockholders own 70 percent of the companies' value.

This is not economic democracy. This is economic autocracy. Its ramifications are as fine and as manifold as the famous "spider web" you described to the Senate sometime ago. What benefit is political democracy when we have autocracy in our economic life? Can a man be really free politically if his economic affairs are controlled by a few people far beyond his reach? Can economic dictatorship and political democracy long exist side by side?

The inevitable results of this control are evident in the underinsurance of farmers and wage earners, as well as the excessive costs of insurance and the high rate of lapsation.

The working population—farmers and wage earners—are not so adequately covered by life insurance as some publicity would lead us to believe. Eleven percent of the heads of these families have no insurance whatsoever. Those who are insured have small policies. One of every four wage earners either has no insurance at all, or a policy the value of which is less than $500; two out of five have policies of less than $1,000; and three out of four have policies of less than $2,000.

Fifty million wage earners paid almost $800,000,000 for so-called industrial insurance in a single year, equivalent to 5 percent of their income. These premium payments amounted to three times as much as they would have paid for an equal amount of ordinary life insurance. Thus does concentration of economic power exact its toll.

But the most tragic story of all is the story of the rate of lapsation of industrial insurance policies. Only a trifling number of such policies remain in force until their purpose is served. In the period from 1928 to 1937, 97 percent of industrial policies were lapsed or surrendered. Thus the great bulk of these policies never fulfilled their obligations.

At least the broad outlines of the insurance problem are being recognized. But the cooperative insurance movement which addresses its efforts specifically at the heart of the problem has not received the consideration or the recognition which its merits warrant.

Cooperation in all fields makes economics work for consumers in place of exploiting them. Cooperation changes the methods of business to democracy. Each member of a cooperative has one vote, and only one, in determining the policies of his organization.

Cooperation changes the ownership of business to consumers. Only by securing ownership can consumers control the business institutions that serve them. Cooperation changes the aim of business to service. Being owned by the people they serve, cooperatives are motivated by the desire to serve rather than the desire to make profits. When you do business with yourself there is no incentive to cheat yourself.

Cooperation is no beautiful but impractical theory. While it has brought vast benefits to people in all walks of life all over the world, it is best known for its benefits to farmers in this country.

Cooperatives have demonstrated that they can reduce the price levels of the things people buy, and without monopoly controls. They need to transact only enough business in any field—usually 10 to 15 percent of the total is sufficient—to set up standards of price, quality, and service.

This they have done with amazing effectiveness in a number of economic activities. Cooperatives have reduced the cost of automobile insurance to 46 percent less than the pre-war price; electricity, 50 percent; gasoline, 38 percent; farm credit, 33 percent; fertilizer, 20 percent; and feed, 4 percent. And remember that some of these commodities were 100 percent or more above the pre-war price several years ago. This cooperation has done, with the support and assistance of R. E. A. in electrification and of the F. C. A. in farm credit.

What they have done in these lines, cooperatives can duplicate in life insurance. To provide adequate life insurance protection for low-income groups, for example, the Farm Bureau Life Insurance Co. has just begun the writing of a low-cost policy in units of $500 each which costs only $6.22 a year at age 35 and gives pure insurance protection. This cost is only a fraction of the cost of conventional so-called industrial insurance. Its cost is so low that lapsation and surrenders should be infrequent, even in times of disaster and economic depression. In low-income families the margin between the amount of income received and the amount of money required to purchase the necessities of life is small. Consequently, we regard it of utmost importance that insurance costs be as low as possible.

Finally, the secondary function of insurance is to serve as a reservoir of finance. In conventional companies, investment funds are placed where they can make the greatest contribution to the few who are in control. Often these funds are invested in such a way that they work to the detriment of the very people who contributed them by payment of insurance premiums.

Cooperatives lend their funds, wherever possible, to the people who created them for the purchase of homes or farms, for investment in cooperative business, and for such other purposes as will benefit them which are sanctioned by law, by insurance regulation and sound business practice. The full import of such an investment policy can only be realized by those who have had loans called in time of stress, and who have lost farms and homes which they had labored a lifetime to create.

This is a brief summary of what cooperatives can do to alleviate some of the problems which are created by the concentration of wealth. We in the cooperative insurance movement believe that the people of the United States and their duly elected representatives should have this information. For this reason may we respectfully urge your careful consideration of this point of view.

With every appreciation of your many good works in the interest of the welfare of all the people.

Sincerely yours,

M. D. LINCOLN,
Secretary.

Awake America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERNEST W. McFARLAND
OF ARIZONA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF FRED B. TOWNSEND

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address broadcast from Station KTAR, in Phoenix, on July 3, by Fred Blair Townsend, vice chairman of the Arizona division of the Committee to Defend America. The subject of the address was Awake America.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience. I doubt if the Fourth of July, in all our history, has ever meant as much to Americans as it means this year of 1941. For this year we are very soberly aware of the differences between democratic liberty and totalitarian slavery; and we are definately and quietly determined to do whatever may be necessary to preserve the liberties for which our ancestors fought.

Tomorrow will be the anniversary of our independence, of the day when our forefathers served notice on the world that thenceforth and forever amen, our people would worship as they pleased, would have the right of free speech, would be judged according to law and not by the whims of autocracy, and that no one could tell them what to do or what not to do, as long as they acted within the laws they voluntarily enacted through their duly elected representatives.

All these blessings were secured at the sacrifice of the lives and the fortunes of those who willingly gave all they had so that a worth-while system of existence, a democratic way of life, if you please, could be handed down to posterity as a heritage and could live forever as an example and as an inspiration for all the people of all the world.

Today, more than at any time in all our national life, these institutions of human freedom are in jeopardy. Their very foundations are threatened. We have seen, in the past few months, many peace-living and peace-loving peoples reduced to practical slavery by the Nazi dictator, whose sole object and purpose is power and more power; power to subjugate the world and force its people to serve as slaves to a new order, in which man is nothing and the state is all-powerful.

Today, on the eve of our national birthday, we cannot afford to sit idly by and see the steady approach of the juggernaut that—unless we stop it—will inevitably take from us our blessings of liberty and impose upon our free peoples the shameful existence under which so many European peoples are living today. The time has come to speak plainly, to fully realize the dangers that confront us, and to consider realistically what we can do and what we must do if we want to preserve for our children the heritage our fathers instituted on the Fourth of July 1776. Thank God, we Americans have seen the handwriting on the wall and have sensed our danger. Today our whole country is seething with activities for national defense at home and abroad such as has never been seen before in this or any other country in the world. Americans have definitely determined to keep ablaze the torch of liberty, not only for themselves but as an example and an inspiration for the nations and the peoples now temporarily enslaved.

To meet this menace two things are necessary. Every American must do his or her duty to their fullest capacity; and every American must stand solidly back of our elected and constituted authorities in whatever measures are necessary to the successful defense of our country and its institutions. If it is possible, each of us should become so fully informed as to realize the necessity for each step in our program of defense; but, if this is impossible, we must nevertheless respond with every ounce of energy and loyalty to the program deemed necessary by those whom we have chosen as our leaders.

The time for argument is past. Our country, our hemisphere, our democratic way of life is in the gravest peril in all history. The forces of ruthless domination are on the march. Those forces have announced their intention of destroying democracy and enslaving the world. Each and every one of us, whether in the armed forces of our country or employed in a defense industry or on the farms, or carrying on the routine business and professions that make up the fabric of our national life, must regard ourselves as a part—an integral and necessary part—of the program of defense, and give all we have to the service of our country and to the cause of freedom of mankind.

Let us be realistic. Let us avoid confusion. Let us refuse to be tangled in a discussion of ideologies. Our course is clear. The danger to our institutions is nazi-ism. The man who has declared he will reduce our people to his domination and control is Hitler. Any man and any nation that fights Hitler is, during that time and for that purpose, our friend and deserves and must have our support.

We may not love England, but England has always been our first line of defense. We do not like communism, and we never shall, but Russia is bravely fighting our common enemy. The common problem is to defeat Hitler and to destroy nazi-ism and by doing so to insure to ourselves our continued liberty and to give to all the world and all its peoples the opportunity to secure liberty for themselves.

Our leaders are still hoping we can stay out of war, and so are we all. We all hope it will never become necessary to send an army to foreign shores. But we must realize that the only way to avoid that is to help defeat Hitler on his own ground, and to do that we must extend all aid to those who are fighting him, even if it takes the use of our Navy to sweep his pirates from the seas.

At this very moment our democratic brethren of the British Empire are fighting with their backs to the wall. Their workers are producing as they never produced before, with a solid front opposed to the enemy. In England, where labor is strong, traditionally strong, not a move or a murmur of labor trouble gets in the way of production for protection.

In our country, where our danger is just as grave as the danger to England—but where, thank heaven, we are still not being bombed—in our country, as in England, we have the right to expect that our workers will give the same loyal, trouble-free service to the defense industries, to the manufacture of the equipment and supplies that we must have for our own defense, at home and in the hands of our allies, as do the workers in Great Britain. Labor trouble, based upon any reason whatever, has no place in this time of world-wide danger.

No one can foretell whether, or when, we may find it necessary, in order to bring to an end this terrible slaughter of women and children and aged people, that we become an active part of the defense of liberty and democracy, and help to stop for all time this dictator who has openly declared that nothing will stop him in his quest for world domination and absolute rule under his so-called new order—the old, old order of subjugation and slavery. Again I say, we are fighting for our lives, for our rights as free men, for the rights of our children and our children's children to have the blessings we enjoy; and whether we fight only as "the arsenal of democracy," or actually in the front lines, no personal motives can be permitted to interfere with the efficiency and speed of defense industry production.

Tomorrow will be the Fourth of July, the birthday of the greatest and most powerful nation the world has ever seen; the birthday of the one nation in all history that, through the wisdom of its founders, has given its people the greatest fields of opportunity, the greatest freedom to live, the highest standards of living, in all the world. What better day could we find to rededicate our lives to the great task ahead of us, of preserving democracy for ourselves and for the world? Each day, as the frightful results of the awful struggle come to our attention, we become more and more determined to protect our land from similar destruction, to protect the lives of our people from the ravages of the Nazi hordes—regardless of what we may have to do.

Fields of white crosses in France are mute evidence of the price we paid the last time in our effort to preserve democracy. Modern war is much more terrible in its methods. Soldier and civilian alike suffer its terrors and its ravages, and unless America awakens to her danger she may have to pay an even greater price in blood and sacrifice.

Awake, America, to your peril. Let every red-blooded American man and woman decide now to do everything in his or her power to help put down this growing menace to the happiness of free people throughout the world.

Already millions of our youth are preparing and training for the events that may come. It is certainly our duty to back them up, to give our full and wholehearted support, if we are to hope that we may keep our forms of government and freedom, in this land of plenty, where the days are full of sunshine and the flag is full of stars.

United States of America, tomorrow is your birthday, and the National Security League and the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies invite you to join the 130,000,000 Americans who this day pledge their renewed allegiance and who are resolved to keep the blessings we enjoy, and which have made the United States of America the greatest and finest country in the world.

The United States of America, intact, impregnable, now and forever. We salute you.

Keep Our Boys Out of Europe

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

Mr. RANKIN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, on last Saturday General Wavell of the British Army gave out a statement to the effect that America was going to have to send an army to Europe in the present war. We have rendered all the aid we could to Great Britain short of war, but I think we ought to let the American people and the British people know now that we are going to stand by our promises to the American people and refuse to send our boys to die by the millions in the bloody hellholes of Europe. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

What the St. Lawrence Development Would Mean to the Light and Power Consumers in the Northeastern Section of the United States

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

Mr. RANKIN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEITER], I desire to discuss briefly the proposed power development on the St. Lawrence River, and to show what it will mean to the electric light and power users of New York, New England, and Pennsylvania, and all other States within its distribution radius.

One of the ablest men who has yet testified before the Rivers and Harbors Committee in opposition to this project was Mr. Bertram D. Tallamy, chief engineer of the Niagara Frontier Planning Board. He admitted that this power could be economically generated and transmitted 300 miles from the dam at from 4 to 4½ mills a kilowatt-hour, as the following testimony before the committee will show:

Mr. RANKIN. Then, you could generate this St. Lawrence power and transmit it within that 300-mile radius and lay it down for less than 5 mills (a kilowatt-hour), could you not, say for 4 to 4½ mills?

Mr. TALLAMY. Yes; we can.

Mr. RANKIN. I believe it was stated, I think the New York power authority stated they could lay it down within a 300-mile line for less than 4 mills; would that be about right?

Mr. TALLAMY. Yes; I think you are right.

Now remember that a 300-mile radius would cover almost the entire State of New York, nearly all the New England States and about two-thirds or three-fourths of the State of Pennsylvania. And if we should add the Niagara project, this radius would cover practically all the States of New York and Pennsylvania, nearly all the New England States and a large portion of both Ohio and Michigan. Then electricity could be laid down anywhere in that area wholesale for around 4 to 4½ mills a kilowatt-hour. Now let us see what that would mean. The people in that area are as intelligent and as capable of economically distributing electricity as are the people of Ontario.

Windsor, Ontario, gets power from Niagara Falls through the Ontario Hydro Commission, transmits it 238 miles and distributes it at the Ontario rates. There is no reason why electricity should not be distributed throughout this Niagara-St. Lawrence area at the Ontario rates. Let us see what it would mean to the people of that section of the country if this were done. Suppose we take the State of New York first.

NEW YORK

In 1940 the people of the State of New York, the ultimate consumers, used 15,613,493,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity for which they paid $349,872,269.

Under the Ontario rates, the cost would have been $147,355,209—or $201,517,060 less.

Think of it. The people of the State of New York, the users of electricity in that State, paying an overcharge for their electric lights and power amounting to more than $200,000,000 a year, compared with the rates paid in Ontario, just across the line.

But I know it will be said that the Ontario power system pays no taxes. Let us see what difference that makes. The record shows that all the taxes—including income taxes, both State and Federal—cash contributions and free services paid or rendered in the State of New York for 1 year by both privately and publicly owned electric utilities amounted to $48,140,714. Take that amount from the 1940 overcharges of $201,517,060 and it will leave a net annual overcharge of $153,376,346. That is the amount of the overcharges paid by the power consumers in the State of New York last year after allowing for all taxes, cash contributions, and free services paid or rendered by both privately and publicly owned electric utilities.

That net annual overcharge of $153,000,000 a year would amount to more in 3 years than the entire cost to the United States of this whole development.

But that is not all. Let us see about the other States. Suppose we take Pennsylvania next.

PENNSYLVANIA

During the year 1940, the people of Pennsylvania used 12,187,075,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity for which they paid $215,110,577.

Under the Ontario rates the cost would have been $120,951,629—or $95,158,948 less. In other words, the people of Pennsylvania, the users of electric light and power, paid overcharges amounting to more than $95,000,000 a year, according to the Ontario rates.

The taxes, cash contributions, and free services paid or rendered by both privately and publicly owned electric utilities in Pennsylvania in 1 year amounted to $23,567,267. Take that amount from the overcharges of $95,158,948, and it will leave a net annual overcharge paid by the people of Pennsylvania of $71,582,681—after allowing for all taxes, cash contributions, and free services paid or rendered by both privately and publicly owned electric utilities.

Now let us take the New England States.

CONNECTICUT

In 1940 the people of Connecticut used 1,595,155,000 kilowatt-hours, for which they paid $42,954,245. Under the Ontario rates the cost would have been $19,625,883—or $23,328,362 less.

Taxes, cash contributions, and free services paid or rendered by both privately and publicly owned electric utilities for 1 year in Connecticut amounted to only $5,150,721—leaving a net annual overcharge of $18,177,641.

MAINE

During the year 1940, the people of Maine used 1,031,376 kilowatt-hours, for which they paid $15,429,352. Under the Ontario rates the cost would have been $7,276,050—or $8,153,320 less.

The taxes, cash contributions, and free services paid or rendered by both privately and publicly owned electric utilities for 1 year in the State of Maine amounted to $1,631,208, leaving a net annual overcharge of $6,522,094.

MASSACHUSETTS

In 1940 the people of Massachusetts used 3,394,517,000 kilowatt-hours, for which they paid $97,198,887. Under the Ontario rates the cost would have been $39,993,925—or $57,204,962 less.

All the taxes, cash contributions, and free services paid or rendered by both privately and publicly owned electric utilities in 1 year in Massachusetts amounted to only $16,580,357, which leaves a net annual overcharge paid for their electricity by the people of Massachusetts amounting to $40,624,605.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

In 1940 the people of New Hampshire used 353,537,000 kilowatt-hours, for which they paid $10,386,435. Under the Ontario rates the cost would have been $4,705,464, or $5,680,971 less.

Taxes, cash contributions, and free services paid or rendered in New Hampshire in 1 year amounted to $1,779,659, leaving a net annual overcharge of $3,901,312.

RHODE ISLAND

In 1940 the people of Rhode Island used 662,966,000 kilowatt-hours, for which they paid $17,102,401. Under the Ontario rates the cost would have been $7,552,870, or $9,549,531 less.

The taxes, cash contributions and free services in Rhode Island for 1 year amounted to $1,557,952, leaving a net overcharge of $7,991,579.

VERMONT

In 1940, the people of Vermont used 240,261,000 kilowatt-hours for which they paid $7,046,061. Under the Ontario rates the cost would have been $3,498,809, or $3,547,252 less.

The taxes, cash contributions ,and free services in Vermont for that year amounted to $1,281,784, leaving a net overcharge of $2,265,468.

OHIO

In 1940 the people of Ohio used 7,544,469,000 kilowatt-hours for which they paid $143,981,047. Under the Ontario rates the cost would have been $76,580,973, or $67,400,074 less.

The taxes, cash contributions, and free services in Ohio for that year amounted to $17,331,414, leaving a net overcharge of $50,068,660.

MICHIGAN

In 1940 the people of Michigan used 5,391,354,000 kilowatt-hours for which they paid $108,456,214. Under the Ontario rates the cost would have been $53,298,969, or $55,157,245 less.

The taxes, cash contributions, and free services amounted to $10,647,660, leaving a net overcharge of $44,509,585.

CONCLUSION

Thus it will be seen that after deducting all taxes, cash contributions and free services rendered by privately and publicly owned electric utilities in the States lying within the distribution radius of this St. Lawrence project and Niagara Falls, the people of those States were overcharged last year $401,087,688, according to the Ontario rates.

I do not contend that there would be enough power generated on the St. Lawrence and the Niagara Rivers to supply the entire demand in these 10 States, but there would be a sufficient amount to furnish a yardstick that would force these rates down to their normal levels in that entire area.

Reduced rates always bring increased consumption, and increased consumption brings a greater use of those electric appliances necessary to relieve the drudgery and add to the comforts and conveniences of every home as well as the success of every business establishment.

If properly managed, this project would do for the people of that great northeastern section of our country what the T. V. A. has done for the people in the Tennessee Valley area. It would bring a new day of progress and prosperity for the great masses of the people of that area who pay the electric bills. Besides, it would conserve a great natural resource that is now going to waste.

The Power To Tax Is the Power to Destroy and To Keep Alive

REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, fair and just taxation is the bulwark of democracy. Democratic principles cannot survive in a nation where inequitable tax burdens are imposed upon the people.

A study of history reveals that the democratic way of life has gone forward only when just taxation prevailed. The history of the rise of representative government in the world consists chiefly of the people's struggle for control over the public purse strings—the control of taxation and appropriation. Our constitutional form of government developed largely because transference of the source of governmental authority from the person of the ruler to the people brought about sounder principles of taxation. King John in accepting the Magna Carta at Runnymede in 1215 abandoned his authority for high-handed and unfair taxation, giving the barons more control over the levying and spending of taxes.

At the time the common people were not represented in the council, and the struggle was between the King and his barons. Between the granting of the Magna Carta in 1215 and the adoption of the Bill of Rights in 1689, the English people, from which our American stock has largely descended, and whose traditions guide us in our destiny, pressed steadily for enlargement of their control over taxation and appropriation. The Bill of Rights transferred the taxing power from the Crown to Parliament.

The American Colonies broke away from their mother country largely because of the unfair tax burdens that were imposed upon them through the arbitrary dictates of King George III. The colonists believed that democratic freedom could not exist and flourish under any system of taxation without representation. The American Revolution thus was brought about chiefly from unfair taxation policies.

As representatives of a democratic people, the Congress of the United States, therefore, in this critical time should examine carefully the guiding principles of taxation to be used in framing the levies needed to defray the cost of the national-defense program.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I feel confident that my colleagues will be interested in the illuminating editorial which was published in Liberty magazine, July 5, 1941, entitled "We Cannot Recede One Inch." I am also republishing my brief speech delivered on the floor of the House on May 27, 1941, to which the editorial refers, and also the editorial which was published in Liberty magazine, May 24, 1941, entitled "Truer Words Were Never Spoken," to which I alluded in my speech. These constitute an interesting and instructive symposium of views in regard to this most vital and important subject of taxation, which is going to be before us for consideration during the coming weeks and months.

[From Liberty magazine of May 24, 1941]

TRUER WORDS WERE NEVER SPOKEN

"The power to tax is the power to destroy."

Thus spoke John Marshall, who more than a hundred years ago was Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court. His warning on the peril of unwise taxation was uttered not to the lawmakers of his time alone but to all the future tax gatherers of history. Today his words ring out in solemn warning while the Congress sits in Washington and wrangles over the new tax bill.

A Niagara of words is flowing out of the Capitol, a torrent of flummery and flapdoodle, with here and there a little wave of common sense. Admittedly a grave task confronts the representatives of the people. They have to find cash to pay the bills. New taxes, more burdensome taxes, are inevitable. But, to hear some of these gentlemen, one would think that there is no limit to the patience of the average citizen, no bottom to his pocketbook.

Worse, some of our lawmakers seem determined to destroy the very basis of the American way of life.

Every schoolboy knows that our standard of living is the product of three basic factors—high earnings, mass production, and low taxes. No country in Europe has ever known the blessings that are ours because of that threefold economic foundation. That is why the American standard of living surpasses the rest of the world.

Everybody also knows that low taxes played an immense part in this great development of our country. Before the last war, even when we piled State and local taxes on Federal taxes, the average for the entire country amounted to only about 7 percent per person. All argument to the contrary, this country, at least at this writing, is not at war, yet last year the average tax was well over 20 percent.

And today we hear our Washington lawmakers threatening to crack down on us with new taxes that may well frighten any citizen into expecting that before long we shall reach the British tax average. That will mean that 50 cents out of every dollar earned in this country will go to the Government.

But in all the hullabaloo does one hear any clarion cry for economy in fields other than defense? One hears a few courageous voices, but they are drowned out by the brattle and brangle of their fellows.

We do not have to wait until we reach the British tax average for a decline in the American standard of living. It is already declining. Prices are increasing rapidly, and so are taxes. After all, a dollar is only 100 cents, and if 30 cents go to taxes, only 70 cents are left for all the necessities and desires of life.

As prices go up, the purchasing value of that 70 cents must go down.

So the consumer—and that means you and me and everybody else—is forced to economize. The couple that went to the movies twice a week will see a picture only once a week. That means catastrophe for the motion-picture business, decreased earnings, decreased employment, and—mark this well—decreased taxes paid by that industry. It is a vicious circle.

The end of it all—distant and, let us hope, not inevitable—is the standard of living lowered to a mere subsistence level. For a thousand years after the fall of the Roman Empire, Europe lived at such a level. We called that thousand years the Dark Ages.

Have our lawmakers in Washington been too busy with their fantastic proposals to read history?

And, while we are asking questions, here is another. President Roosevelt is reported to have said that he believes in high taxes, not only because our defense program requires the money, but also to impress the Nation with the seriousness of the European situation so far as it affects the United States.

This is a cryptic utterance. The latest Gallup poll reports that 79 percent of the people of the United States are resolutely against American armies entering the war. Is it this 79 percent to which the President wishes to give such drastic instruction? If so, what is the lesson? What, specifically, does he fear that we do not understand?

A democracy calls for plain speaking. Before the gentlemen in the Congress carry out some of their fabulous tax schemes, before we endanger the very foundations of American existence, why not speak frankly, Mr. President, and tell us why we should tax ourselves to destruction?

[Speech of Hon. MARTIN F. SMITH, May 27, 1941]

"POWER TO TAX IS POWER TO KEEP ALIVE"—CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, it is amazing how a disjointed quotation and half truth can gain currency. How often do we hear it repeated that Chief Justice Marshall said that "the power to tax is the power to destroy"? Writers and speakers have vied with each other in repeating this statement until it has become a classic; and now that we are considering tax-revenue legislation, it is being worn threadbare. One of the latest uses of this half quotation is in the editorial columns of the usually accurate Liberty magazine, under the brilliant editorship of Mr. Fulton Oursler, in its issue of May 24, 1941.

What did Chief Justice Marshall really say? Let me quote, in the interests of truth and historical accuracy, his exact words. In the celebrated case of McCulloch against Maryland, decided in 1819, Chief Justice Marshall said:

"That the power to tax involves the power to destroy; that the power to destroy may defeat and nullify the power to create"—

But he also said, which is a part of the immediate context, but is strangely omitted from the quotation, and yet is the most significant part of his statement, to wit:

"The power to tax is the one great power on which the whole national fabric is based. It is not only the power to destroy but also the power to keep alive."

Mr. Speaker, I can conceive of no more appropriate time to make this correction and point out what Chief Justice Marshall really did say than at this present time. We are now considering a new tax-revenue measure to finance our national-defense program. We are levying taxes to defray the cost of protecting, maintaining, and preserving our Government and institutions against all enemies, foreign and domestic. Certainly there could be no more proper exercise of the taxing power vested in the Congress under the Constitution than this very power. This power Chief Justice Marshall declared to be "the power to keep alive," and clearly proves how true were his words, that—

"The power to tax is the one great power on which the whole national fabric is based, It is not only the power to destroy but also the power to keep alive."

[From Liberty magazine of July 5, 1941]

WE CANNOT RECEDE 1 INCH

On the floor of the House of Representatives the other day the Honorable MARTIN F. SMITH, from the third district of the State of Washington, arose and addressed the Chair:

"Mr. Speaker, it is amazing how a disjointed quotation and half-truth can gain currency. How often do we hear it repeated that Chief Justice Marshall said 'That the power to tax is the power to destroy * * *.' One of the latest uses of this half quotation is in the editorial columns in the usually accurate Liberty magazine under the brilliant editorship of Mr. Fulton Oursler, in its issue of May 24, 1941.

"What did Chief Justice Marshall really say? Let me quote in the interests of truth and historical accuracy his exact words. In the celebrated case of McCulloch v. Maryland, decided in 1819, Chief Justice Marshall said:

"'That the power to tax involves the power to destroy; that the power to destroy may defeat and nullify the power to create—'

"But he also said, which is a part of the immediate context but is strangely omitted from the quotation and yet is the most significant part of his statement, to wit: 'The power to tax is the one great power on which the whole national fabric is based. It is not only the power to destroy but also the power to keep alive.'

"Mr. Speaker, I can conceive of no more appropriate time to make this correction and point out what Chief Justice Marshall really did say than at this present time. We are now considering a new tax-revenue measure to finance our national-defense program. We are levying taxes to defray the cost of protecting, maintaining, and preserving our Government and institutions against the enemies, foreign and domestic. Certainly, there can be no more proper exercise of the taxing power reserved in the Congress under the Constitution than this very power. This fact Chief Justice Marshall declared to be 'the power to keep alive' and clearly proved how true were his words that "the power to tax is the one great power on which the whole fabric is based. It is not only the power to destroy but also the power to keep alive.'"

Liberty is glad that Representative SMITH has seen fit to debate the point made by this editorial exactly where it should be debated—before the tax-levying power which is the Congress. We are sorry he did not read the whole article to the Congress.

On one point we are in absolute agreement with Mr. SMITH—if we wish to have a government, we must pay for it. No one has ever used the words of Chief Justice Marshall to suggest either that we should not pay for government or that we should have no government.

But Liberty cannot recede 1 inch from that editorial. We maintain that Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, took a long and deliberate step beyond the meaning Mr. SMITH has cited. Everybody knows that the need of taxation is primary, obvious, and fundamental; but the Chief Justice, in his great wisdom, foresaw the temptations that come to taxgatherers, and to point out the danger he used one of the strongest words in the English language—the word "destroy."

The dictionary defines the word "destroy" in these words: "To bring to ruin." Chief Justice Marshall did not use that word idly. He chose it precisely to warn America that while only by taxation can our Government be kept alive, the power to tax should never be used to ruin the people. Yet that is exactly what the Congress is in danger of doing right now. Liberty quoted his words aptly and realistically.

We all know that we must be taxed, and taxed heavily, for defense. At what point, then, do taxes become destructive? They become destructive when the taxgathering powers, as in the case of the very Congress of which Mr. SMITH is an able and patriotic Member, refuse to economize in other fields, refuse to throw out the pork barrel.

The American people want to be taxed to keep our country alive. They will not be taxed into destruction. They agree perfectly with all the words of Chief Justice Marshall as quoted in full by Mr. SMITH.

Relations Between United States and Canada a Worthy Example to World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WINDER R. HARRIS

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN S. GIBSON, OF GEORGIA

Mr. HARRIS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by the Honorable JOHN S. GIBSON, Representative in Congress from the Eighth District of Georgia, delivered at the opening of the campaign for the sale of victory bonds in Canada. This address was delivered over the Canadian radio network from the William Pitt Hotel in Chatham, Canada, on the occasion of the last meeting of the year of the Chatham Canadian Club.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of this great convention and to the people of the great Commonwealth of the Dominion of Canada, I greet you as neighbors and friends and bring to you from the great populace of the United States—my people—a message of love, confidence, and good will, and of deep sympathy for the heroic people of Great Britain.

In addressing your citizenry I am not unmindful of their love of liberty and freedom and devotion to democracy and of the high ideals of personal, as well as national life, that it has maintained through the ages.

I have always held your country and people high in regard and have for many years anticipated a visit to you. Such visit, of course, was expected when the world was in peace and your people reposed in contentment and love. I come, however, when the peace-loving Christian people of the world are seeing their darkest hour of their national lives, and are fighting and preparing to fight that their God-given freedom may be preserved, not only for themselves, but for the countless numbers yet to be born. However, if I can say one word that will cause the fires of patriotism and love of liberty to burn brighter in your hearts, a word that will bring encouragement to your souls, then my time will have been well spent.

I should like at this point to say a few words on the relations between the United States and Canada. Never have the relations between the two countries been better. From the Atlantic to the Pacific the unfended border stands as a worthy example to the world of the way two peoples can live generation after generation in peaceful relations. When I cross this border I am reminded anew of this significant fact and of the deep-seated friendship and cooperative spirit which are the fundamental characteristics of the relations between our two peoples. We have truly adhered to the Biblical injunction, "Love thy neighbor as thyself." We have cherished and sponsored the same ideals, we have worshipped the same God and bowed to flags that symbolized the same high ideals of sane government that guaranteed to her people the right to breathe free air, to live free lives, and enjoy the liberties that God intended his people should have. Why should there not exist between our citizenry a spirit of brotherly love that will insure through the ages a perfect understanding and peace between the two peoples.

It is hardly necessary to mention that the interests of our two countries are closely related. An outside danger to one would almost certainly be a danger to the other. In this connection I recall President Roosevelt's Kingston statement of August 18, 1938, in which he gave assurance that the people of the United States would not stand idly by if domination of Canadian soil should be threatened by any other empire.

Since the outbreak of the European war the relations between Canada and the United States have become closer than ever. Cooperation has extended into many fields. I refer especially to cooperation in the matter of defense. It was just 2 years to the day after the Kingston statement that President Roosevelt and the Prime Minister of Canada discussed the mutual problems of defense in relation to the safety of Canada and the United States and agreed to set up a permanent Joint Board on Defense to commence studies related to sea, land, and air problems. For more than a year and a half the Joint Board has been dealing effectively with the problems for which it was created.

A little more than a month ago—on April 20, 1941—the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada again dealt with problems of mutual interest to the two countries. At Hyde Park they discussed measures by which the most prompt and effective utilization might be made of the productive facilities of North America for the purposes of local and hemisphere defense and of the assistance which both Canada and the United States were rendering to Great Britain and the other democracies. They agreed as a general principle that in mobilizing the resources of this continent, each country should provide the other with the defense articles which it is best able to produce, and, above all, produce quickly, and that production programs should be coordinated to this end.

During the crisis through which the world is passing there are from time to time events which react unfavorably on the interests of the free peoples and which tend to bring about discouragement in the democracies. The fact must be faced that now and then the tide of the battle will turn against the free peoples. During these discouraging periods it should be kept in mind that the spirit of freedom cannot be blasted out by the heaviest artillery; that it cannot be demolished by the most destructive bombs; that it does not despair in the face of hardships, privation, and suffering; that in the end it will emerge triumphant.

I have no respect for a person who will accept the privileges of a democracy and then in the hour of trial and bitter conquest, when her very existence is threatened, forget the courage of the patriots of old and let their cowardice become master of their existence and become passive, and thereby, whether willfuly or not, lend momentum to the enemy and assist it in crushing the rights of free-born people.

In the present world conflict there are definite signs that when God decrees that civilized peoples of the world may breathe the air of peace again, there will be a new world order. In this important hour in our national lives, when destruction stands on the very threshold of democracy, were I to fail to lend every aid to your people, the people of Great Britain, and to all the democracies that have displayed courage enough to rise in opposition to the monster of totalitarian governments, I would feel cowardice creeping on my soul and that I was not worthy of the blessings of a free land.

If liberty-loving people of democratic faith are to mold this new order and reassure the God-fearing peoples of the world their right to live in peace with the courage of the statesmen of old, then the democracies of the world must prevail against totalitarian advocates in the present European conflict. God forbid that we should ever permit our posterity to become subjected to the terror of an age in which the damnable and maddened theories of government of the Nazi reign. I have said before, and let me repeat, that I had rather see my wife and babies buried and follow by their sides than to know that they had to live under the dictatorial powers of Hitler or others of his ideals of government.

Our burden and responsibility is too great to be treated lightly or to permit of delay or indecision, and demands absolute national unity. This is the individual as well as collective responsibility of every peace-loving person in the world. It is great to boast of the powers of the democracies to conquer, but please let me remind you that the democracies you see conquering any of her aggressors in your dreams of optimism is a united people, one and inseparable in thought, purpose, and action. The lives of our democracies are now calling for unity. The maxims of heroism found throughout the history of our great commonwealths, I remind you, were not wrought in a divided house. The Nazi onslaught against free and representative government was well planned in advance and is a dangerous one. Even the crazed and maddened by their desire to enslave the world, we must not discount either the military genius or purpose of those at the head of the Nazi regime.

Aside from our love for the cause for which Great Britain is fighting and our respect for her iron hearts and heroic courage, we must face facts as they exist. With a conquered Europe and strengthened resources, it is credulous to assume that Germany, with her allies, would not seek new fields to conquer in the Western Hemisphere. There is but one answer to the present international status, it is a death struggle between totalitarian and representative forms of government—one must prevail, the other must perish—there is no middle ground. Shall democracy, with all its heritage and glory, fade from the world, to leave as a marker of its lamented tomb, bought at the price of blood and tears, an enslaved people? My answer is "No."

How simple it is to say that if Hitler conquers Britain he will not secure by such means as are necessary the possessions of its empire, with all their resources, to conquer what the English mothers and babes suffered to protect.

We, as a strong and courageous people, cannot permit ourselves to be soothed into that dreamless sleep that would cause us to trust Hitler or any of his emissaries by the wild statements of the appeasers or those of pro-German faith who have set themselves up among us. We are so often told that we could not be invaded—accept this as true if you may. Let me remind you that England has not been invaded, but its land has been drenched with the blood and tears of helpless women, and its air terrorized with screams of horror-stricken babes—her national soul shocked from bottom to top.

Why and on what premise should we assume that we would be spared the fate of other peace-loving democratic people at the hands of a victorious Hitler in all of his mad lust for innocent blood? Power means more to him than God and all His love. Trust him if you must, and see the soul of man crushed and the liberties of man perish before his ever-increasing fire of hatred and destruction. If it takes my blood and my life to defeat his purposes and program of human slavery, let it go. If it takes aid to Britain, let it go.

My heart goes out to Britain—she is fighting the common cause of all the God-fearing, peace-loving people of all the world for that standard of peace, security, and liberty that was bought by the blood of our heroes through the ages. May God give her gallant people continued courage, hope, power, and might to hold the banners of her democracy above the mud and mire and dust of a lost cause and enslaved people. When you think of death at its worst, it cannot compare with life in an age in which all the heritage of liberty and freedom lie buried beneath a Nazi flag. I am young in my service in the United States Congress, but old in my faith in democracy and in the belief that nothing has ever been gained by bowing a head or a heart to a tyrant. I love peace and hate war, but hold national and personal honor above blood, and before I would appease a monster whose only purpose was to banish love from the earth I would give my blood with a smile. No tyrant has ever yielded to appeasement, nor will Hitler; he hears only the voice of force and will yield only to its demand.

Let me remind you, however, conquests are not won by words, but by deeds. Every victory has its price. The price of the greatest victory—that of life—is death. Which should teach us the greater the victory the greater the price. We are going to be the victors in this great struggle. We must be, but the price is going to be great. It is going to demand self-denial, hardships, sacrifices, bloodshed, and toil. Time is of the essence, and is bound to be the determining factor. If we love our homes and our firesides, and to see happy children answering the call of the church bells on beautiful Sabbath morns, and the family circle sweetened by the chatter of free-born babes, we cannot wait but must put all our force to work at once. Our first and instant contribution must be our financial aid. Canada must have bombers, planes, airports, ships, destroyers, antiaircraft guns, munitions, and men. Your love for your sons will not permit you to suffer them to go before the enemy without full preparation for an ample and effective defense of themselves as well as your country. It will take billions to furnish the necessary articles of offense and defense. Your Government is no stronger than you make it. You, collectively, are your Government. You must tonight realize that you are a link in the great chain, if you permit yourself to be weak and not do your full part, then you have weakened the whole chain and it will not be able to bear its burden. Your defense will collapse, your country fall, your children and the children of your neighbors will become slaves of a tyrant—better that they had never seen the light of day.

In the language of the Holy Writ, "For what shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his own soul?" The soul of your country and your liberty is at stake. What will you gain if you withhold your worldly goods, deny your Government your full aid, and let its soul perish in the flames of despotism. Again in the language of the Bible, "Whosoever, therefore, shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterdus and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of Man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels." When the blessed victory for the civilized peoples of the world shall come, please don't let your denial of your Government now in this perilous hour bring these words home to you and force you to bow your head in shame. I call upon every person in the Dominion of Canada to rush to the aid of your country and put at its use your full financial support.

Canada must borrow the great sum of money necessary to prepare the tools of war with which her sons must be armed to meet the foe; she must get this money from you—her people, there is no other source from whence it can come. She is offering a series of victory loan bonds which may be bought in denominations of $50, $100, $500, $1,000, and even larger denominations. Therefore, it is so arranged that citizens of small means may have a part in this great cause. I shall not attempt to discuss in detail the merits of these bonds further than to say that you must buy them liberally that your country may be saved and that they are backed by every resource of Canada. If conditions should arise whereby your bonds were not good then under the same conditions your money would be of no value. These bonds can be bought for cash or may be purchased on the installment plan. It is the sacred duty of every citizen to buy every bond that his means, present or prospective, will permit. When you go to make your purchase, before you decide the amount you will buy, pause and think what a privilege it is to live in a country where you are asked to lend your money to your government in a time of need; instead of in a country where your property is confiscated for government use without your consent and even over your protest; in a government where individual rights do not exist, but where you are just a unit in a mass of enslaved people.

I ask you to make full inquiry with regard to these bonds tomorrow, and make your purchase then. The loss of one day may determine the ultimate outcome of this great struggle. People of wealth should buy heavily, and those of meager means should be encouraged to go their full means by the biblical story of the widow's mite. It will be recalled that when the poor widow threw in two mites, which make one farthing, Jesus said, "Verily, I say unto you, that this poor widow has cast more in than all they which have cast into the treasury. For all they did cast in of their abundance, but she of her want did cast in that she had, even all her living." To you of smaller means who follow this beautiful lesson should go a hero's badge. I say with full knowledge of my words, "Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days."

Remember you are not asked to give, but only to lend to your fighting son, and your neighbor's fighting son, who needs your help to defend himself. When you buy a $100 bond you have made it possible to outfit one soldier to march into battle to fight for you.

In the words of your own beloved Churchill, "next to cowardice and treachery, over-confidence leading to neglect or slothfulness is the worst of martial crimes * * * we shall not lag or falter, we shall not weaken or tire, neither the sudden shock of battle nor the long drawn trials of vigilance and exertion will wear us down. Give us the tools and we will finish the job." I ask you as loyal sons and daughters of a great commonwealth, yet, as patriots, to answer tomorrow the call of the great statesman, Winston Churchill, and pour your money in freely that your heroic brothers across the water may be prepared to meet the dreadful foe on equal terms. Do not deny them while they are fighting for us. He will keep the faith and bring back values fourfold for every dollar you lend your government.

We in the States are spending billions and billions for the defense of Britain, for your defense and for our defense. We expect to spend many more billions. Our people are rallying to the cause with gratifying generosity and freely placing their finances at their Government's command and I know that the people of the great Dominion are doing and will continue to do their part.

The responsibility is common to all our people, and likewise the glory of the great victory that is sure to come will be a common reward for our great efforts, which will rest in the memory of our peoples through the ages and make us all glad that we contributed our bit to the great cause of humanity.

I am happy that there exists the unity among the peoples of the Western Hemisphere that we now see. I could well say at this time that I speak to you as a Member of the Congress of the United States of America and do not speak as a representative of our great President or our State Department. I do feel, however, that I speak the sentiments of the great majority of our people.

When President Roosevelt delivered his radio address of May 27 to the United States and to the world there were present at the White House for the occasion the diplomatic representatives at Washington of the American republics and of Canada. To me this is significant in indicating the solidarity of the nations of the Western Hemisphere during this period of tremendous danger to the free peoples of the world.

The struggle going on in the world today is a struggle between two ways of life. The democracies stand for freedom of religion, freedom of speech and expression, economic freedom, individual liberty, and a peaceful and orderly world. On the other hand, the Nazis are endeavoring to destroy religion and everything that is dear to the heart of a free man. They have destroyed freedom of speech and expression. They have replaced economic freedom with regimentation. They have destroyed individual liberty. Instead of desire for peace there is lust for conquest.

The Nazis, by word and deed, have made it clear that they are embarked on a war for world domination. They would impose their way of life on the free peoples of the world. As a part of their program they are endeavoring to gain control of the seas. If they should gain control of the seas, the Nazis would be a great menace to the nations of this hemisphere.

From the outbreak of war in September 1939 the United States has been aware of this menace to the Western Hemisphere. We have taken and are taking many steps to meet every possible contingency. We are carrying out the largest armament-production program ever undertaken in the United States. We have enlarged our Navy. We have made substantial progress in building up our Army. We are increasing and perfecting our air force. We are making gigantic strides in stepping up the production of war materials of all kinds.

As part of our own program of national defense we early instituted a policy of assistance to Great Britain and other nations which are endeavoring to stop the world-wide movement of conquest. Two months after the war began we repealed the arms-embargo provision of the Neutrality Act in order that arms, ammunition, and implements of war might be sent from the United States to those nations. In June of last year, when Great Britain faced alone the Nazi menace, we furnished military supplies to meet her desperate need. In September we sent 50 destroyers to Great Britain in return for the lease of 8 naval and air bases in the Western Hemisphere. Early in this year the Congress of the United States passed the lend-lease bill. Under this act large supplies of military equipment have been sent to Great Britain. Day by day we are increasing the amount of these supplies for use of the British in their heroic battle. We are determined that Great Britain shall have supplies and assistance for carrying on her struggle.

In his address on May 27 President Roosevelt stated the national policy of the United States in the following words:

"First, we shall actively resist wherever necessary, and with all our resources, every attempt by Hitler to extend his Nazi domination in the Western Hemisphere, or to threaten it. We shall actively resist his every attempt to gain control of the seas. We insist upon the vital importance of keeping Hitlerism away from any point in the world which could be used and would be used as a base of attack against the Americas."

"Second, from the point of view of strict naval and military necessity, we shall give every possible assistance to Britain and to all who, with Britain, are resisting Hitlerism or its equivalent with force of arms. Our patrols are helping now to insure delivery of the needed supplies to Britain. All additional measures necessary to deliver the goods will be taken.

"The delivery of needed supplies to Britain is imperative. This can be done; it must be done; it will be done."

At this point I should like to quote a statement made in an address delivered a few days ago by our Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull. He said:

"For us, the task of safeguarding our security requires the full, continuous, patriotically inspired effort of each and every one of us. The energies of those who control the operation of our factories and their machines, together with the labor of those who make and operate the machines, must be devoted to the attainment of maximum production. Each and all must work with a sense that what they do, or do not do, is important in determining whether this country shall be secure. Every part of our vast production machine that can serve to produce military supplies must be put to that purpose. The desire to continue ordinary ways of business must yield to the needs of the crisis. Individuals and groups have no right at this time to think or act primarily in terms of their personal interest to the detriment of the general national good.

"Although the task is huge, the time is pressing, and though the struggle may continue for a long time, I am confident that in the end there will come a better day. We are at work not only at the task of insuring our own safety but also at the task of creating ultimate conditions of peace with justice. We can help to lay a firm foundation for the independence, the security, and the returning prosperity of the members of the family of nations. I have absolute faith in the ultimate triumph of the principles of humanity, translated into law and order, by which freedom and justice and security will again prevail." I am justly proud of our leadership in the States. The fact that my position has permitted me to lend my cooperation to its policies in these crucial days will stand out in my life as my greatest privilege.

My people are proud of you as a neighbor and as an ally, and are proud to accept you as brothers in this common cause for suffering humanity. Let's be men, let's be strong men with never dying courage and determination to win—the cause is too great to lose, the victory too sweet to forfeit.

Among my last words let it be said again—let not your country call in vain, let your faith stand up and lend to it the full force of your resources. Buy your bonds now—let not your country stagger in the weakness of your failure. Let your generosity be a beacon light to others. Let tomorrow's sun set on you a proven patriot—one who has done his part to stop the flow of innocent blood.

Your people have been nice to me during my stay in the Dominion. Regardless to the shadows of a troubled world that was responsible for my visit I have enjoyed knowing your people. After seeing you and knowing you better my faith in democracy is strengthened and my confidence in a full and complete victory is reassured. Maintain your courage and you will see the sun of peace and love shine over your fair land again.

The deity of the Supreme Being is seen in his works and with you good people I pray to the everlasting God to guide our Nations through this hour of terror to a full and just victory.

When I behold on this earth for the last time, the beauties of love and nature, and when the sun sets in crimson hue the last time for me, let me behold a world in peace; a democracy intact, where love is king and hate is banished from the garden of life. Let me see the flags of our two Commonwealths hoisted high and floating proudly in peaceful air proclaiming the victory that is sure to come, and standing as tokens of the unbroken love and peace between our two countries.

With the words of Kipling, I bid you Godspeed:

"No easy hope or lies,
Shall bring us to our goal,
But iron sacrifices
Of body, will, and soul.
There is but one task for all—
One life for each to give.
What stands if freedom falls?
Who dies if England live?"

I say goodbye to the good people of the great Commonwealth of the Dominion of Canada.

The Church and Collective Bargaining

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES A. SHANLEY OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

SERMON BY J. GEORGE BUTLER

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including a serman by one of the foremost students of labor problems in our district:

THE CHURCH AND COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

(Summerfield Methodist Church, New Haven, Conn., June 15, 1941. Scripture lesson: Luke 15)

(By J. George Butler)

This morning I am going to preach on a subject about which there is a vast difference of opinion. Because we are Christians, I am preaching on it. Christians are tolerant, and try to understand the others' point of view. Christians believe in free speech, free press, and a free pulpit, to deal with issues definitely controversial. One of the reasons Adolf Hitler is so despised is his failure to allow free speech in Germany. Surely we do not wish to copy his methods in our churches. Bishop McConnell, speaking at our forum last winter, said: "The function of the church is to take a stand on issues as they arise, and be a moulder of public opinion." The church, as an impartial seeker after truth, has something to say about an issue which affects the lives of us all in this community. So I have decided that this morning I shall preach on the Church and Collective Bargaining. Don't prejudge the issue before I speak. Come to it with an open mind. Hear me, and then judge.

Thirty years ago the Federal Council of Churches of Christ, representing the great Protestant communions in America, adopted the Social Creed of the Churches, in which the rights of both employer and employee to organize were recognized. Employers have long enjoyed the benefits of organization. Today there are 7,000 employers' associations, and over 1,000 international employers' associations. But the question of employees' organization has long been looked on with suspicion and distrust. America's industrial history contains a long record of brutal and bloody clashes. Blame has been on both sides of such struggles, though the La Follette civil liberties investigation did bring out the facts that employers have all too frequently resorted to labor spies, thugs, arsenals of gas, machine guns, and rifles to use on workers as they attempted to organize.

A new day is dawning in the history of industrial relations, a day when violence and discord are being supplanted by harmony and peace. Unions and management are learning to work together on a basis of mutual understanding and trust, rather than bitterness, suspicion, and hate. The average man does not know about these cases, because they are not news for the newspaper. The only labor relations that make the daily press are those where strikes and conflict occur. This morning, however, I earnestly desire your attention to point to you, not that labor and management have identical interests, but that their relations with each other can be carried out harmoniously and to the mutual advantage of each.

But some of you well ask, Why are you, a Christian minister, mixed up in affairs that are none of your business? Scrooge in Dickens' Christmas Carol said: "Mankind is my business." I know of a better way than the way of strife and hate—and I know that unions, however maligned by the press and public opinion, are part of our democratic process. If the church is to be a molder of public opinion, as Bishop McConnell said it should, I must not remain silent.

For the past few months I have known that the A. F. of L. machinists have been seeking to organize the Winchester plant, and in the last weeks, have seen C. I. O. sound trucks at the shop gates. Accordingly, I called on the works manager, Mr. Thomas I. S. Boak, and told him the position of the church on collective bargaining. The church is interested in it, because it believes in democracy—in the individual as of infinite worth before God, and that those who manage derive their powers from the consent of the managed. Politically, we believe in democracy—at least we are all but in another world war to preserve it. Because we believed it in 1776, we fought for our independence. We were not despotically ruled in the colonial period. Go back and read your history. When the Colonies objected to the tax program of the British Crown, the Townshend regime levied but light taxes on the Colonies, and dedicated their proceeds to the support of colonial government, just to maintain the principle of the right of Britain to tax her colonies. Yet, what did happen? Patrick Henry and the rest shouted: "Taxation without representation is tyranny!"

Lincoln believed in government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." That belief comes straight out of the scripture lesson this morning. Jesus told three stories in this great fifteenth chapter of Luke: The lost sheep—so valuable that the shepherd left the 90 and 9 safe in the sheepfold and braved the elements in search of the lost one—the lost coin—the lost son. "Ye are of more value than many sheep." Jesus is saying that individuals are infinitely worthful in the sight of God. God will go to infinite pains to save the individual. Translated into political language, you have Lincoln's Gettysburg speech—the greatest classic of our tongue. Individuals must have a voice in government. And now, in our day, we are seeing the concept supplied to industry.

The days of the arbitrary, autocratic management of men are slowly, surely passing away. The army is generally regarded as the stronghold of autocracy. Yet, in the early days of the World War, the Quartermaster General of the United States, Gen. Robert E. Wood, when supply was breaking down throughout the Nation, summoned individual quartermaster generals to Washington, and in substance said to them: "Just forget that you have any authority, and start thinking about your responsibility, and we will get ahead with our task." Industry, which so often operates under the illusion of final authority, would do well to heed General Wood's advice.

When the United States Constitution was adopted, there was economic democracy in America. Ninety percent of the free inhabitants of America owned the properties upon which they worked. A hundred years ago the proportion was 80 percent. Even after the Civil War, when machines were being used extensively, the typical shoemaking shop, flour mill, slaughter or packing house was a local enterprise, owned and managed by an individual or group of individuals residing in the community. The Winchester plant was just such a shop—it was founded in 1866 and carried on as a private enterprise until 1898 when it first became a corporation. Now it is a mere subsidiary of another corporation. Today corporations well nigh control our lives. All our railroads are run by them, nine-tenths of our mines and quarries, four-fifths of all our manufacturing is done by them, and in place of ownership of one's tools, the average worker has become a mere hired hand with no voice in the control of the machine which he and his fathers created. A few of you may own stock in various corporations. Then, you either send your proxies in, or you don't; your holdings are so minute in proportion to the total stock you have absolutely no say in the enterprise in which you have invested your savings.

In the modern industrial scene, workers seize on the labor union as the only way they may organize to have some say in the machines that rule over them. In 1921, Chief Justice William Howard Taft said in the American Steel Foundries case:

"Union was essential to give laborers an opportunity to deal on equality with their employer."

A writer in the official organ of the United States Chamber of Commerce says:

"It is not likely that labor organization will weaken in the years to come. Rather it will grow stronger. * * * Under those conditions, is it not wise to work with that agency so that it may function as constructively as possible?"—Nation's Business, Industrial Peace Overseas, 67 Apr. '39.

Labor organization is not crammed down the throat of men, but a direct expression of their belief in economic democracy; that they should be represented by delegates of their own choosing to bargain collectively with management, which today, is always a collective agency. The law of the land does not recognize company unions as such agencies.

Some people say if a worker is dissatisfied, let him go elsewhere. That, he could do in the nineteenth century, when there was a need for labor in excess of the supply, when men were always pushing westward to the frontier—but the frontier is gone, and now, even with the war, we have millions of unemployed. The facts are that workers cannot go elsewhere—there is no elsewhere.

Many industrialists honestly believe that strikes are more prevalent with unions than without. On the contrary, the facts are the reverse. When unions become strong, there are no strikes. It is the weak union, seeking recognition, that all too frequently resorts to violence. The President's commission on industrial relations in Great Britain and Sweden reported, in 1938, the tendency to strike diminishes as the labor unions increase in numbers and strength, both because increasing bargaining power reduces the necessity for strikes, and because responsible leadership tends to check impulsive action. Sometimes, of course, strikes are the only recourse workmen have. While we deplore such strikes as the North American Aircraft Co. in California, the facts are that North American was violating the Wagner Act, and the men struck for redress. The financial page reveals some of the causes for discontent. Production workers were being paid 50 cents an hour, when in both 1939 and 1940 the company made 200 percent profit on its original investment. Senator AIKEN, of Vermont, stated that 89 percent of defense-industry strikes have occurred in firms cited for violation of the Wagner Act.

There are four steps in industrial organization, the first one where there is open hostility between labor and management; then the signing of a collective agreement; third, bargaining about wages, hours, and conditions of work; and, finally, labor-management cooperation. If there were time in the limits of a sermon, I should like to go into detail on the fruits of labor-management cooperation. Since I cannot, I can but indicate a few examples. Again, you say, you've never heard of a good union—I don't wonder in the least, because you don't hear of them—unions have worked for 30 years in peace and harmony, to the mutual advantage of both sides, and one never hears about them, unless you know where to read, because peace and harmony are not news. Even Jesus was not news in his day.

How many of you have Pequot sheets on your beds at home? These sheets are made by the Naumkeag Steam Cotton Co. The United Textile Workers Union, through its research committee, made suggestions which saved that company $230,000 a year, after granting substantial pay increases, and paying for all the research. The full story is in Collective Bargaining for Today and Tomorrow, by Henry C. Metcalf. Get it and read for yourself.

Has anybody ever accused Harvard University of being communistic because its banner was crimson? Well, the Harvard Business Review, spring 1940, has an arresting article: The Fruits of Industrial Peace, and the fruits are large. Instance after instance is cited of the Steel Workers Organizing Committee working together with management, in several cases actually saving concerns from going bankrupt. The English economist, Marshall, states that half the brain power of the world lies with the working classes, and bemoaned the fact that so little use is being made of this resource. When labor and management cooperate they begin to explore the possibilities of using this vast power.

In 1936 and 1937 the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation fought the union, and the union was forced to strike to gain recognition. The company then changed its policy, and embarked on a sincere experiment in labor relations. As a result, the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation is enjoying a period of harmonious labor relations, which have become a model for the entire industry. There are no excesses at the plants of this company.

In the spring of 1939, 30 steel executives met in Pittsburgh as guests of the Steel Workers Organizing Committee to hear and discuss an address by a nationally known economist. At the California plant of the Paraffine Companies, Inc., the process is reversed—the company sponsors a course for union leaders.

I must mention one other reason why I am interested in labor unions. Because I see that the roots of international war are economic, and the result of rival imperialism, I believe in labor unions as a way of helping to prevent such conflicts. Under capitalism, workers are not paid for what they produce. In 1939, far less profitable a year for operations than 1940, the Winchester plant, or Western Cartridge, made a profit averaging $565 per worker. Average wages I am told are between 45 and 50 cents an hour for production workers. Fifty cents an hour, 40 hours a week—$20, or on piece work, even $25, or $30 a week—how can men on such salaries buy radios, or refrigerators, or automobiles, and support a family? They can't. Similarly, if the same kind of conditions obtain among radio and refrigerator workers, how can they in turn buy Winchester rifles and shotguns? The answer is, they can't. Multiply these examples for all our industries, and the simple answer is, capitalism must depend on foreign markets to sell its surplus goods which cannot be sold at home, because capitalism fails to pay its workers for what they produce. Competition for foreign markets, however, means trade rivalries, conflicting nationalism, and imperialism, and imperialism breeds war. Enlightened industrialists understand these problems, but all too frequently industrial engineers have not been trained in international relations and the problems of distribution. According to the Wickenden report, sponsored by the Society for the Promotion of Engineering Education, in 1929, only 13 percent of the curricula of schools of engineering was concerned with nontechnical subjects. Engineering students, unlike candidates for law, medicine, the ministry, or education, go direct from high school to technical school. There they are highly trained in the arts of production, but with a meager introduction to the problems of distribution, consumption, and of industrial relations. Hence they are not aware of the grave international implications of their domestic wage policies. Higher wages at home increase purchasing power, which will do away with the necessity of seeking foreign markets, the competition for which makes for war.

Why do I, a Christian minister, become interested in these things? Because I am convinced that the way of good will is stronger than hate, that love can overcome evil, that labor and management can work out their differences around the conference table in a democratic way, loving mercy, and doing justly by all. The cure for dictatorship in our world is not less democracy, but more. Speaking at Buffalo before the ministers' association of that city, Dr. James Myers, industrial secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, said that where human misunderstanding and bitterness exist:

"It is the peculiar duty of religion to bring out the true facts and, more than that, to bring together representatives of these economic groups * * * to achieve brotherly understanding, and discover those common interests, which will be found to underlie all the superficial prejudice, misunderstanding, and strife which divide us."

Accordingly, because I believe in this, because I believe in democracy, because I believe in Christ, I shall seek to bring more democracy, not less, to New Haven. If this be treason, then make the most of it.

Independence Day Objectives Contrasted to Alien Sincerity of Allegiance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY L. MOSER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

ARTICLE BY WESTBROOK PEGLER AND ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON EVENING STAR

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following articles appearing in the Washington Post and the Star of July 4, 1941, apropos of Independence Day, contrasting loyalty of certain naturalized citizens to American principles and prerequisites notwithstanding oath of allegiance.

[From the Washington Post of July 4, 1941]

FAIR ENOUGH

(By Westbrook Pegler)

OF ALIENS

There is not the slightest doubt that the people of this country have the right to close the books, and for any length of time, against the naturalization of aliens. This is our country and we make the rules of eligibility, so if we decide not to take in any more outsiders as full members until further notice no apologies are due anyone.

The question is whether it would be wise to do this.

As one who thinks it would be wise I would point to the fact, well known to all our practical politicians, that for a long time many of our naturalized citizens have voted by blocs and have turned important elections by their solidarity under the leadership of political colonizers or padrones. No election should be decided by any group which is still conscious of segregation from the whole American community, but this does happen and doubtless will continue to happen as long as we confer citizenship on masses of people who simply aren't yet Americans.

However, that is water over the dam now. It is impossible to revoke the naturalization of such voters except by a laborious process in each individual case where it can be shown that citizenship was obtained by fraud, and the number who could be so denaturalized would be negligible. But it is easily possible to act on this experience now and thus put an end to the abuse within measurable time.

Our immigrants since the first World War have not contributed much to the peace and progress of the United States, wherein they have differed from the hordes who came tumbling ashore from the boats in the old free-and-easy days. True, those immigrants colonized and voted in blocs and politicians filling slates were careful to salt them with names which would appeal to the foreign-born. But they were, in the main, workers who elected to venture to the United States as a land of opportunity, whereas the newer immigration has largely consisted of people who sought only safety and regarded this country as a refuge and nothing else. There is quite a difference there

The newer immigration has included many presumptous ingrates with fixed ideas of government and economy which had made them unwelcome at home, who had no sooner set down their bags here than they began to lecture us on our faults and try to set things right, according to their notions. They didn't want to become Americans, but wanted to make Russians or Germans or, better say, Communists or Nazis of us. Some of them got into our Government in the guise of economic advisers and counselors on social reform, and in our cities and, worst of all, in some parts of New York an old-style American is practically an alien in his own home town.

There comes a time when the native American reminds himself that the alien and the naturalized but only slightly Americanized citizen are not, after all, the only persons for whom the United States exists. He is suddenly aware that for years he has been hearing about the rights and troubles of the foreign-born and is moved to assert that he who was born here is entitled to a little consideration, too, and not as a concession but as his right.

It offends the native American to be told, in effect, that the native population cannot produce men capable of performing important tasks, involving a call on patriotism, as well as individuals who came from the other side. He doesn't believe that this is actually so and suspects that such appointments are made with intent to appeal to blocs of alien-minded naturalized voters and to stimulate the growth of socialism, whether Muscovite or Nazi, in his native land.

The native Americans are divided on a thousand issues and never vote as a bloc, but if they could be consulted it would be found that they want no advice from any foreigner, naturalized or not, on the conduct of their country, and deeply resent political appeals to foreign groups voting their prejudices or instructions, which determine the outcome of American elections. The American has heard Americanism derided as something smug and contemptible, and ideas imported from the hell of Europe extolled as noble and progressive, although disaster struck wherever they were tried in the Old World. He gets not merely weary but pretty damned sore about that, too.

Once an alien is fully naturalized, he is a citizen equal in rights to the native American and may be a little superior in privileges, although he has only a smattering of the language and no affection for the Republic.

The Constitution says the President must be a native American, but with that single discrimination the newest naturalized Muscovite or Bundist is as good an American, under the law, as the native who has tried always to be a good citizen and never wavered in his Americanism.

[From the Washington Evening Star of July 4, 1941]

NATURALIZED NAZI SPY ELEVENTH TO ADMIT GUILT

NEW YORK, July 4.—Erich Strunck, 31, German-born seaman, arrested in Milwaukee in the F. B. I. round-up of 33 men and women suspected of espionage activities, pleaded guilty yesterday before United States Commissioner Martin C. Epstein to a charge of conspiring to engage in espionage activities against the United States.

Strunck, a naturalized United States citizen, was the eleventh to enter a guilty plea. He was ordered held under $25,000 bail for grand-jury action.

A seaman on the liner Siboney, which made frequent stops at Lisbon, Portugal, Strunck was described by F. B. I agents as a courier for the alleged spy ring.

Inmates of the Women's House of Detention made such a fuss when they learned three women arrested in Sunday's counter-espionage were among them that the trio had to be moved to other parts of the prison. Richard A. McGee, acting first deputy commissioner of correction, said the other prisoners chanted "Heil Hitler" and "Sieg Heil" and offered the Nazi salute.

Paderewski

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAM HOBBS
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

POEM BY HORACE C. CARLISLE

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem by Mr. Horace C. Carlisle:

PADEREWSKI

Paderewski, the marvelous, matchless musician,
Much admired for his talents in both hemispheres,
Has fulfilled upon earth his remarkable mission,
That has covered a number of mem'rable years—
He has left a rare heritage to generations,
Born and unborn, to live, long as memories last,
In the musical hearts of the peace-loving nations,
Who'll enshrine it within the archives of the past.

He not only stood first amongst master musicians,
As pastmaster-performer, but likewise he will Be remembered for his much admired compositions,
That will grow, through the ages, more popular still—
And, although he stood second to none as a master
In the musical realm wherein lately he shone,
He both spent and was spent, in the days of disaster,
For the good of the nation that he called his own.

Paderewski made millions, and freely expended
Most of all that he made, to help others along—
His own people he willingly greatly befriended—
For humanity his love was tenderly strong.
In addition to being so great a musician,
Justifiably proud of his matchless career,
Although not recognized as a shrewd politician,
He was known as a statesman whom just men revere.

Paderewski has been a unique inspiration
To the musical talent of the artistic world—
He stands first in the musical sky's constellation,
In our land, where the Stars and the Stripes are unfurled—
In America, tho' it is sometimes retarded,
Oft, perhaps, through the will of Divine Providence,
Genius must be religiously, rightly rewarded,
Or else God's word will fail to fulfill His intents.

Because faith, hope, and charity sweetly were blended
In the great Paderewski's remarkable life,
That in merciful majesty silently ended,
When he said, "Farewell, trouble and sorrow and strife,"
He was known, far and wide, for the grandeur and beauty
That enriched everything that he purposed to do;
For his highest ambition was doing his duty
In a way to help God make his heart-dreams come true.

Until into eternity time's poured its ages,
And has emptied itself of the lingering years—
Till the last line has faded from history's pages,
And the dawn of the great final judgment appears—
Will live on Paderewski's unique contribution,
That is meaning as much to sublime music's cause,
As America's God-and-man-made Constitution
Means today to our Nation's and States' statute laws.

—Horace C. Carlisle.

Paderewski

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago Ignace Jan Paderewski, the Polish patriot and first President of the Council of Ministers of restored Poland after the World War, departed from this life. I had the good fortune to know him, to work with him, and to aid him in the cause which he advocated for the liberation of the people of Poland from the yoke of tyranny.

Mr. Paderewski was a most generous man, of whom it can be truly said that the cause of his people, for freedom and liberty, was nearer and dearer to him than life itself. A most accomplished musician, yet his aims for the cause of liberty excelled even his greatness as an artist, and therefor, I am indeed gratified that this country, in recognition of his valuable services in the common cause of democracy, has accorded his earthly remains a resting place in the Arlington National Cemetery.

Poland gave to America Pulaski and Kosciuszko, and American history which is replete with their courageous fight for American freedom, relates that "freedom shrieked when Kosciuszko fell," and I might add that America mourned when Poland fell, and grieves the loss of her foremost citizen. Ignace Paderewski was a real democratic humanitarian, for he not only spent most of the fortune he made by his concerts in behalf of the Polish people, but he also gave benefit concerts for various philanthropic purposes, all of his concerts during the World War were for the cause of Poland, and one of his last concerts was for the benefit of the widows and orphans of France.

Mr. Paderewski was elected Chairman of the National Council of the Polish Republic when the exiled Polish Government was set up, and upon his arrival from Lisbon in New York issued the following statement:

Everybody knows that my poor nation is being systematically exterminated, that millions have been robbed, expelled from their homes, or deported to die in concentration camps.

He was born on November 6, 1860, in the Province of Podolia, which suffered much from the oppression of the czars, and when a Polish rebellion broke out, cossacks killed his mother, imprisoned his father, and carried his maternal grandfather away to Siberia, from where he never returned and evidently perished as did so many Polish patriots, so that the infant prodigy's life was blighted by these tragic memories while he was only 3 years old. He worked for the cause of freedom for Poland at Washington, and upon his return to his native land was received with great acclaim by the Polish people.

It is to be regretted that his advice not to listen to the promises, assurances, and pledges on the part of Hitler was not heeded nor his warning to Beck that the Polish Government should not aid Hitler in dismembering that great little Republic of Czechoslovakia. His intelligence, experience, and foresight made it perfectly clear to him that although such action might temporarily get Poland a portion of Czechoslovakia, which it received by the Versailles Treaty, Hitler would not permit Poland to retain it for any length of time. Evidently he, like all those who knew that Hitler was out for world conquest, feared Hitler's aim first to grab the Polish Corridor and later on to wrest from the Polish people all of Poland and its freedom and independence. Let us hope that Mr. Paderewski's efforts in behalf of a free and independent Poland will not have been in vain, and that Poland will soon again attain the freedom which he originally aided in obtaining for the Polish people.

In that connection I have read with a great deal of interest many editorials on this great man. None of them appealed to me more strongly than the one which appeared in the Washington Evening Star on July 1, which I take the privilege of inserting as part of my remarks:

[From the Washington Evening Star of July 1, 1941]

PADEREWSKI

An era ended when Ignace Jan Paderewski died at 80 in New York. He belonged to a time which is gone, a civilization which has been destroyed. The majority of the more important of his contemporaries predeceased him. He lived to witness the final catastrophe of the epoch in which he had been a leading but unfortunately a futile actor. That was his tragedy.

Half a century ago, however, there was nothing to suggest that Paderewski was destined to such a disappointment. When first he came to America in 1891 he literally dominated any environment into which he chose to enter. Professional critics of music were not overfriendly to the passion of his playing, but the lay public accepted him as the supreme master of the piano. Merely to see him in that period of his life was a memorable experience. A glance into his face was sufficient to convince the average stranger that he was possessed of vast resources of personal power. The lightning in his eyes was prophetic of the rebirth of his country, "the knight among the nations."

What gift of his own Paderewski brought to music may be a matter of opinion. He studied under Raguski and Leschetizky, received from them all that they would convey to him before his debut in Vienna in 1887. But instruction could not make him the artist he was. It probably molded his technique to his advantage, yet there is no reason to believe that it controlled the fire in his heart. He carried to his instrument a blaze produced in his soul. No phenomenon comparable with it has been manifested by any other virtuoso of his generation. It will bear repetition that up to the last he looked the genius that he was.

The same idealism which made him the world's greatest pianist prompted his efforts in behalf of the resurrection of the Polish state. Germany's defeat and the Bolshevik revolution in Russia provided the opportunity for the creation of a constitutional republic of the variety he desired. Never a radical, Paderewski considered a stalwart central government necessary to the prosperity of the united national community for which he had labored so long. His strength, however, really was that of his popular following in America. He arrived in Warsaw in December 1918 as a representative of the liberal views of President Woodrow Wilson rather than as an apostle of a practical philosophy of native growth. The role he was required to assume was not altogether natural to him, and the difficulties which beset him included those of adjustment to demands which would have dismayed a far more astute politician. His coalition ministry, formed January 17, 1919, was recognized by the Allies, but it soon collapsed. The military group headed by Marshal Pilsudski joined in effect with the intractable Socialists to oblige him to resign from his office as premier.

Washington knew Paderewski well and esteemed him highly. His last appearance at Constitution Hall is not likely to be forgotten by those music lovers who were privileged to attend. The date was March 23, 1933; and the master at the moment was at the apex of his artistic career. In acknowledgment of generous applause, he played six encores; and then, as though reluctant to depart, added Schubert's impromptu, Opus 142, No. 2. The picture was profoundly impressive; the audience stood in grateful silence the while he wove his final spell of magic melody.

Now his hands are still, but he is assured of remembrance not so much for what he did as for what he was. Paderewski the artist is immortal. The time and the world and the civilization to which he belonged likewise may rise from death again.

Stop Foreign Enlistments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, a recent news article which appeared in the papers throughout the country carried the following statement "the United States probably will give formal, full-fledged approval within a few days to the enlistment of American men in the British or Chinese war effort, either for actual combat duty or for noncombatant technical work behind the lines." The casual observer may read this statement without realizing how serious and far-reaching the matter of foreign enlistments really is. What does it mean to have American soldiers fighting in the British Army? What does it mean to have American blood spilled on foreign soil? The best answer to those questions was given by Winston Churchill in his book The World Crisis. Churchill states therein, "Nothing will bring America in on our side quicker than some blood spilled in Europe." When Americans are killed in Europe the news of their death will be broadcast throughout the United States. That is just what the war promoters want for the purpose of stirring up feelings on the part of Americans so their emotions will sway them rather than their judgment.

We want American boys to defend this country and we know they will gladly give up their lives to preserve our liberties. To induce our youth to enter a foreign holocaust by means of false slogans and spurious appeals is a vicious act which borders on criminality. The following article from the Milwaukee Sentinel discusses the question of foreign enlistments:

EXPECT O. K. SOON ON FOREIGN ENLISTMENTS—DRIVE TO BE SANCTIONED AS SERVICE IN INTEREST OF NATIONAL SAFETY; PREDICT VOLUNTEERS WILL BE GIVEN DEFERMENT

WASHINGTON, June 26.—The United States probably will give formal, full-fledged approval within a few days to the enlistment of American men in the British or Chinese war effort, either for actual combat duty or for noncombatant technical work behind the lines.

The enlistments would be sanctioned officially as service in the interest of national safety.

Informed persons predicted this development would come with issuance by selective-service headquarters here of a memorandum to State directors directing deferment be given registrants who wish to volunteer for duty abroad.

A final decision to issue the memorandum has not been made, officials said, but at selective-service headquarters it was looked upon as a virtually inevitable step after President Roosevelt told his press conference Tuesday that any man who wants to enlist in Britain's or China's fighting forces has a right to do so.

The President explained the British no longer require Americans to take an oath of allegiance to the King, a procedure by which they would lose their American citizenship.

Previously the administration had approved a British drive in this country to recruit several thousand technicians to help manufacture and service Britain's new airplane radio-locator or to do other expert mechanical duty.

Those who are leading the drive toward war want you to turn your eyes away from the horrors of war, and they hope that you will act upon emotion rather than reason. War means loss of life, suffering, misery, and destruction of not only property but those principles which all liberty-loving Americans hold dear. Think of the maimed bodies and twisted minds of those boys who manage to survive the battlefield. Contemplate the financial ruin and destruction of democracy that war would foist upon our Republic. War today is fought in the totalitarian manner. Nations at war are regimented and operated under the dictatorship principle; the rights of the individual are crushed, civil liberties are stamped out, censorship of speech, the radio, and the press are imposed; the war lords take over industry; they kill labor's right to strike and viciously crush all opposition.

Lindbergh Urges America To Defend Own Way of Life

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

ADDRESS BY CHARLES A. LINDBERGH

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith the complete text of the address delivered by Charles A. Lindbergh in San Francisco on July 2:

The longer this war in Europe continues, the more confused its issues become. When it started, Germany and Russia were lined up against England and France. Now, less than two years later, we find Russia and England fighting France and Germany.

Winter before last, when Russia was fighting Finland, the interventionists demanded that we send all possible aid to Finland. Now, when Russia is fighting Finland again, they demand that we send all possible aid to Russia.

OUR WAY OF LIFE

The murderers and plunderers of yesterday are accepted as the valiant defenders of civilization today, and the valiant defenders of yesterday have become the wicked aggressors of today.

Finland and France are now our enemies; Russia our friend. We have been asked to defend the English way of life, and the Chinese way of life. We are now asked to defend the Russian way of life.

I ask you, is the Russian way of life our way of life? Are we now to be responsible for the policies of Stalin as well as for those of Churchill and Chiang Kai-shek?

Two weeks ago, the interventionists were accusing the America First Committee of associating with the subversive influence of communism. Now I suppose it is our turn to ask whose meetings the Communists attend. The America First Committee has never accepted Communists or Fascists in its membership. We have never changed our policy in this respect. We accept no foreign way of life, and no foreign ideologies.

IDEALIST SHOUTING

We reject them all. But the idealists who have been shouting against the horrors of Nazi Germany are now ready to welcome Soviet Russia as an ally.

They are ready to join with a nation whose record of cruelty, bloodshed, and barbarism is without parallel in modern history.

ENTIRE WAR IS A RECORD OF HYPOCRISY; U. S. TOLD TO JOIN THIS SIDE, THEN THAT

The entire record of this war is a record of hypocrisy and confusion. When Germany was a republic France and England refused her simplest requests. But when she turned into a Fascist state they let her do as she pleased.

When German troops marched into the Rhineland France and England made no move; but after the Siegfried Line was built they declared war. We in America were then told that the future of civilization depended upon preserving the spirit of France. But the Christians and humanitarians who once called on us for aid to France now sit complacently by and watch her children starve.

One month we hear that England and France will fight to the death against gangster tactics of Germany. The next month we hear that the British Navy has turned its guns on the French fleet, and that French aircraft are dropping bombs on Gibraltar.

UNCLE SHYLOCK

One year a war is declared without consulting America. The next year we are told that America is responsible for that war. One year we are called "Uncle Shylock," and the next year we are asked for the loan of billions of dollars.

If we had gone to war a few months ago, France would have been with us, and Russia would have been on the other side. If we go to war now, Russia will be with us, and France may be on the other side. At the moment no one seems to be sure whether Japan would rather fight Russia or fight us. Some of our American interventionists want to fight Germany and some want to fight Japan.

Judging from Europe's record, if we enter this war we can't be sure whether we will have Russia or Germany for a partner by the time we finish. We don't even know whether we will end up with France or England on our side. It is quite possible that we would find ourselves alone fighting the entire world before it was over.

NATIONS OF ETERNAL WAR

The only sensible thing for us to do is to build an impregnable defense for America, and keep this hemisphere at peace. As long as our Government insists on interfering with the affairs of Europe, this confusion will continue.

It may be a new experience for our generation here in America, but confusion is nothing new to the nations of the Old World. Jefferson understood that when he said, "They are nations of eternal war."

CONFUSION WEAPON OF PROPAGANDISTS—PRESS, RADIO, AND THEATER FULL OF IT

Washington understood it when he warned us against European entanglements.

These European wars have been going on for centuries, and there is certainly no indication that they will stop now.

Every major country in Europe has fought every other major country in Europe time and time again. In one generation, England and Germany fight France. In another generation, France and England fight Germany. In a third generation, Germany and France fight England.

First, we hear that Napoleon is going to conquer the world. Then, Stalin constitutes our greatest menace. And now it is Hitler. But it is interesting to note that the only time this country was ever invaded, it was not by Germany, or Russia, or France.

Confusion is not an accidental fact in war. It is the major weapon of the interventionists. They have flooded this country with propaganda intended to confuse us—propaganda for the purpose of drawing us into war. Our press, our radio, our book stalls, and our theaters are full of it.

FIXED FORMULA IN NEWS

Our news is governed more by the formulas of propaganda than it is by the factual developments of the war. For instance, the news of almost every campaign of the war has followed a fixed formula. First, there are headlines of German aggression. Then unlimited aid is promised to the attacked nation.

Then for a few days we are encouraged by allied successes, and someone says it is the turning point of the war. Then if there are any allied forces present, they evacuate. Then the defending armies collapse. Finally, an announcement is made that the campaign was really a victory for the British because it upset the time schedule of the German Army.

This is no reflection on the British soldier. He has shown great courage, but he has been put in impossible situations and he has been appallingly equipped. Try this formula on the campaigns to date and see how many it fits. Try it on Poland, Norway, Holland, and Belgium, France, Yugoslavia, and Greece. Try it on the Russian campaign when it is over.

FACTS VERSUS PROPAGANDA

Here in America all news that will create support for England is exaggerated; all news that will not is suppressed. A refugee who steps from the gangplank and advocates war is acclaimed as a defender of freedom. A native-born American who opposes war is called a "fifth columnist."

There is another propaganda formula, a more fundamental one, that you can apply to all the news you read about this war. It is that the British position must be good enough to make us think that England will eventually win, and bad enough to persuade us to assist her. If the British position appears too good, we may not lease and lend with sufficient generosity. If it appears too bad, we may think it necessary to concentrate on our own defenses.

UNDERSTANDING OF FACTS MAY KEEP AMERICANS FROM ENTERING STRIFE

If these propaganda formulas are successful in misleading the American people, we will enter the war. On the other hand, if our people understand the facts behind this propaganda, our entrance into the war is unlikely.

Let us look at some of these facts. Let us take the salient facts in the latest turn of the war, the Russian-German conflict.

You remember that the relationship between Germany and Russia had been close to the breaking point for years before the conference at Munich in 1938. Russia was not even represented at that conference.

When I was in Czechoslovakia in September, 1938, I saw Russian bombing planes on Czech air fields, bombers that had been sent to fight Germany if she invaded Czechoslovakia.

LACK OF INSIGHT

Have you ever stopped to think why war did not break out between Russia and Germany at that time? Have you ever stopped to realize that Russia and Germany would have been at each other's throats 2 years ago had it not been for the interventionist interference of England and France? This conflict between Germany and Russia which the interventionists all applaud now would have taken place then if only they had shown a little more insight.

The German armies were prepared to march eastward, but what happened? Did the interventionists welcome such a move then as they do now? They did not. They beguiled Poland into a futile war, and when Germany turned east they attacked her in the west. Instead of pushing her on to Russia they drew the German onslaught to their own countries. They postponed the inevitable conflict between Russia and Germany and forced instead a conflict between Germany, France, and England—a conflict for which France and England were completely unprepared.

Have you ever stopped to consider what interventionist leadership has done to this world, and how ineffective and disastrous it has been?

Intervention with sanctions in the war between Italy and Abyssinia did not save Abyssinia; it simply threw Italy into Germany's open arms.

INTERVENTION BY ALLIES IN POLAND LED TO FRENCH DEFEAT, ENGLAND BOMBING

Intervention by England and France in the war between Germany and Poland did not save Poland; it postponed the war between Germany and Russia and brought the defeat of France and the devastation of England.

The attitude of American interventionists toward Japan forced that country, too, into the arms of the Axis. If they had had their way, Germany would be fighting us today instead of Russia.

The record of the interventionists has been a record of abject failure. They cannot point to a single important instance of success in connection with this war.

I was in Siberia in 1931, and in western Russia in 1933 and 1938. I made a number of trips through Germany in 1936, 1937, and 1938. I lived for 2 years in England, and for 1 year in France. When I speak of Europe, I speak from first-hand knowledge of conditions there.

As you know, I have opposed a military alliance between the United States and England. If the question had arisen, I would have opposed even more strongly a military alliance between the United States and Germany.

But I tell you that I would a hundred times rather see my country ally herself with England, or even with Germany, with all of her faults, than with the cruelty, the godlessness, and the barbarism that exist in Soviet Russia.

An alliance between the United States and Russia should be opposed by every American, by every Christian, and by every humanitarian in this country.

READY TO FIGHT FOR UNITED STATES

The fundamental point is that we do not want to ally ourselves with Russia, or Germany, or England, or with any foreign power that seeks to embroil us in the quarrels and chaos of Europe. We do not want to fight for the Russian way of life, or the German way of life, or the English way of life, or any way of life except our own.

Men and women of California, why should the United States of America be divided by these eternal European wars? Why should the question ever arise as to whether we will fight for England, or France, or Germany, or Russia?

We in America descend from every one of these nations.

We will never agree among ourselves as to the right and wrong of their quarrels.

But there is one thing upon which we can agree, upon which we are not divided, and that is that we are ready to fight for America if the need should ever arise.

Why dissipate our unity and strength here at home in an attempt to force us into another European war?

Why give up an impregnable position in America for a hazardous and untenable position in Europe?

INTOLERANCE AND HATRED TO FOLLOW WHATEVER THE OUTCOME IS IN EUROPE

Why bring to this country the chaos, the intolerance, and the hatred that will inevitably come with a foreign war?

No one has attempted to attack us, and if we prepare ourselves properly, no one will be in a position to attack us. It is not a question of whether Hitler would like to invade America.

It is not a question of trusting promises that may be broken.

I never have, and I do not now recommend basing the security of our Nation on the promises of any man, or any foreign government.

Our security should rest on the strength, the character, and the arms of our own people.

The point is that if we prepare intelligently, regardless of promises, or treaties, or anything that may be done in Europe, this country is strong enough and able enough to take care of itself.

UNITED STATES AT CROSSROAD

We have taken care of ourselves when we were far weaker than we are today, and we can do so again. The real defeatist in America is the man who says that this Nation cannot survive alone.

The United States is at a crossroad in its history. The war party advocates that we give up the independence our forefathers won, and that we merge our destiny again with the nations of the Old World, taking on our shoulders all the wars and quarrels and problems that have been theirs for a thousand years.

We, on this platform, represent people who believe in an independent destiny for America.

We have banded together to form the America First Committee, which stands firmly in opposition to the war party and intervention.

Our principles are open and clear. We stand for a unified nation behind an impregnable defense, and an independent destiny for America. If you believe in these principles, we ask you to join our committee. The crisis is here, and we need your support, that we may pass on to our children the free, independent American heritage we received from our forefathers.

Marketing Quotas for Wheat

REMARKS

OF

HON. ROSS RIZLEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to call to the attention of the membership of the House a bill that I have today introduced to amend Public Law No. 74 enacted by this Congress pertaining to marketing quotas for wheat and certain other farm commodities.

The amendment is for the twofold purpose of reducing the penalty on wheat from 49 to 15 cents per bushel, and where the penalties have already been exacted to reimburse the farmer for the difference between 49 cents per bushel and 15 cents per bushel.

Mr. Speaker, during the wheat-planting season of 1940 many farmers planted more than their allotted acreage to wheat and many others who have never participated in the farm program planted their wheat, relying on the then-existing law that they would only have to pay a penalty of 15 cents per bushel on the excess wheat so marketed or upon which they might obtain a loan, as the case may be.

This Congress changed the rules in the middle of the game, so to speak, at a time when the wheat was practically ready for harvest, and the enactment of Senate Joint Resolution 60 is in effect retroactive legislation. In many sections of Oklahoma and Kansas, in the greatest wheat-producing area in the United States, due to an excessive amount of rains, the production this year is far less and of lower quality than normally produced; and the wheat in many instances is not of sufficiently high test to permit marketing at the prevailing market price for standard test wheat or to obtain a loan.

In many instances in this whole area, the penalty equals or exceeds in amount the marketable value of the wheat produced, thus destroying the means of livelihood of the respective farmers affected by the penalty.

Even though the wheat is unfit for milling purposes, the farmer cannot feed it to his livestock without paying the penalty of 49 cents per bushel.

While it is true that according to the record more than two-thirds of the farmers at an election called for that purpose voted in favor of marketing quotas, it is quite apparent that the average wheat farmer little realized, and I think I might properly say the Congress little realized, how heavily this penalty would react. Of course, no one wants to exact penalties that amount to confiscation.

Other bills have been introduced to modify the act, and the chairman of the Agricultural Committee has called a special meeting of the committee tomorrow for the purpose of considering the various bills that have been introduced. I urge all who are interested in this matter to appear before the Agricultural Committee tomorrow to the end that something may be worked out that will remedy and correct the apparent injustice that has been done by this legislation.

Petition protesting farm marketing excess penalty on wheat

We, the undersigned, hereby represent that we, and each of us, are farmers in Noble County, Okla., and produced wheat for the marketing year 1941–42.

That we do hereby emphatically protest the excess wheat-marketing penalty that was purportedly authorized by the recent election pertaining thereto; and for reasons for this protest we state as follows:

1. That in the fall of the year 1940 during the wheat-sowing period we had no cause to reasonably anticipate the application of said penalty on the excess wheat production as has been defined by the United States Department of Agriculture.

2. That the application of said penalty was not put into effect until after the wheat crop in this area had matured, and that the farmer had no opportunity to cut the excess wheat acreage at a time when the same could have been diverted for use as hay or pasture.

3. The average wheat production throughout this area for said wheat-production year is far less and of lower quality than is normally produced; and that said wheat is not, in many instances, of sufficiently high test to permit the marketing thereof at the prevailing market prices for standard-test wheat.

4. That it is our sincere opinion that a substantial percent of the farmers who voted for said wheat-marketing quota were not mindful of the condition that would result from said election.

5. That the application of said penalty provision wrongfully discriminates in favor of the wheat grower who had no excess wheat acreage as was recently invoked by the result of said election, as against the wheat producer whose acreage exceeded said allotment, which allotment limitation was not made effective until after said wheat crop had actually been produced.

6. That said penalty will in many instances in this area equal or exceed in amount the marketable value of the wheat produced, thereby destroying the principal means of livelihood of the respective farmers affected by said penalty.

We therefore urgently request that congressional action be taken immediately which will afford one of the following alternative remedies:

1. Removing the penalties for said crop year.

2. Sharply reducing the amount of said penalties.

3. Authorizing and permitting the respective wheat producers to use the excess wheat as feed for their domestic animals and poultry.

Assuring you that we shall expect immediate relief in this matter, we respectfully submit these petitions.

The resolution contains the signatures of 565 farmers.

Commencement Address of Justice Frankfurter at Radcliffe College

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

ADDRESS BY JUSTICE FELIX FRANKFURTER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Justice Felix Frankfurter:

College commencements have long been more than local festivities touching only on the interests of local college communities. They have become a national occasion to celebrate and fortify the national spirit. In the recent past this great event in the lives of young men and young women was a symbol of hope in youth. The generations mingled to take heart, one with another, to promote the promises that lay ahead. But never before, I believe, have college commencements been so appropriate to the times, nor so symbolic of all that we hold dear. For events compel us to reconsider the significance of our history.

Circumstances which even the most ostrichlike can no longer disregard challenge the worth of our past, the validity of the faith that founded this Nation, and our power to vindicate it. This issue concerns the very basis of our history and the underpinning of our civilization. Of this view of our life and of the means for its pursuit, an institution like Radcliffe is the most emphatic expression. For our colleges and universities are the distinctive product of what we cherish as western civilization. They shelter and bring to fruit the purposes which must again be the ideals and the pursuit of the whole world if civilization is to maintain itself. The human spirit cannot here have that security and serenity essential to its dignity and achievement while the soul of man is everywhere else enclosed.

Thomas Jefferson understood this fully. And the epitaph which Jefferson wrote for himself cannot be recalled too often. Here was a man who held all the high offices of state. Yet when he came to commend himself to posterity this is how he wished to be remembered:

"Here was buried Thomas Jefferson,
Author of the Declaration of American Independence,
Of the Statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom,
And Father of the University of Virginia."

In that epitaph Jefferson made clear the relation of Radcliffe College and every other college and university in the land to the awful issue that now confronts the world. Man is without dignity unless he has freedom. And there cannot be freedom without the right to pursue truth. The university which Jefferson founded in Virginia and the university which the builders of Massachusetts founded more than 200 years before, almost contemporaneously with the establishment of the colony, and all the other institutions of learning throughout the country, are the special instruments for the unremitting pursuit of truth. You, therefore, represent to a peculiar degree the trusteeship of civilization.

Just as colleges as we know them are at once the fruit and the necessary condition of a civilized society, so democracy is its indispensable political expression. Democracy is neither a mystical abstraction nor a mechanical gadget. In the long course of human experience it has proven itself the only form of social arrangement which adequately respects, and by so doing helps to unfold the richness of human diversity. All the devices of political machinery—votes and parties and parliaments—are merely instruments to enable men to live with one another with full respect for one another under conditions eliciting the maximum gifts of each for the amplest enjoyment of all.

Colleges and universities are the recognized guardians of the life of reason. Democracy furnishes the political framework. Within which alone reason can thrive most imaginatively on the widest scale least hampered by the accidents of personal antecedents and most regardful of the intrinsic qualities in man. Nature herself is democratic in that she plants gifts and graces in ways that defy the devisings of all of man's artifices. Therefore we must have political institutions which allow these mysterious gifts and graces their fullest outlet.

Until recently men were either too shy or too cynical to talk about these great simple themes. The pace of material development not only preoccupied the energies of men; it overawed their thought. The deficiencies of democracy became a favorite jibe of the worldly wise. And thus the faith that gave us birth and has maintained us was subtly undermined. Even those from whom better things were to be expected erected impatience with Congress into a political philosophy. A certain university president in the Babylonian twenties added his voice to the chorus urging the elimination of politics and gleefully reported that his students were turning away from sociological studies.

CIVILIZATION OUR BUSINESS

It seemed strange then and it seems appalling now that men should forget that politics is the free exchange of opinion regarding the wisest policy for the life of a society, and as such is the essence of a free people. These men forgot that in the last analysis we are governed either through talk or through force. Now at least they must realize that a dictatorship means precisely the prohibition of politics. So completely were the governing minds of America under the powerful illusions of materialism during this era that a President of the United States could say that "the business of America is business" and believe he was uttering a truism.

The business of America is civilization. Our professed realists had lost sight of the wisdom of the most hard-headed political realist of the ninteenth century. It was Bismarck who gave currency to the term "imponderable," for he, however unsympathetically, was alive to those spiritual needs of man which are the ultimate forces of an enduring society. The things not made by hand nor seen by eye are the things that rule. Beauty and truth, reason and justice—these unattainable but ever-to-be-striven-for longings of men are now seen to be man's most indispensable needs. By these needs the most gifted and the humblest are bound into a common brotherhood. I am unashamed to speak of these longings of mind and heart today. They are the only themes worthy of your concern.

These needs are so immediate that we take their satisfaction for granted until we are threatened with their denial. And the imagination is so narrow that too many of us are blind to threats that are wrapped in euphemisms. To acclaim the worth of democracy is not to deny the inadequacies and injustices of our society. It is merely to insist that in striving for the better we should not discard the good. The ultimate justification of democracy is that it affords the only opportunity for continuous social improvement.

What we have already achieved, what is ours to preserve and to defend, has been set out in words by one of the finest spirits of our time. It is the utterance of a great historian who has lived and not merely written about those aspirations of men which have found immortal expression in the Declaration of Independence, the French Rights of Man, and the Gettysburg Address.

What I am about to read was meant only for my eyes, but I am taking the liberty without his permission to read from a letter written by someone you all know who, in the autumn of his life became an American citizen of his own free choice.

"There is in this country," he wrote, "a wider area of generosity than in any other country—at least in Europe. It is this feeling that one is at home here that conquers you little by little. And one fine day you feel that you are no longer an exile but a citizen in your own country. When I took my oath, I felt that really I was performing a grand function. I was throwing away not my intellectual and moral but my juristic past. I threw it away without any regret. The Ethiopian war, the rape of Albania, the Spanish crime, and this last idiotic crime had really broken my connection with sovereigns, potentates, and all those ugly things which are enumerated in the formula of the oath. It is a wonderful formula. Your pledges are only juridical and political. You are asked to sever your connection with the government of your former country, not with the people and the civilization of your former country. And you are asked to give allegiance to the Constitution of your adopted country; that is, to an ideal of life.

"Thus I took my oath with a joyous heart, and I am sure I will keep it with the whole of my heart as long as I am alive."

FREEDOM NEEDS EFFORT

Democracy, so conceived as the means by which man can best find his own good, is a subject for interchange of views and humble searching of hearts. The old convention of utilizing an occasion like this for uttering homilies and pronouncements of policy now seems as impertinent as it was futile. A commencement is really a common confessional. But the old should no more abdicate their experience than the young their ardor. Merely because you are young, you are not necessarily wise. Nor is Miss Comstock, because she is older, necessarily un-understanding.

We are enlisted, old and young, in a common enterprise—the bold experiment of freedom. It involves the most exacting collaborative effort. It demands the exercise of reason on the largest scale and self-discipline of the highest order. For it places ultimate faith for the achievement of the common good in the responsibility of the individual.

We are thus engaged in the most difficult of all arts, the art of living together in a gracious society. For this it is not enough to be literate; it is not even enough to be literary. Mr. Justice Holmes used to speak of the days preceding the Civil War when the eminent men of his father's circle indulged in "tall talk" and averted their minds from grim reality. The issues presented by slavery could not be settled by denying them. Iridescent phrases cannot make the most ancient of tyrannies into a "new order." While mankind is literate as never before, the environment for reason is least congenial.

Ours is a civilization of hub-bub, where raucous voice drown out the still, small voice of reason. We want to get rich quick morally and intellectually. We resort to short cuts and easy ways. But there is no short cut to reason, no ersatz for morality. The mechanical triumphs of the machine age cannot be transferred to the workings of democracy. All evasions of hard thinking are self-defeating.

One of the most paralyzing evasions of thought is what Lincoln called pernicious abstractions. Post-war teaching greatly suffered from them, and to them much of our recent bewilderment is attributable. This is not the occasion for didactic exposition. An example or two much suffice.

One of the most current of these evasions of thought is that "war never settles anything." The Civil War settled slavery. This war will settle the quality of your lives and your children's lives. It simply is not true that war never settles anything. I respect the convictions of a conscientious objector to war and I believe I understand the philosophy underlying Gandhi's nonresistance. But the relentless choice events may force on every individual cannot be met by such a fair-sounding pernicious abstraction as that "war never settles anything."

CONFLUENCE OF PEOPLES

Another favorite drug for the mind is the claim that a country at war is already under dictatorship. Democracy in this country has expanded despite four wars. And only those unfamiliar with what has taken place in Great Britain since September 1939 will deny that England is more democratic today than she has ever been. By that I mean very specifically that her present Government is more responsive to the common will of her people, although, to be sure, that will has imposed self-restraints not required in times of peace.

I recommend to any doubter of the alertness of British democracy a reading of the debates in the House of Commons since this war began. What is more heartening, with the enemy at the gates, than to find the Government proposing measures for the public security and, after free discussion, to have the representatives of the people rejecting or modifying them in the interest of "the liberty of the subject."

Life is an act of faith. Whatever destiny awaits you, the ultimate question for each to decide is to what unseen powers and to what dimly defined ends we dedicate our lives. The United State: has a special destiny because a unique fact gives it moral cohesion. This is the only country without a racially homogeneous population rooted to a particular soil. We represent a confluence of peoples who derive their bond of union from their common, intrinsic human qualities. This is your heritage, and in the confidence that you will maintain it this Nation was founded.

In days of trial and tribulation we go for sustenance to those few whose compassionate hearts and courageous minds lighted the way through past ordeals. Thus it is that Lincoln today lives perhaps more vividly than when he walked among men. A great man's wisdom is always contemporaneous. In addressing the Congress of the United States on December 1, 1862, Lincoln was immediately concerned with the problems of slavery. But the view of life which infused his utterance is just as relevant to the issue of freedom that now challenges the world. Familiar though these words may be, I make no apology for bidding you Godspeed with them:

"The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate to the stormy present. The occasion is piled high with difficulty, and we must rise with the occasion. As our case is new, so we must think anew and act anew. We must disenthrall ourselves, and then we shall save our country.

"Fellow citizens, we cannot escape history. No personal significance or insignificance can spare one or another of us. The fiery trial through which we pass will light us down in honor or dishonor to the latest generation. We say we are for the Union. The world will not forget that we say this. We, even we here, hold the power and bear the responsibility. In giving freedom to the slave we assure freedom to the free—honorable alike in what we give and what we preserve. We shall nobly save or meanly lose the last best hope of earth."

Loyalty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM M. COLMER

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

ADDRESS BY REAR ADMIRAL EMORY S. LAND

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following brief talk by the Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission, Rear Admiral Emory S. Land, United States Navy, retired, to the shipbuilding workers of the Ingalls Shipbuilding Corporation, Pascagoula, Miss., Saturday, June 28, 1941:

The shipbuilders of the Gulf coast have launched today the first all-welded passenger-carrying ship in the history of the world. It is the steamship African Comet which will soon be put in service by the American South African Line. In normal times this would be one of the scientific achievements of the year. Today its scientific importance is far overshadowed by its importance to our national welfare in adding one more merchant ship capable of serving as a naval auxiliary.

I want to repeat and to stress the descriptions which our President has given of the insecurity of this country today, with a towering wave of ruthless aggression threatening to break over our heads.

The shipbuilders of the Gulf, the Atlantic, and the Pacific coasts and of the Great Lakes are pushing back that wave with every ship they launch, whether merchant or naval.

All hands are doing a splendid job here in Pascagoula. The Maritime Commission congratulates you. You are the shipbuilders of this country as well as the men who sit in the front office. The men in the front office are vital, but you are the actual "arm and hammer brand" builders. Ships are built by the men in the yards. They are built with cranes and welders' torches and paint brushes and hammers—built by loyal Americans.

Your employers and the Government have given you a genuine incentive for your best all-out efforts in the Regional Labor Wage Stabilization programs recently announced. Shipbuilders' wages are not increased by millions only but by hundreds of millions in the over-all picture.

We of the Maritime Commission have been told by the President to see that a vast fleet of merchant ships is built—and built while they can still be of some use, that is—built for this war, not—as were the Hog Island ships—for some other war. Time is the essence.

We have told the men in the front offices. They have told you. They know that we must build ships faster than we've ever built them before in our history. You know it, too. We want your cooperation. I have faith in you—I know we will get your cooperation.

You all heard President Roosevelt say in his last fireside-talk that:

"The blunt truth is this—and I reveal this with the full knowledge of the British Government: The present rate of Nazi sinkings of merchant ships is more than three times as high as the capacity of British shipyards to replace them; it is more than twice the combined British and American output of merchant ships today."

All hands in the yards are going to change that by joint effort.

The President said, "We can answer this peril by two simultaneous measures: First, by speeding up and increasing our great shipbuilding program; and second, by helping to cut down the losses on the high seas."

The President and the men of the Navy are working in partnership on the problem of cutting down losses. But to speed up and increase our shipbuilding program the partnership changes. In building, every workman in this yard and in every other yard is a partner in the enterprise. Without your partnership this Government cannot deliver on its promise to build ships fast enough to supply not only Britain and the other democracies with the vital materials they need to survive but also to make our commercial, naval, and military defenses impregnable.

Each man should do an honest day's work, and when he has finished it, should go home content in the knowledge that he has done a good job and can do another good day's work tomorrow. And there will be a day's work tomorrow. There will be jobs in shipbuilding for years, and the quicker we build the ships, the more jobs there will be. We need 300,000 more workers by 1942.

Our estimates, our promises, and our expectations depend on you—upon the productivity of labor.

Let's be frank about our situation. We are in a state of unlimited emergency, declared by our President. We are in a state of acute danger. If Hitler's Germany will overnight turn and attack a nation which has been on its side, it won't hesitate to attack us, a nation which is clearly playing on the other team.

Some of our fellow citizens are in positions where they will defend us directly against a direct attack. They are your brothers and cousins and friends in the Army and Navy and marines. But just as devastating, just as demoralizing, and just as destructive of our homeland is the indirect attack which is already under way in the attempt to wipe out the brotherhood of free, democratic nations.

This powerful "indirect" assault can only be met by an equally powerful indirect offense. That offense lies in the "all out" production of airplanes and tanks and guns—and ships and more ships.

Again let's be frank. When I ask for your cooperation I am asking that every one of you make it his own personal responsibility to build ships fast enough to defeat Hitler. I am asking that every one of you make "that little spark of conscience," which George Washington spoke of, his own guide.

I've worked in shipyards and drafting rooms long enough to know that you can greatly increase your output when you put your heart into the job. There are a hundred and one time-consuming practices which can be eliminated, from outright loafing when the leading man or quarterman is not around to asking questions of the foreman when you know the answer already. No supervisor can see all these and stop them. I wouldn't want him to if he could. We aren't going to defend ourselves successfully unless the workingmen of the country want to do the job. If you want to keep Hitler out of this hemisphere, you'll use that "spark of conscience" as your guide and make yourself build faster whether there is a straw boss around or not.

It's like the captain and chief engineer who for years argued bitterly over which was more important to the operation of the ship—the bridge or the engine room. Finally they agreed to change places. After about 5 hours the captain came up from the engine room covered with grease and sweating like a horse, "You win," he said. "I've been trying for 3 hours to make her turn over and I'm a failure." "Well, maybe that's partly my fault," said the chief, "about 3 hours ago I put her aground stern first."

No compulsion but the greatest could get me to ask that work be stopped for an appeal of this sort. But that great compulsion is here.

This is an appeal for loyalty—for loyalty of the greatest kind—loyalty to the British shipyard workers, too, loyalty which will preserve their freedom as well as their lives.

Loyalty to these United States. Loyalty to civilization.

And it is loyalty to your own soldiers and sailors and to your own wives, sweethearts, mothers, and children, too. Let no one think that this continent is not threatened.

President Roosevelt said, "Nobody can foretell tonight just when the acts of the dictators will ripen into attack of this hemisphere and us. But we know enough by now to realize that it would be suicide to wait until they are in our front yard."

We don't have enough ships today to meet our needs. In order to give the Army and the Navy auxiliaries like the African Comet we have had to cut our normal services and that, in itself, hurts the defense program. It is hurting and will hurt everyone of us. We must tighten our belts, we must distribute the burden.

So my plea to you and to all other shipbuilders is to do your jobs—to build these ships as fast as you can.

Very little humor ever crosses the path of the Maritime Commission, but occasionally there is a touch of humor in our official documents. The situation today is like that revealed in an action which the Commission took the other day. We were asked to approve the surrender of the marine document of a vessel known as the June Bride. The reasons given were a change in service and a change in tonnage as disclosed by readmeasurement. You workers likewise are concerned in a change of service and a change in tonnage—service for the defense of your country and increased tonnage to deliver the goods. I hope your answer will be given in the names of two ships which were recently sold to the British—Don't Worry and Urge Me.

Remember, in a Hitler world, if we don't hang together, we'll surely hang separately.

Being a sort of a sailor man, may I conclude by paraphrasing the immortal Nelson—The United States expects every man to do his duty. We know you will.

Let's go.

A Progressive Banker Warns the People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

ARTICLE FROM FORT SMITH (ARK.) TRIBUNE OF JUNE 27, 1941

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, it is not often that presidents of national banks reveal a progressive attitude toward economics. However, in a recent issue of a southern newspaper there appeared a provocative and challenging article, the reading of which I recommend to all:

[From the Fort Smith (Ark.) Tribune of June 27, 1941]

SAVING PART OF BURDEN OF TAXATION AND ELIMINATING PUBLIC FROM BEING ROBBED BY WATERED-STOCK MANIPULATIONS

The greatest problem facing the American people today is the radio. While it is still in its infancy people do not realize and appreciate what it will mean to the public in time.

Let each and every one of us refresh our memory to the time when the telephone was first created, when the airplane was first created, and when the other inventions were first created. Prior to their creation, it was inconceivable that anything like that could happen. Who would have believed 20 years ago that 20 men could get in a plane and fly all over the world at the rate of from 100 to 300 miles per hour or faster?

By not being mindful and cautious, we have allowed monopolies to be created whereby they are owned by a few, when in reality, they should have been owned by the people; and if not by the people, by the Government.

The Government by so owning would have reduced graft that creates monopolies and it would have been a tremendous saving to the public by reason of the Government owning some of the valuable and profitable inventions.

But the Government has allowed only a few to own them, and by doing it is sucking the life and blood out of the public and allowing only a few to profit from them. The Government could have eliminated the graft and corruption, and by doing so, could have eliminated the burdensome load of taxes that is placed upon the masses.

To illustrate: The development that developed in the railroad watered-stock issues and others, hundreds of millions of watered stock were issued and sold to the public. J. P. Morgan admitted that he bought either forty or fifty million of some of the railroad's watered stock. I suppose part of it they sold to the public, and others likewise. Finally, it was a total loss to those who bought it.

That applies to the other corporations that issued watered stock; the public utilities that have millions and billions of watered stock, and the Bell Telephone Co., owned by J. P. Morgan, who is one of the largest manipulators in the telephone organization.

Are we going to allow the radio to be placed in the same position? Or are we going to recommend for the Government to get the benefit instead of the few speculators? After all, who is the Government? You and I and everybody else.

Some may say they are not in favor of government ownership. Neither am I, but I do believe certain utilities should be owned by the Government instead of some special interest; however, government ownership could be carried to an extreme.

The graft generally is created from the people and by the people, just the same as is honesty and justice. It is entirely up to us, but I would rather trust to the ballot than to a few corrupt corporations. I have heard, and so have you, that elections have been stolen in order to elect special ones. In fact, some have bragged of doing so. Those who did the stealing of the elections did not succeed very long; their downfall always came in time when it was least expected. It is like a thief in the darkness, in time he is caught. The person who takes advantage of the position he occupies is an ordinary thief. His downfall must, and will, come in time.

If we do not conquer the radio it will come to be owned by some special interest, and my guess would be the Bell Telephone; for the reason, anyone who has kept up with the Bell could see its claw. We must not depend upon our President to do everything. We, the people, must assist him, and each and every one of us write a letter to the President, and Congressmen, and the Senators conveying this thought to them, and recommending that our Government take over the radio, the phones, and public utilities; when the Government, by doing so, would eliminate the future losses that will be sustained by the public from their owning watered stock, and would mean an income of billions to the Government to pay the indebtedness of our Government that is now placed upon us, and that will continue to be placed upon us during this war.

The investors who are now buying watered stock should be educated to buy stock issued by the Government against railroads, telephones, and public utilities when the Government takes them over. The earnings would pay for itself, and in time the earnings would cause such a tremendous income that the Government could take the enormous burden off the taxpayer. The public will save in three ways:

First. Elimination of taxation.

Second. Their investments would be safe.

Third. They would get a fair return upon their investments, whereas now not only do they lose their interest but they lose the biggest part of their principal as well.

Each and every one of us should read this, digest this, think about this, and then take a little time to write a letter to our President urging that a bill of this kind be passed. This is not my issue nor your issue. It is the issue for all the people and for the good of the country.

This is a rough outline, but this is the foundation from which some should be added and some deducted to make it 100 percent proof. The suggestion is so big and so profitable to the masses that each and every American citizen who reads this should give this his careful consideration. This could be made a saving to our public in many ways. The finances of our Government, or any individual, are our existence; therefore, whoever reads this article, do not read shallow but convey your own suggestions, if you choose. Remember, when you do, you are doing it to save the welfare and eliminate the corruption of our present condition.

I. H. NAKDIMEN,
President, City National Bank.

Analysis of the Present Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALFRED F. BEITER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

ARTICLE BY OWEN L. SCOTT

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article by Owen L. Scott appearing in the Sunday Star of July 6, 1941, containing an excellent analysis of the international situation and its effect on the United States:

[From the Washington Sunday Star of July 6, 1941]

SEES TWO VICTORIES WON BY PRESIDENT

(By Owen L. Scott)

President Roosevelt today is able to get satisfaction from these facts:

Of all of the leaders of the world's principal nations, the President of the United States is the only one whose nation is not now engaged in an active war.

Yet, of the nations of major rank which have faced threats from Hitler, Mussolini, and Matsuoka—other than China—the United States is the one nation that has balked at attempted appeasement.

Mr. Roosevelt's opponents charge him with courting war. They insist that this Nation should go out of its way to make a deal with Hitler and Matsuoka. They insist that Britain is done for and that there is nothing to do but accept the "new order" and to prepare the United States to play second fiddle in the world. Their argument is that otherwise somebody is going to get hurt.

However, the United States is not at war. The United States has not surrendered and has not bowed to the threats of the group of conquering dictators. Nations which did deal with the dictators are either at war or are conquered.

The truth appears to be that President Roosevelt, by his policy of nonappeasement, has won two major victories for the United States and Britain.

For one thing, the President forced the Germans to turn to the east and thereby to give both the United States and Britain more time in which to prepare for any assault that may later develop in their direction.

For a second thing, the President forced the Japanese to swallow a defeat in their effort to intimidate the Dutch in the South Pacific, and he also forced the Japanese to face the alternative of strangulation through pressure from Russia and the United States or some check to Japanese ambition.

These are major accomplishments and have been achieved without bloodshed.

Two main contentions have been made by those who opposed President Roosevelt's policy of nonappeasement and who advocated a policy of attempted cooperation with the dictators. Those contentions are:

First, that if the United States would just induce the British to stop their fight and to make a deal with Hitler, the German armies could then be turned eastward to get entangled in a struggle with Russia that might result in destruction of both Stalin and Hitler.

Second, that if the United States would step aside and allow the Japanese to grab the riches of the South Pacific area it would make unnecessary the maintenance of a large naval force in the Pacific and still would leave the Japanese with no alternative but to sell the rubber and tin and other resources of that area to the United States, just as the British and Dutch now are doing.

As to the first of those contentions, Hitler now is engaged in his struggle with Stalin. He says he was forced into this struggle because he did not dare make an all-out assault on the British until he had removed any possible threat from the East. The reason he did not dare to make this assault on the British prior to an attack on Russia was that the United States made clear its determination to support Britain.

If Hitler now becomes bogged down in Russia it will be due, not to any theory of appeasement on the part of the United States, but to a firm policy by the United States of refusing to be intimidated. If Hitler does not become bogged down in Russia and makes a quick conquest, leaving him free to turn his attention to Britain, the group favoring appeasement no longer will be able to argue that the correct American policy is to try to divert Hitler's attention to Russia. Russia won't be there as an independent nation.

As to the second contention, Japan now has her bluff called by the Dutch. The Japanese had demanded control over some of the basic resources of the Dutch East Indies. Japan threatened dire consequences if her demands were not met. The Dutch, with tacit backing of the United States and Britain, turned a cold shoulder to the Japanese threats.

Faced with the alternative of trading with the Dutch East Indies on the same terms that other nations trade, or of trying to conquer that rich territory, Japan has hesitated. The reason she hesitated is that American bombing planes in the hands of the Dutch can outmatch the air strength the Japanese could send against them at this time. The reason also is that an American naval force of great strength remains in the Pacific in a position to move westward when the Japanese Navy moves south.

As a result, the supplies of rubber and tin on which the United States is vitally dependent, remain in the hands of a friendly power and are readily accessible to this country. In the hands of Japan they could be used as a strong bargaining weapon in any dealings with the United States.

President Roosevelt, in shaping American foreign policy, must deal with facts and not with theories. He must meet the threats of those nations which are open and avowed enemies of the United States. Many in Congress and in the country, who are side-line coaches, have insisted that the way to meet threats is to bow before them.

However, the President has taken his line of firmness. He has met threats from this country's enemies with threats of his own. He has refused to bargain with or to bow before any other nation, no matter how big its army or how loud its talk. And today the United States is further away from war than it was little more than 2 weeks ago. Instead of being in war, this country has impressive victories to show, and those victories gained without fighting.

Of course, there is no assurance that in the end the United States can avoid fighting. Many nations have sought to avoid fighting Hitler and yet have been attacked. Stalin would have paid almost any price in appeasement, even to permitting German control over some basic Russian industries, in order to keep Hitler's eyes turned toward the south and west. He wasn't given the chance.

It is probable that if Hitler wins a quick victory over Russia and then turns to an all-out attack on Britain it will be necessary to use the American Fleet and air force to keep supplies flowing to the British Isles. Whether this is called war probably would be for Hitler to say. It certainly would not be called appeasement.

Senator George

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JEANNETTE RANKIN
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS OF JULY 3, 1941

Miss RANKIN of Montana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting an editorial in the Washington News of Thursday, July 3, entitled "Senator GEORGE."

The honorable Senator, Thomas W. Hardwick, of Georgia, plead with President Wilson not to take us into the World War in 1917.

It is of great significance that again a Senator from Georgia has the understanding to oppose the entrance of this country into the present conflict.

Senator GEORGE reflects the sentiment of the people in his State who, like the people in Montana, see no advantage to civilization in having their men killed in an effort to settle the boundary disputes in Europe.

The editorial follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of July 3, 1941]

SENATOR GEORGE

In a war-threat emergency the most important official, other than the President, is the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. For our Constitution gives to Congress, and particularly the Senate, coordinate power with the President over foreign commitments. Only Congress has power to declare war.

The Nation is fortunate in having as that ranking Member of Congress in foreign affairs Senator GEORGE of Georgia. He rates that leadership not only by seniority, but by a sober patriotism, by ability, and by character.

Lesser men assumed that memory of the President's unsuccessful effort to purge Senator GEORGE in the senatorial election—for refusal to accept the Supreme Court packing plan—would color his conduct as Foreign Relations chairman. It has not. On the contrary, his selfless cooperation has saved the Roosevelt policy in the Senate more than once.

This record as well as the deep sincerity of his defense of the American constitutional method, explains the profound impression made by his Senate speech last Saturday. In the midst of war declarations by unelected Cabinet officers, and consequent widespread public fear that the President will start a shooting war without consulting Congress, Senator GEORGE reaffirmed his calm faith. He said:

"I recognize the necessity for all-out total preparation as strongly as anyone can, and I think a little more strongly, perhaps, than some of our friends. Because to my mind all-out total preparation never can be made by the American people, with the resolution which has characterized them in all their great undertakings, unless and until they feel that they themselves are a part of the great decision which brings on that effort.

"So when I was thinking of total defense I was thinking primarily of the strong spirit of unity, which will not exist if our people are possessed with the fear that great decisions and commitments may be made without any opportunity on their part to participate in making such decisions.

"I have tried to make it perfectly clear that in my humble opinion, but without anything to base it upon save my own conclusion and deduction, the President of the United States himself has fully recognized what is in my mind, and that he did not want to arouse the fear of the American people that he would make great decisions without their having an opportunity to pass upon the questions involved."

Or again:

"I profoundly hope this country will not become an active participant in the present war, or any other war. I have not yet accepted the fatalistic doctrine that our actual military or naval participation is inevitable."

Remember that the speaker is head of the powerful Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the representative of Congress whom the President consults on these questions, and the old and close friend of Secretary of State Hull.

We are thankful that Chairman GEORGE is in that position of great responsibility.

Americanism and the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. CARL ANDERSEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE OSAKIS (MINN.) REVIEW

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial appearing in the Osakis Review, of Osakis, Minn., edited by Mr. J. Paul Kinney, has so much common-sense logic in it that I am taking the privilege of inserting this article in the RECORD.

The Osakis Review well expresses the attitude of the majority of the people of Minnesota, in my opinion, and I commend this to the attention of the House.

[From the Osakis (Minn.) Review]

There is a tendency on the part of some people to call those who do not support the President's foreign policy partisan and un-American. But, after all, this is a free country, or supposed to be, where freedom of speech, press, and assemblage are still being practiced, and this country is not yet at war. When war is declared, then the time for debating policies and ways and means is over and all the people must unitedly get behind the President's program and support it whether they like it or not.

But until war is declared the people have the right and the duty to discuss policies and debate ways and means for the conduct of this country without the interference or criticism of anyone for engaging in the exercise of those privileges which were won for us by the blood of forefathers. There is, of course, no use for the Government to allow any spy or espionage system to grow and develop in this country under the program of free enterprise that we foster and encourage in this country. That is something else again.

The Review editor along with many other sincere and loyal Americans believes that we have no business trying to settle the quarrels of Europe. We have not the power or the authority to establish peace in war-torn Europe for any length of time unless we are willing to join some super-state or confederation of countries, such as was to have been established by the League of Nations, which was frowned upon by the majority of the American people evidently.

In that case it appears that one war will follow another in Europe, whereas we of the United States have demonstrated that we can live peaceably together with our neighbors on the North American Continent. If it appears that some fanatic like Hitler in combination with some other greedy dictators is going to be a menace to our free institutions and our way of living then, all right, let us arm to the teeth.

Let us build an army and a navy that will give our shores and our country all the protection that it needs. Let us have a separate air corps independent and equal to either the army or navy. Let us have a citizen army made up of young men who each year give a year's service to their country so that in time of emergency they may constitute a force that cannot be overthrown by any invader.

We are not pro-British and neither are we anti-British. In fact we ardently hope for a British victory and the defeat of Hitler, but we do not believe that our fate is dependent upon the fate of the British Empire and that if England should be unfortunately defeated that we must also bow in humiliation to the demands of the dictator. Our first line of defense is made up of the American shore line and when that is threatened there need be no worry over the spontaneity that will then be evidenced by our people in the manner in which they will arise and strike down any threatening force, provided, of course, that in the meantime this country will have armed its forces and instructed them in the ways of modern warfare.

To say that we who differ with the President in his foreign policy and who openly charge the President with leading us down the path that inevitably leads to war are lending aid and comfort to the enemy is beclouding the issue, since we are not yet at war and will not be at war for a long time to come if some of us who are opposed to war will have the courage of our convictions and oppose strenuously and honestly those measures and policies which we believe will lead to war and our participation in it.

Are those who are so intent on waging war on Hitler now satisfied to be on the same side of the argument as Stalin and his Russian Communists? Do we Americans care to be a party to the overthrow and defeat of Finland, the country in Europe that has won more respect and admiration from this country than any other nation on that continent? What are we going to fight for? Are we going to try to establish a victorious Communistic Army in Europe? It is time for the American people to give the matter of warfare in Europe some sober, serious consideration, free from any prejudice, name calling, and bitterness. It is time to ask ourselves if we can accomplish in Europe something more than we did back at the time of the first World War.

Those who occupy places of trust and responsibility have an unusually grave task ahead of them right now. It is no time for them to indulge in name calling and questioning the motives and the patriotism of those who do not see the advantages and the necessity of participating in a foreign war. Rather it is their duty to lend their time and effort to the cause of peace. There will be those, we presume, who will fear being called appeasers, but if these appeasers are able to bring about a peace that is at all reasonable then we say power to them.

Let those who believe and maintain that war settles questions and promotes civilization, and helps maintain the democratic way of living lead the hosts of our young men into battle then we shall become more interested in the idea of this country going to war with the exception noted, of course, that a defensive war is an altogether different thing.

Gen. Robert E. Wood sums up the situation neatly when he says "the war party can hardly ask the people of America to take up arms behind the Red flag of Stalin."

"With the ruthless forces of dictatorship and aggression now clearly aligned on both sides, the proper course for the United States becomes even clearer," Wood said.

"We must continue to build our own defenses and take no part in this incongruous European conflict. This latest development gives dramatic emphasis to the obvious proposition that there can never be a place for the United States in Europe's everlasting strife, and its shifting alliance and enmities."

A Brief in Support of Government Monopolies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. COFFEE
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

ARTICLE BY IRVING BRANT

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, Irving Brant has at various times been editor of the Iowa City Republican, the Clinton (Iowa) Herald, the Des Moines Register and Tribune, the St. Louis Star, and the Star-Times of St. Louis.

He is the author of the well-known books entitled "Dollars and Cents" and "Storm Over the Constitution."

One of his outstanding studies has been the constitutionality of government monopolies. Because of the wide interest in this subject, I am asking unanimous consent to have an article by Mr. Brant entitled "Constitutionality of Government Monopolies" and which was printed in pamphlet form by the People's Lobby of Washington, D. C., printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The pamphlet is as follows:

GOVERNMENT MONOPOLIES ARE CONSTITUTIONAL

According to the American Liberty League, the United States Government has no power to control agriculture or industry along the lines attempted by the Roosevelt administration because these activities resemble the mercantile monopolies set up by European governments in the eighteenth century, and one of the purposes in writing our Constitution was to protect our country against eighteenth-century mercantilism.

"The fact is," said the Liberty League in a pamphlet discussing similarities between the New Deal and mercantilism, "that the colonists were the victims of economic planning, and the constitutional structure erected by the new nation was designed to furnish safeguards against economic experimentation conducted by a centralized authority." This was secured, according to the Liberty League, by reserving control of local commerce to the States.

The right to set up mercantile monopolies would, indeed, be a titanic power in the Federal Government. It would cover any degree of regulation of industry. It would permit the establishment of a completely socialized state.

That power exists. It is in the Constitution. The framers said it was there, and two of the leading delegates to the Constitutional Convention cited the existence of that power as a reason for refusing to sign the Constitution.

The subject came up on September 14, 1787, 3 days before the signing of the Constitution.

"As to mercantile monopolies," said Wilson of Pennsylvania (afterward Justice of the United States Supreme Court), "they are already included in the power to regulate trade."

How was this statement greeted? Did the framers rise as one man to cry out against such a power in the Federal Government? They did not. One man, George Mason, of Virginia, the most extreme State righter in the Convention, questioned it. Two days later he admitted that the power was there. He wrote on the back of his copy of the Constitution that he was refusing to sign because, among other things "the Congress may grant monopolies in trade and commerce." Elbridge Gerry, of Massachusetts, listing his reasons for refusal to sign, said: "Under the power over commerce, monopolies may be established."

During these last days of the Convention these men were begged, implored, to sign the Constitution. But not one delegate challenged the correctness of Wilson's statement that mercantile monopolies were "already included in the power to regulate trade."

Now, what could be done under a power to establish Government monopolies in trade and commerce? Anything. The T. V. A., the N. R. A., the A. A. A., the Guffey Coal Act, and the Wagner Labor Act are modest exercises of Government power compared with what could be done through the establishment of mercantile monopolies.

We have here a startling, indeed a revolutionary, deviation from what we ordinarily hear about the attitude of the framers toward government power. Is there anything in the constitutional debates to support this view? For answer, read what Madison, the "Father of the Constitution," said when it was proposed—2 days before the convention adjourned—that the States be allowed to lay tonnage duties for clearing harbors and erecting lighthouses.

"Whether the States are now restrained from laying tonnage duties," said Madison, "depends on the extent of the power 'to regulate commerce.' These terms are vague, but they seem to exclude this power of the States. They may certainly be restrained by treaty. He observed that there were other objects for tonnage duties as the support of seamen, etc. He was more and more convinced that the regulation of commerce was in its nature indivisible and ought to be wholly under one authority." (Madison's notes were written in the third person.)

When one thinks of recent Supreme Court decisions and of the general belief that the framers were State righters, that's an almost incredible statement, coming "from 'horse and buggy' days." Let's analyze it.

The States have a reserved power of taxation, concurrent with that of Congress. Madison held that the power of Congress to regulate commerce included the right to invade the reserved power of the States in a different field.

Next, he said, the States "may certainly be restrained by treaty." That is, even if there should be doubt about the right of the Federal Government to invade the reserved powers of the States under the commerce clause, that right unquestionably exists under the treaty power. In saying this, Madison foreshadowed the Supreme Court decision upholding a law to enforce the Migratory Bird Treaty with Canada, even though, without that treaty protection of birds would have been a matter reserved to the States.

Madison said, "The support of seamen" was a legitimate object of taxation. What difference is there between a tax on shipping for pensions to seamen and a tax on railroads for pensions to railroad men; what difference between support of seamen and a general old-age pension system? Yet the Supreme Court in 1935 said railroad pensions were unconstitutional, and the 58 lawyers of the Liberty League say the Wagner Social Security Act is unconstitutional.

Finally, consider Madison's statement that the regulation of commerce is "in its nature indivisible and ought to be wholly under one authority." That, it may be said, is not a statement of what is in the Constitution, but of what ought to be. Very well. What that statement does beyond question is break down the theory that the framers were devoted to State rights, in the control of commerce. That theory breaks down still further when we consider the reply Roger Sherman, of Connecticut, made to Madison's remarks about control by one authority:

"The power of the United States to regulate trade, being supreme, can control interferences of the State regulations when such interferences happen, so that there is no danger to be apprehended from a concurrent jurisdiction."

Sherman did not divide "commerce among the States" into interstate and intrastate commerce. He treated it as a general subject in which the upward limit of State authority was fixed by the downward exercise of Federal authority. Federal power was supreme and could control interferences from the States.

Why do these powers, which the framers took for granted, seem so startlingly great today that the Supreme Court denies their existence? Because the objects, the problems, to which this power would be devoted have multiplied a thousandfold with the development of the Nation. The power exists, but its existence is denied because of the extent to which it could be used.

Make, for instance, a first step toward application of the power to establish mercantile monopolies. Even a law for Federal incorporation of companies engaged in interstate commerce, with Congress reserving the right to amend corporate charters, would open up a regulatory field of almost unimaginable vastness.

Or consider the treaty power, as defined by Madison and upheld by the Supreme Court in the migratory-bird case. That enables Congress to legislate on any subject which is a legitimate subject of concern between nations. What does that cover, or, rather, what does it fail to cover, in this age when nations go to war for raw materials—oil, coal, iron, timber—and when differing wage standards, differing standards of living, are weapons of international attack in the life-and-death struggle for world trade? Let the United States sign a treaty with any oil-producing country for the conservation of petroleum, and all constitutional doubt about the power of Congress to conserve the American oil supply will vanish. A treaty with Canada for the control of competitive surpluses in certain agricultural products would bring the control of those products as definitely within the powers of the Congress as if a specific clause were written into the Constitution. So, too, if the 40-hour week now on the agenda of the international labor body at Geneva, were made the subject of an international agreement.

Treaties on these subjects are coming. They will be forced upon us by world-wide economic disequilibrium if civilization is not to be destroyed by competitive greed.

Finally, we come to a power which once appeared to be the most powerful of all but which, on January 6, 1936, was almost driven out of the Constitution in the Hoosac Mills case—the power to raise and spend money to provide for the general welfare. Stated in a sentence, the Hoosac Mills case presented these two conflicting interpretations of the general-welfare clause:

1. Supreme Court majority: The power to raise money to provide for the general welfare involves no other powers.

2. Supreme Court minority: The power to raise money to provide for the general welfare involves the incidental power to make the use of that money effective.

What did the framers say on that subject? For answer, let us go to the author of the general-welfare clause, Roger Sherman. On the day he took his seat in the Constitutional Convention he said that the power most particularly needed by Congress was "that of raising money, which would involve many other powers."

What other powers did Sherman think were included in the money power? Well, for one thing, he thought it included the right to establish a national university. When President Washington proposed a national university the author of the general-welfare clause was the first man to arise in Congress to endorse it and assert its constitutionality. The Constitution gives Congress no power over education, so, under Supreme Court reasoning it must be a power reserved to the States. If the right to spend money for the general welfare includes the right to establish a national university, how can it be said, as it was said in the Hoosac Mills case, that the power to appropriate for the general welfare carries no power over the objects to which the money is to be applied?

In every great field of Federal power it has been shown the framers granted vastly more power than is now conceded by the Supreme Court, or than is generally recognized by historians. The genuine "State righters" in the Constitutional Convention refused to sign the Constitution. Yet we are told it was written to protect State sovereignty. Politicians, lawyers, and even historians say so. How can this conflict of ideas be reconciled?

The explanation is simple enough. First, men who don't want Federal authority exercised are eager to deny its existence. Second, circumstances after the Constitution was adopted helped those who wanted to interpret it narrowly.

The debates of the Constitutional Convention, entrusted to Madison, were ordered to be kept secret, and were kept secret for 50 years. Madison himself, shortly after the Constitution was ratified, switched from the Federalist Party to the party of Jefferson (who was in France when the Constitution was being written). From a strong nationalist Madison became a violent "State righter." He interpreted the work of the Convention narrowly, and nobody could challenge him effectively because he alone had the notes.

Then, after Jefferson became President, the early Federalists, who had wanted a strong government and who had ruled the Constitutional Convention, switched around and became anti-Federalists. To keep power out of Jefferson's hands, practically all of the men who had written the Constitution in a spirit of nationalism joined in an interpretation of it contrary to the views they had held when they were writing it. But the only thing that counts in judging the intention of the framers is what they intended during the framing period.

Was the Constitution drafted by men trying to preserve equality between State and Federal sovereignties? That is what the American Liberty League says. That is what the Supreme Court seems to think. To judge what the framers really intended to do, read the following from Madison, written in almost the same words to Edmund Randolph and George Washington 1 month before the framers gathered to write the Constitution:

"Let the National Government be armed with a positive and complete authority in all cases where uniform measures are necessary, as in trade, etc. Let it also retain the powers which it now possesses. Let it have a negative in all cases whatsoeve: on the legislative acts of the States as the King of Great Britain heretofore had. This I conceive to be essential and the least possible abridgement of the State sovereignties."

Think of that proposal—a Federal veto over all State laws whatsoever. Were those the words of a man devoted to State sovereignty? Let us go further.

Alexander Hamilton said in the Constitutional Convention that the States as States "ought to be abolished."

Madison asked for a government "which would most approximate the States to the condition of counties."

Gouverneur Morris said of the States: "We cannot annihilate, but we may take the teeth out of the serpents."

Thus spake the founding fathers while they were writing the Constitution. We need no constitutional amendments. All we need is to go back to the founding fathers and learn from them what Federal power means. The power is in the Constitution.

Letter to John Hancock

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK CROWTHER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

ARTICLE BY H. P. DONLON

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, H. P. Donlon, a constituent of mine, who writes for the Amsterdam (N. Y.) Evening Recorder, is one of the outstanding columnists of New York State. Gifted with an analytical mind and a keen sense of humor, his column known as Main Street is a source of joy and inspiration to its readers.

Under permission to extend my remarks, I include his letter to Mr. John Hancock, as follows:

[From the Amsterdam (N. Y.) Evening Recorder]

MAIN STREET

(By H. P. Donlon)

Mr. JOHN HANCOCK,
Haven of Eternal Rest,
Beautiful Isle of Somewhere.

DEAR JOHN: I've had the feeling for a long time that I ought to write a letter to somebody, and tomorrow being the one hundred and sixty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, and you being the first signer of that grand and glorious old document, I have decided to write to you. Perhaps you and the 55 other signers have been hearing some rumors over on the isle, and while I don't want to cause worry, you fellows ought to know that things here are much worse than they were in your time. It's lucky for you that you left the country while the going was good, and while you were still popular. You wouldn't be if you were around here now. But, on the other hand, there are a lot of us who wish that we had some real leaders like you—men willing to pledge their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor for an ideal of life.

The chances are that you wouldn't recognize this country if you were to come back tomorrow. It has changed a lot since July 4, 1776, when you severed the Colonies from "all allegiance to the British Crown" and from "all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain." You would recognize Europe, though. They haven't changed a bit, and at the present time the whole Continent looks like the Donnybrook Fair, with everybody taking a sock out of everybody else, palsy-walsy one day and blasting each other to pieces the next. That's the way it was in your time—remember? During the Revolution, England was trying to whale obedience into the wayward Colonies and at the same time to hold off France, Spain, and Holland, that had ganged up on her. That's the way it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be.

You'll notice, John, that I didn't put an "Amen" at the end of that. We aren't saying "so be it," like we used to. No; the present administration has reached the conclusion that you and the other Declaration of Independence signers, and George Washington, Jefferson, and the other founding fathers were all wrong in saying that America ought to mind its own business and let these perpetual battlers fight it out among themselves. The new philosophy is that we are duty bound to go over and mess into things every time the brawl starts. We tried the modern theory only a couple of decades ago and got a fine sticking. By the time we came back from Europe, disillusioned, disgusted, and several billion dollars poorer, we realized that you founders of the Republic were right when you said "keep out." But that was more than 20 years ago and a new crowd of internationalists has come into power since then.

And are they internationalists! Do you know what they are trying to tell us now? That we couldn't get along without England and the English Navy to protect us. Isn't that a darb? But wait, you haven't heard anything yet. They are pushing a "Union Now" campaign that would put us back to our former status as a British colony. Some of them are even suggesting a common postage stamp between the two nations. Oxford has opened a substation and is conferring degrees right on old John Harvard's campus. This country has now become the "arsenal of democracy," and every time we make a gun for ourselves we make one for some European country. Please don't ask if we get paid for the stuff. We're humanitarians now, and although the national debt is nearly $50,000,000,000, we aren't worried about money. You old-timers used to think of things as being either good or bad. Now, in the modern, streamlined philosophy the choices of life merely concern the lesser of evils. Sounds kind of paganlike, doesn't it?

I know what you are muttering to yourself, John—you are wondering what has happened to Congress. So are we. But Congress isn't as important as it used to be. The last time the President made a Nation-wide speech, he completely forgot to mention Congress. And, by the way, it is not considered polite to declare war now, and so they've junked that part of the Constitution. Under modern rules of warfare, one country starts to mow down another, and that is the official announcement that a belligerent state exists. Very un-American, to say the least, but only a few Members of Congress have the courage to say what they think about it—if they think. The best way to become a good American today is to memorize a verse, at least, of God Save the King. Otherwise, you are likely to be considered a Nazi—that's what the Germans are called now—or a Fascist—that's what the Italians are called. They're called some other names, too, but I've got to get this letter through the mails, so we won't go into that.

Yes, John, that's the way things are here. When they ask you who you're for and you reply, "I'm just an American," that isn't good enough. We're still celebrating the signing of the Declaration of Independence, but it is not considered to be in good taste to discuss what it was all about. It won't be long now before we'll have to get rid of the National Anthem—some people can't sing it because the notes are too high, while others choke at the words of the third and fourth verses, which sound rather high-spirited and are therefore vulgar. How you fellows ever had the gumption to think that you could found a country big enough and strong enough to stand by itself, to chase out the invaders as you did so often (we don't live far from Oriskany in this section), and to convince the world that you meant what you said about wanting to be let alone—that's what we can't understand. Perhaps it is because we have softened and wasted our precious heritage.

Don't get the idea for a moment, John, that I think things are going to continue this way, that your sacrifices have been in vain. These United States are not on the way out, by any means. There'll be an awakening and a comeback some day. But in the meantime we're going to have to struggle to recover that which we are losing. Our sacrifices will be as worth while as those made by you and yours 165 years ago. Kindly convey to them my sentiments of abiding esteem. I close with this, from the quotable part of the Star-Spangled Banner:

"Then conquer we must, for our cause it is just,
And this be our motto—in God is our trust."

Sincerely, your obed't serv't,
AN AVERAGE AMERICAN.

P. S.—If this letter should happen to fall into the hands of the enemy, I'm going to be out of luck. So-o-o-o, over there on the Beautiful Isle of Somewhere, if you should feel somebody nudge you and whisper, "Shove over, Bud," you'll know it's me.

The Trade Mirage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE RIPLEY (N. Y.) REVIEW

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial by Mr. M. D. Conrath, editor, the Ripley Review, Ripley, N. Y., under date of July 3, 1941:

[From the Ripley (N. Y.) Review of July 3, 1941]

THE TRADE MIRAGE

It is generally admitted by the average interventionist that it will be impossible for Hitler to invade this country in a military sense for some years to come, even were he to win total victory in Europe. Uncle Sam has the most powerful Navy in the world, a deterrent to sending a huge army 3,000 miles across the Atlantic. Moreover, there are not enough ships in Europe to provide tonnage for such an invasion. There is a great deal of talk about bombing but this would have to be done by long-range bombers, of which Hitler now possesses few, if any. And we can build them faster than he.

But one excuse for our entering the war now given is that if Hitler wins we will lose all our foreign trade. For the past few years our foreign trade has averaged about $3,000,000,000 a year, or 5 percent of our national income. If we go to war to protect this trade, it will cost us perhaps another sixty billion before we are through, which is all the foreign business we could expect in 20 years. And this, of course, does not include the thousands of killed and maimed fine Americans probable from such a war.

No matter who wins this war in Europe, our foreign trade is not going to prosper much for several years. Europe is now engaged in bankrupting itself in one of the greatest wars of history. When the conflict is over the nations will be impoverished. There will be no compensating indemnities. This poverty will be general, even if Great Britain wins the war. If we enter too, some of it will spread abroad in our own land.

Now these disillusioned European people are going to have to work long hours at low wages to get enough to eat. They will not be in the market for any more of our produce than they actually must have. But they will be seeking to undersell one another and so will make any foreign trade highly unprofitable.

It is to be remembered, too, that the United States possesses the biggest market in the world. Even if Hitler should win for himself an empire in Europe, and many people still doubt that he can put such a political state on anything like a stable basis, he would still have to have somebody to do business with. And that is where Uncle Sam comes in. So long as we keep the American market we can always depend on our share of trade. It is only by destroying this vastly rich market, by impoverishing our people through war, that we may lose everything in an economic sense.

If there is any reason why we should enter the European war it certainly is not the protecting or extending of our foreign trade, 5 percent of our total income at best.

Tribute to Hubert F. Fisher, Sr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD DAVIS
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

NEWS ARTICLE AND EDITORIAL FROM MEMPHIS, TENN., NEWSPAPERS

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article which appeared on June 18, in the Memphis Commercial Appeal, which reviews rather carefully the distinguished life of Hon. Hubert F. Fisher, a former Member of the House of Representatives, who passed away on Tuesday, June 17. There is also included an editorial which appeared in the Memphis Press-Scimitar, entitled "Lovable Character," which pays tribute to this splendid man.

Mr. Fisher represented for many years the Tenth District of Tennessee, which I now have the honor to represent as the Ninth Congressional District of my State. I knew Mr. Fisher intimately and looked upon him as a fine, personal friend and a gentleman of the highest character, integrity, and reputation. Since coming to the House, I have been impressed by the many strong friends he made during his service here. He was a man of quiet, strong intellect, who served industriously and well the needs of his immediate constituents. He had a broad, general outlook on life, and was a student of government.

We shall miss Hubert Fisher in our community, where he was respected and loved by a host of friends.

[From the Memphis Commercial Appeal]

HUBERT F. FISHER, SR., DIES IN NEW YORK—APPARENT HEART ATTACK FATAL TO MEMPHIAN—FORMER REPRESENTATIVE—ATTORNEY HAD GONE TO CITY TO ATTEND PRINCETON CLASS REUNION AND VISIT SON IN WASHINGTON

Hubert Frederick Fisher, Sr., former Member of Congress for the Tenth District, who retired from an active political and legal career to lead a quiet life among his flowers at his Germantown home, died suddenly at 2 o'clock yesterday morning in New York City. He was 63.

Mr. Fisher, who left last Thursday to attend a reunion of the Princeton class of 1901 and visit his son, Adrian S. Fisher, Assistant to the Assistant Secretary of State in Washington, apparently was stricken with a heart attack on Sixth Avenue in New York City, where he was making a brief visit. He intended to return home Friday. He was in good health except for deafness with which he had been afflicted many years.

RETIRED FROM POLITICS

The withdrawal of Mr. Fisher in November 1930 ended 14 years of service. The former Representative expressed no bitterness at the lack of support of his own candidacy, but donning his working clothes, announced his intention to "live among his flowers."

Before going to Congress he had been United States district attorney for the western district of Tennessee 3 years by appointment of the late President Woodrow Wilson, who was a member of the Princeton faculty when Mr. Fisher was a student there and whom he knew personally. He was a delegate from Memphis to the Baltimore Convention when President Wilson was nominated.

Mr. Fisher was born at Milton, Fla., the son of Frederick and Mary Ann McCarter Fisher. He spent his early life in Mississippi where the family moved, attending the University of Mississippi where he received his A. B. degree in 1898. He received his M. A. degree at Princeton, returning to Ole Miss for his law degree.

An outstanding football player at Princeton, Mr. Fisher was the University of Tennessee football coach for two years.

He was admitted to the Mississippi Bar before Judge Julian C. Wilson, at that time chancelor of the north Mississippi district and now a Memphis attorney. Coming to Memphis in 1904 he became associated with the firm of Carroll & McKellar, of which Senator MCKELLAR was a member. The firm name was changed to Carroll, Scott & Fisher after Mr. MCKELLAR entered the Senate, and was continued until Mr. Fisher became United States district attorney in 1914.

ADVOCATED MUSCLE SHOALS BILL

During his congressional career from 1917 to 1931 he was a member of the Military Affairs Committee and was a strong advocate of the Muscle Shoals bill, his political dreams having been centered for years around that project. He believed the bill would bring great prosperity to the South, and approved of governmental ownership of the Shoals because of the influence it would have on flood control and navigation. He defended Judge Harry B. Anderson in a speech before the House of Representatives when charges were introduced against him in resolutions by Representative LaGuardia, of New York.

During recent years he had consulted famous specialists in an effort to relieve his hearing difficulties and had made two trips to Europe seeking aid for the ailment.

He was an elder of Second Presbyterian Church.

He leaves his wife, formerly Miss Louise Sanford, of Knoxville, whom he married November 6, 1909; his son in Washington; another son, Hubert F. Fisher, Jr., of Memphis; a grandson, Hubert F. Fisher 3d; two brothers, R. M. Fisher of Bucatunna, Miss., and J. G. Fisher, of Electric Mills, Miss., and a sister, Mrs. Louise McLeod, of Moss Point, Miss.

Mrs. Fisher and Hubert Fisher, Jr., left last night for Knoxville.

Services will be conducted at Knoxville tomorrow morning in the Old Gray Cemetery. The E. P. Mann Funeral Home is in charge of arrangements.

[From the Memphis Press-Scimitar]

LOVABLE CHARACTER

Ex-Congressman Hubert F. Fisher, Sr., was a star center on the Princeton team, making all-America material, years ago. He coached the University of Tennessee football team at Knoxville for 2 years. But more important than anything he may have contributed to sports history is the fact that Mr. Fisher played the game of life so valiantly. A man of strong character and firm conviction, a right-thinking man, as one put it, Mr. Fisher was described by a friend of long standing as a lovable character. It was a simple tribute to a man who had those qualities of character that men respect.

Mr. Fisher served Memphis well as Congressman and good citizen. And his worth was recognized not only locally but nationally. His distinguished career was marked by his selection, by President Wilson personally, as district attorney here. In other capacities, he was known for his mental and moral qualities; as a good mixer, who enjoyed conversation; as a man who loved people. And when he retired from the limelight he found enjoyment in his beautiful rose garden and such simple things of life as helping to plant the azaleas which add to the beauty of Overton Park.

Thoughts on the International Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

ARTICLE BY REV. DR. JAMES H. COTTER WHICH APPEARED IN THE IRISH WORLD, JUNE 28, 1941

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article by the Reverend Dr. James H. Cotter, which was published in the Irish World, June 28, 1941. Dr. Cotter lives in Ironton, Ohio, and he is an author and writer.

The article follows:

[From the Irish World of June 28, 1941]

THOUGHTS

(Specially written for the Irish World by Rev. Dr. James H. Cotter)

If it were our war, the day of entrance thereto would be emblazoned on every front page of the world's press. If it were our war, we would have heard from the beginning the cannon's roar proclaiming the fact.

That "words, words, words" have to be twisted, turned, and distorted to make them fit the false and specious argument and the sophistry of the orator is of itself an absolute argument that it is not our war.

If it were our war, action, not words, would have long since demonstrated the fact.

To make it appear to the thoughtless that it is our war, Voltaire's counsel, "lie, lie, lie, and some of it will stick" has had the floor, hence we have nothing but the false in premise, the illogical in conclusion—an atrocious mass of the ridiculous and the deceitful, coupled with the tragic.

To establish democracies similar to our own in the countries warring against Germany is certainly a Utopian scheme. The word "democracies" was merely a cloak to cover England and hide singular interest in that land, where democracy is not in any way kindred to our own. There humanity is labeled first, second, and third class, a distinction unknown to free America and there heredity begets royalty and the Crown. These only indicate multitudinous differences. America would look like "Moses at the Fair" teaching the Turks democracy and the others who may yet draw the sword against Germany. Think of the languages our schools would have to teach and our diplomats would have to learn to let other lands know democracy—lands where language and race are foreign to its meaning. It is well for America to think of her own democracy and rectify its failures and perpetuate its blessings. There is such a thing as "biting off more than we can chew."

LIBERTY

In this troublous time, when words get varied meanings, from the minds that mouth them, the dear and sacred word liberty is not an exception. Used often, for ignoble purpose, its meaning for some is worn off, for others it is indistinct if not entirely effaced, while others scout its very existence. What is liberty? Liberty, briefly stated, is subjection to just law rightly administered. This subjection is not degradation, for, as we are all reasonable creatures, reason, of which law is a regulation for the common good, should guide our deeds. Wherein there are we free? We are free from injustice on the part of the law and from despotism in its enforcement and this freedom is a boon since so-called laws have often been inroads on human right—insults to human reason—and rulers, ignoring their high purpose, have acted as if laws were made to damn and not to save. It behooves us then to appreciate liberty—a a grand characteristic of our democracy and to no longer have our back to America and our face to England. "Lest we forget, lest we forget" America and its many and gracious blessings. Destroy law and you have anarchy, for man untamed, is a fierce brute indeed; exceed law, and shackled thousands groan curses on the legislator or ruler that forged their bonds. Legislate for the common good and ruler and people are alike yoked in fraternity—all rights are respected and men enjoy true civil liberty. This is our portion. We should then help our country to look to liberty with love, cherish it, and not endanger democracy of which it is the soul, by looking away from it and forgetting it in distractions that are no advantage whatsoever, but, on the contrary, are a certain danger of loss, or possible danger of death to our glorious Republic.

ENTANGLEMENTS

Some men have never been introduced to themselves, hence they are strangers to themselves. The same can be said of nations. If a mirror could be made large enough for nations to see themselves they would back indignantly away and, each in turn, declare: "That's not I." What a philosopher was Washington! How he knew men and nations and how wisely he spoke when he advised against foreign entanglements. Foreigners themselves don't know when they are in a tangle with themselves or with others. Only 23 years ago the Japanese, French, and Italians were our allies, and behold them today. They delight in execrating old friends as all lies.

Paderewski

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, Ignace Jan Paderewski is dead.

In his death the world loses a man who was gifted far above other men, and who, through a long and exemplary life, used those gifts for the benefit of his fellow man.

As a pianist who must be ranked among the truly great virtuosi of all time, he gave to millions the world over the benison which superlative music, superlatively interpreted, alone can afford.

As diplomatist and statesman, as the one-time Premier of tragic Poland, he fought for human liberty and dignity above all else. Indeed, his last years form a moving record of one man's endless struggle against the forces of darkness overrunning Europe; to the very end he contributed his fortune, his energies, his very life to the cause of a free Poland.

Musical genius, patriot, statesman, a man of princely attainments and princely generosity, Paderewski stood as a living symbol of his people's hopes.

The Father of Poland is dead, but his name will live on, and with it the dream of "Polska Powstanie." Poland Will Arise.

I also herewith submit an editorial which appeared in the Washington Post on Tuesday, July 1, 1941:

[From the Washington Post of July 1, 1941]

PADEREWSKI

Ignace Jan Paderewski often said that his country came first; his piano, after. Yet to the millions all over the world who were enthralled by his art, his political life remained a thing apart. Perhaps this was because it was difficult to visualize a great musician as a statesman taking part in Europe's political councils. For all the apparent anomaly, Paderewski will long be remembered not only as the greatest pianist of his time, but also as the fervent Polish patriot who played a major role in the re-creation of an independent Poland. He resigned as premier in 1919, after less than a year in office. But he never let his differences with Marshal Pilsudski and other Polish officials affect his deep love and labors for his native land. As late as 1921 he represented Poland at the League of Nations. And, though he lived abroad during many of the years since, he continued to devote a sizable portion of his large earnings to Polish causes. Not since the present war began had he played in public. And when Poland was again overrun, and part of it split up between Germany and Russia, he became vice premier of the war council of the Polish Government-in-exile in London. It was clear in 1939, when he was forced to break off a concert tour of this country, that the great man was approaching the end. Sunday night, in his hotel room in New York, death came at last to the great man. In his service to humanity as an artist and statesman he was truly one of the great men of our age.

The Cheese Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY SAUTHOFF
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE WISCONSIN STATE JOURNAL, MADISON, WIS.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Wisconsin State Journal, Madison, Wis.:

[From the Wisconsin State Journal, Madison, Wis.]

RETREAT FROM AN ERROR

The convincing statistics that Ralph Ammon furnished the Department of Agriculture on the cheese situation evidently have been studied by the Federal officials.

In an address at Chicago, M. Clifford Townsend, Federal Director of Agricultural Defense Relations, modified considerably the recent laughable appeal of Claude Wickard, Federal Secretary of Agriculture, calling for a large decrease in the consumption of cheese by the people of this country.

The figures of Mr. Ammon showed conclusively that Wisconsin alone, by its increased production in 1941 over 1940, would be able to furnish 240,000,000 pounds of cheese over last year's output, and that this of itself would furnish one-half of the increased supply that Great Britain desires. Mr. Townsend said:

"It is conceivable, of course, that we might have to cut down on consumption of one or two commodities such as cheese for brief periods."

The Townsend message was a long retreat from the Wickard alarm cry. It is a safe conjecture that now the true situation in the cheese industry has been placed before the Federal officials that there will be no more propaganda cries from the Federal Department of Agriculture for the reduction of cheese for the American table.

Nelson A. Rockefeller's Important Task

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SOL BLOOM
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

ARTICLE ON NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER'S IMPORTANT TASK, FROM THE WASHINGTON EVENING STAR OF JULY 4, 1941, BY DAVID LAWRENCE

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein the following article by David Lawrence, which appeared in the Washington Evening Star of Friday, July 4, 1941, on Nelson A. Rockefeller's important task as Coordinator of Commercial and Cultural Relations Between the American Republics:

[From the Washington Evening Star of Friday, July 4, 1941]

NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER'S IMPORTANT TASK—INTER-AMERICAN OFFICE CAN SERVE UNITED STATES WELL

(By David Lawrence)

More and more the attitude of South American countries toward the future policies of the United States is giving genuine concern. The theory that Latin America is wholly sympathetic with President Roosevelt's foreign policy is a bit outworn. European inroads into the thinking of governments to the south of us are such that the United States Government has reverted to the policy it applied during the first World War—an active educational campaign among the peoples of Central and South America with the hope of maintaining their cooperation, no matter what contingency may arise.

To carry on an educational campaign in Latin America, where Nazi agents are numerous and where newspapers and magazines are subsidized directly by Nazi funds, is a difficult task for the United States. Thus far the American Government has not resorted to such tactics. The plan rather is to make available information through legitimate channels with the hope that persons influential in the Latin-American scene will see that America's side gets a fair deal.

Certainly South America needs certain raw materials on which priorities have been established here. Financial aid for commercial transactions is also essential. Under such circumstances and with so many ramifications to the whole program, it was most natural that President Roosevelt should create an agency, now known as the Office of Inter-American Affairs, which is headed by Nelson Rockefeller.

RED TAPE MUST BE CUT

But as often happens in the case of an expanding government, the department which has hitherto handled all matters concerning external relations finds it necessary to take into account activities by other agencies of the same government which cannot operate under the strict rules of a foreign-office procedure. Red tape, for instance, has to be cut and the customary diplomatic machinery cannot be used sometimes to obtain action on various commercial matters growing out of an emergency.

For several months the problem of adjusting the office of Inter-American Affairs to the work of the State Department and its representatives abroad has been one of the challenges of the war emergency. But it can be stated that the integration of the two agencies has been accomplished, due especially to the tact and skill of Sumner Welles, Under Secretary of State, who is number one man in knowledge and background of Latin-American affairs covering the last quarter of a century.

SEPARATE STAFFS ADVISABLE

It is no criticism of our trained diplomatic officers in foreign countries to say that they are not technically familiar with all the problems growing out of attempts to improve public opinion in the countries where they reside. They are trained in the art of silences and cautious statement rather than aggressive combat against such bold and at times vicious opponents as the Nazi agents can be. The situation properly calls for a separate set of representatives who, while working with the embassies and legations, are not restricted by diplomatic etiquette in dealing with anti-American manifestations.

During the first World War, the United States Government, through the Committee on Public Information, headed by George Creel, established information centers in many foreign capitals and this proved an effective way to get the doctrines of President Wilson printed in the foreign press, to say nothing of the many tasks of counteracting attacks on the United States, which were likewise performed.

MAY OUTLAST EMERGENCY

The Office of Inter-American Affairs, which Mr. Rockefeller administers, has just received a small appropriation from Congress, which it will devote to the improvement of America's prestige abroad by educational campaigns. For the first time in many years, the United States Government formally has recognized that it was important to pay attention not only to commercial but cultural relations, and such splendid work has already been done by the hundreds of persons operating under the Office of Inter-American Affairs that it would not be at all surprising if this continued as a permanent institution long after the emergency had passed.

Mr. Rockefeller seems to have the organizing qualities which have brought to his side some able volunteers familiar with Latin American relations. His engaging personality has made him quite popular among the officials of the New Deal. The main reason is that he works night and day at the job of speaking for and to Latin American commercial and cultural interests insofar as they affect national policy here. This is something too big and far-reaching to be left as a side issue of a department which has to care for our diplomatic interests not only in Latin America but all over the world, and that's why the working arrangements between the State Department and the Office of Inter-American Affairs constitute a milestone in efficient progress.

Wire Tapping—The Rhode Island Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AIME J. FORAND
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 30, 1941

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, the 5 minutes allotted to me in general debate on last Monday, when the House was considering the Hobbs wire-tapping bill, H. R. 4228, was too short a period to permit me to do justice to my reasons for being so reluctant to support the bill. I therefore avail myself of the privilege extended to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD and submit the following, which I trust may be taken into consideration in the future when and if the Judiciary Committee again takes up the question of wire tapping.

I informed the membership of the House on Monday that:

Wire tapping to the people of my district is about as repulsive a word as anyone can pronounce. I find it very, very difficult today to decide just how I am going to vote on this bill. I believe, however, that, in view of existing circumstances, I shall vote for it. The reason I find it so difficult is because of my knowledge of some things that were done in my district in 1939, and the evidence of which can be found in the hearings held by a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce on wire tapping.

The Hobbs bill limits wire tapping to four major crimes, namely, sabotage, espionage, kidnaping, and extortion, and then only upon a certificate by the Attorney General of the United States that he has reason to believe a crime is about to be committed, is being committed, or has been committed, and limits such authority to 2 years.

To vote against this bill was, to me, to vote to give comfort and convenience to criminals whose purpose it is to sabotage our defense program and to secure information for the enemies of our country.

On the other hand, I could visualize the great amount of abuse that can be made of such powers if they should fall into the hands of unscrupulous individuals. So long as the tapping might be done strictly in accordance with the law it would be fine. I have great confidence in and respect for J. Edgar Hoover and his Federal Bureau of Investigation, as well as for the Intelligence Services of both the Army and the Navy. But, Mr. Speaker, I also realize that after men trained in such work for the Government return to private life there is no telling what they may do.

I base that last statement upon the wire-tapping episode in Rhode Island in 1939, to which I referred earlier in my remarks. In that case wire tapping was only a part of a dirty plot by conniving Republican politicians and their tools, and one of the tools was a former F. B. I. man, Lee Edward Barton.

The plot in which wire tapping was used was concocted by a small group, of which the then Governor of Rhode Island, William H. Vanderbilt, a Republican, was the head. Governor Vanderbilt had been elected to office in a campaign in which the Republican Party had spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to insure their carrying the State election. It was generally accepted that there had been some irregularity practiced by both the Republicans and the Democrats on election day.

The Republicans, however, had failed to win in the two normally Democratic cities of Central Falls and Pawtucket, although they had carried another Democratic stronghold, Woonsocket. It was then that Vanderbilt and his fellow travelers decided to investigate election frauds, gambling, and municipal corruption, as they termed it. That sounded good, but developments proved that the real purpose of the so-called investigation was to persecute those who had prevented the Republicans from capturing Central Falls and Pawtucket.

The Senate hearings reveal that active in the plot were the following characters:

Governor Vanderbilt, who paid $15,500 out of his own pocket for the investigation.

Horace L. Weller, director of business regulations of the State of Rhode Island and the Governor's lawyer in private matters.

Matthew W. Goring, a young attorney who was appointed a special assistant to Attorney General Louis V. Jackvony at the Governor's suggestion and who later admitted that he was a plant in the attorney general's office, where he snooped on his boss.

Frank B. Bielaski, of New York, operator of the Seaboard Bureau of Public Relations, the man whose secret operatives invaded the State to tap wires, make dictograph records, and eavesdrop on officials after attempts were made to ensnare them into compromising positions.

The hearings further disclose that, unbeknown to the attorney general, Bielaski sent Vincent Flanders, a New York City fireman, to string wires, and Charles J. Brown, vice president of the Morelen Electric Co., Inc., of New York, to place taps on the home telephone wires of Mayor Thomas P. McCoy, of Pawtucket, and on the telephones of Attorney General Jackvony at his home, at his private law office, and also to so cross the wires of his telephone in the attorney general's office so that the plant, Goring, could listen in on his boss.

In addition to that, Bielaski, who held conferences with Vanderbilt and Goring at the Governor's home, in Portsmouth, had six operatives in Rhode Island; Lee Barton, who had rooms in the home of Edward Freeman, near the home of Mayor McCoy to listen in on that tap, and in the home of Frank Englebrook, near the home of the attorney general, to listen in on that particular tap; Basil A. Needham, who posed as a promoter, selling agencies for Coca-Cola, but who in reality was attempting to trap the mayor and the members of the Pawtucket administration; a man named Davenport, who posed as a writer for Collier's magazine, leaving the inference that he was the well-known writer by that name, and three other agents, two unnamed and one who operated under the name of Savoy and who was protected by the State police even though they knew he was a gangster of unsavory reputation.

After Vanderbilt had decided to foot the bill for this nefarious investigation he invited Sevellon Brown, editor of the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin, into his office and told him of his plans. He inquired if these papers would care to share the expenses of it and, on a second visit to Vanderbilt, Sevellon Brown, according to the hearings, informed him that his newspapers would not do so.

The record proves, however, that the Journal and Bulletin, who are always posing as crusaders against crime, maintained complete silence on the dirty business that was being carried on by Vanderbilt and his fellow travelers, including the wire tapping, and broke their silence on the subject only after the tap on the McCoy home was discovered and Mr. Freeman had been taken in custody by the police.

At the request of his old friend, Harold Shippee, an insurance man, Freeman had rented a room in his home to Lee Barton, whom Shippee had represented as an adjuster for an insurance company. However, Freeman was arrested and charged with aiding and abetting in tapping the McCoy telephone wires. He was made to stand trial, which lasted nearly 4 weeks, and was exonerated. At no time, however, during the trial of this innocent man did Vanderbilt, Goring, or Sevellon Brown come forward to testify as to Freeman's innocence. In fact, Goring, who had been summoned as a witness, hid behind his constitutional immunity and refused to testify.

Rather than take that honorable step, these men let Freeman stand trial, and caused thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money to be spent by the United States Department of Justice in an effort to track down the perpetrators of the crime.

J. Howard McGrath, now Governor of Rhode Island, who was Federal district attorney at the time of the Freeman trial, questioned Vanderbilt on the wire tapping and the latter steadfastly denied that he knew anything about it until Mr. McGrath unearthed the evidence and showed how Vanderbilt had paid Bielaski by using a bank draft of the United States Trust Co., of New York, for a cashier's check on the Bank of Manhattan Co., with a request that that bank issue its check in a similar amount to the order of Seaboard Bureau, which is Bielaski. In another instance Goring, acting for Vanderbilt, purchased a check from the First National Bank of Boston and the First National Bank of Boston charged to the New York Trust Co. a check payable to the order of the Seaboard Bureau. On another occasion, Weller, acting for Vanderbilt, carried $3,000 in cash to Bielaski. Never were any payments made directly by Vanderbilt, who admitted these methods were used to conceal his part in the case.

Proof conclusive that all this dirty business, of which wire tapping was a part, was intended to be used against innocent persons as well as against guilty ones, if any were discovered, is shown by the following excerpts from the report filed by Bielaski with the Attorney General (see p. 272, hearings on wire tapping held by the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Commerce):

> We do not think that the questions of morality have any proper place in an investigation in corruption, but some mention of certain conditions should be of great help and guidance in dealing with certain witnesses from whom a complete confession should be secured.

Then, referring to a certain individual, the report followed:

> Bearing in mind the character of such a man, it is felt that the threat of exposure through unmasking his true relation will undoubtedly cause him to make a clean breast of all transactions with which he is familiar.

Referring to certain dictograph records that Bielaski's agents had made, the report continued:

> There are certain parts of this record which have definite significance as concerns our general investigation, but we have always felt that their particular value lies in the fact that they can be used as a club over the head of young ——— to compel him to make a complete statement.

With reference to certain young women who were not charged with violations of law, but who might be in the possession of facts because of certain connection, they continued:

> These young women must be as anxious to maintain an appearance of morality, at least, and a good name in public as the ordinary young female. It is pointed out that if it is made known to them that their conduct has been under scrutiny they may well have statements to make which may be even broader than we anticipate.

Here, Mr. Speaker, is an admission of the intent to blackmail some innocent persons in an effort to reach others that were suspected.

I am sure that for the reasons I have stated it is easy for anyone to understand why I abhor wire tapping, and I entertain the hope that if ever again the Congress has occasion to consider the subject of wire tapping it will not overlook the Rhode Island case of 1939.

Hitler and American Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 7 (legislative day of Thursday, July 3), 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. CLAUDE PEPPER, OF FLORIDA

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix an address delivered by me on July 4 last at Buffalo, N. Y., on the subject Shall Hitler Destroy Democracy in America?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Dr. Townsend, Mr. Chairman, honored and honorable citizens of America, as your friend, one who is proud to be your friend, I greet you. With you I greet your leader, whom I proudly call friend, one of America's good and great men.

As you know, I have been with you. Dr. Townsend and your leaders know I am still with you. I shall continue with you until victory crowns our just cause. You can count upon my vote, my speech, my labor.

You deserve all that you ask. In time you will get it. I congratulate you upon what you have already accomplished, for through what you have achieved, you have made a happier and a stronger America.

I am happy to have been honored by the Vice President of the United States with membership on the Senate committee to make a study of pensions in the United States. In Senator DOWNEY and me you know your cause will have a friendly and earnest hearing.

It is about that America which you love that I shall speak to you out of my heart today.

I know that as one American to other Americans, in these crucial times, on this glorious Independence Day, you would not have me speak to you other than plainly, straightforwardly, and candidly about the future of our land, to which you have so largely contributed. I want to talk to you about peace and keeping America out of war.

I accuse the Herbert Hoovers, the Charles Lindberghs, the Roy Howards, the Senator Wheelers, Senator Nyes, and the General Woods, and those working with and through the so-called America First Committee with being those who are now and have been dragging America into war and are the real warmongers.

I accuse that little group of willful men who broke the heart of Woodrow Wilson and the world, who made America repudiate the blood of her fallen sons and the hopes of man everywhere for a better world, of being the real warmongers of America.

I accuse those so-called isolationists who struck down, through prejudice, partisanship, and sometime for political profit, the hope of a lawful and orderly world, through the League of Nations and the World Court, with being the real warmongers of America.

I accuse those provincial and shortsighted Americans, calling themselves isolationists, who refused to permit America to do anything, to give anything, to risk anything to make Europe militarily or economically safe in the years following the World War, who refused to help Europe break down its trade barriers, to stabilize its currency, to have any stability in its government so that democratic institutions might survive, with being the real warmongers of America.

I accuse those who built a tariff wall around America and tried to shut this Nation off in this modern age from economic contact with the world, so that our debtors could pay us neither in money nor goods, which led to the crashing of the European money systems and the collapse of the European and Asiatic economies, with being the real warmongers of America.

I accuse those who said it was none of our business, it was none of the world's business, when Japan started modern international brigandage by invading Manchuria in 1931, with being the real warmongers of America.

I accuse those who again in the name of isolation opposed this country and the civilized nations of the world stopping the next recurrence of international brigandage, when Mussolini invaded Ethiopia in 1935, with being the real warmongers of America.

I accuse those who, in the name of isolation, opposed this country doing anything to stop Hitler when he repudiated the Versailles Treaty; when he reestablished conscription and turned Germany into an armed camp for the purposes of aggression; when he took advantage of the world dissension, of Italy's unprovoked assault on Ethiopia, and invaded the Rhineland; when Hitler led the experiment in modern war and in modern knavery by flagrantly and unashamedly sending his so-called volunteers and arms into the Spanish civil war; when in 1938 he, profiting by Mussolini's assault on Ethiopia and Japan's unprovoked attack upon China, marched into Austria; when he mutilated and murdered courageous little Czechoslovakia; and when he finally, in 1939, let loose the dragons of this world-consuming war, with being the real warmongers of America.

I accuse those who denounced as a meddler and a warmonger President Roosevelt when he, seeing the hideous assault which Hitler was getting ready to loose upon the earth, the dread disease of war with which he was about to scourge the earth with another bubonic plague, called out to the American people, to the peace-loving peoples of the world, to cooperate in quarantining such a menace to the world safety, with being the real warmongers of America.

I accuse those who in 1935, in 1937, in 1938 opposed or failed to assist in building up America's land, air, and naval forces for America's defense, and to make her sentiments felt in the councils of the world, with being the real warmongers of America.

I accuse those who for 9 long months delayed the repeal of the arms embargo, and therefore by giving him reason to believe that we would not under any circumstances furnish implements of war to Britain, if he attacked her, encouraged Hitler to start this war in 1939, and delayed for 9 months the starting of our own war industries upon a large scale, with being the real warmongers of America.

I accuse those who in 1940 opposed the selective-service law and the training of America's men to defend America, and to make the world respect America and what we stood for, with being the real warmongers of America.

I accuse those who in 1941 delayed and obstructed the passage of the lease-lend bill and thereby delayed and since then have obstructed material aid to those fighting against Hitler, with being those who have dragged America closer and closer to the brink of war, and are the real warmongers of America.

Today two of the Senators who have been loudest in their charges of "warmonger," "interventionist," "bloodthirstiness" against Roosevelt and some of us who have tried to help Roosevelt to defend America in this crisis have been my friends, Senators WHEELER and NYE. These Americans have claimed the right to be the champions of peace, and everybody who differs with their method of keeping the peace they have denounced with all the epithets at the command of their eloquence and their fervor. In every nook and cranny in the country, on the radio, the platform, and in the press they have cried out to the people of America their warnings against Roosevelt as the real menace to the people of America. All America, to hear these able gentlemen speak, needed to do was to follow their counsel, to take their advice and America would be happy, prosperous, and peaceful. It is only fair, therefore, that the counsel they have been giving their country, the course they followed to defend America should be known and observed; then the people can determine, as in a democracy they have the right, yes, the duty to determine, whose counsel they, the people, shall follow.

In 1935 there was before the Senate on the 24th of May the appropriations bill to provide the funds—almost half a billion dollars—to start America's naval rebuilding program so as to give America a Navy which could defend her shores against an attack in either ocean.

Against that appropriation bill, H. R. 7672, Senator WHEELER and Senator NYE voted "No."

On March 8, 1935, there was before the Senate a bill providing funds for the War Department to increase the armed strength of America to defend America.

Senator WHEELER did not vote, but Senator NYE voted "No," saying at the time, as reason for his opposition: "We find ourselves engaged in mapping a larger program in preparation for war than civilization ever before knew in peacetime."

On the 11th of August in 1937 there was before the Senate S. 1567 to aid the national defense by preventing the exportation of helium gas, which Germany was very anxious to get, and the conservation of that critical material for the defense of the United States.

On that bill Senator WHEELER did not vote. Senator NYE voted "No."

On May 3, 1938, there was before the Senate a bill to increase by 23 percent the size of the United States Navy—the real beginning of the two-ocean Navy for the defense of America.

On that bill Senator WHEELER did not vote, but Senator NYE voted "No."

On March 6, 1939, there was before the Senate an amendment providing for the manufacture of 6,000 airplanes for the United States Army. This amendment was submitted by the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate.

On this amendment Senator WHEELER and Senator NYE voted "No."

In the early part of 1939, seeing the clouds of war gathering over Europe and shifting to the horizon of every nation on the earth; seeing that Hitler was relying upon Britain and the other nations of Europe being unprepared for his gigantic assault; seeing that one of the things upon which Hitler relied particularly was the Arms Embargo Act which forbade this country to sell war materials to any nation engaging in war, and that the effect of that law was to help Hitler and hurt his enemies, President Roosevelt proposed to the Congress that this Government be permitted to sell, for cash, to belligerent nations war materials, such materials to be carried by those countries on their own ships. For weeks, for months, Senator WHEELER and Senator NYE were among those who delayed and obstructed this lifting of the embargo.

History will say that it was the defeat in the Senate of this recommendation of President Roosevelt that led Hitler to believe that the isolationist sentiment was so strong in this country that we would not help any country he attacked, that led Hitler, in September of that year, to unloose the dogs of war upon the world.

After Hitler had begun his march toward the conquest of the world in September, the President called a special session of Congress and renewed his recommendation that this Government, upon the principles of cash and carry, be permitted to sell our materials to those who were the pathetic victims of Hitler's murderous assault.

Again came weeks of debate, which Senators WHEELER and NYE lead, crying out against President Roosevelt—calling him and all who supported him warmongers and interventionists. Finally, the vote came, November 3, 1939—9 months after President Roosevelt had recommended this legislation—9 months in which American factories might have been established and put into operation—9 months in which to build up in the hands of those who stood against Hitler weapons of defense; and Senators WHEELER and NYE voted "No."

In 1940, with Hitler's iron heel on the neck of a prostrate Europe, his sword raised over the head of Britain, the Balkans, and the Near East, his hungry eyes roving the oceans and the lands of the earth for new conquests, his spies, saboteurs, and "fifth columnists" burrowing like moles in North America, Central America, and South America, with it clear to any unclouded vision that he aimed at nothing else than to follow the glamorous role of Alexander and Caesar to the conquest of the world, President Roosevelt, taking his own political future in his hands to do so, but confident of the response of a patriotic people, proposed to the mothers and fathers of America, through their Congress, that they send their sons to the training camps to defend America upon the democratic principle of selective service.

More protracted and impassioned debate, led by Senator WHEELER and Senator NYE.

Typical of the method Senator WHEELER employed in this attack is the following statement on page 15681 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, made August 13, 1940, while speaking on the selective-service bill: "Enact peacetime conscription and no longer will this be a free land, no longer will a citizen be able to say that he disagrees with a governmental proclamation or edict. Hushed whispers will replace free speech, secret meetings in dark places will supplant free assemblage; labor and industry, men and women, will be shackled by the chains they have themselves forged."

You know whether or not this prophecy of Senator WHEELER has come true.

Finally the vote came, on September 14, 1940, and Senator WHEELER voted "No" while Senator NYE did not vote.

It might be added that on the 27th of October of 1939, on page 973 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, after Hitler had conquered Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland, and his restless armies were waiting for the signal to dash over the whole of Europe, Senator WHEELER said, "I do not believe there is any crisis, and I do not think the talk about there being a crisis in the United States should be permitted to go out to the general public." You know whether that prophecy has been true.

In 1941, after Britain had borne the brunt of Hitler's assault for a year and a half, after she had used every available dollar of American exchange she possessed, and pledged to American manufacturers of war materials every dollar's worth of investment in any kind of property which any British subject had in the United States, and when she was approaching the time when she could not continue to buy and pay cash, at good prices, for war materials produced in the United States, Britain appealed to the United States for help in getting the materials by which she could hold off Hitler's vicious assault.

President Roosevelt, trying to save the blood of America's men, trying to keep this country out of war, hating war, as he has ever said, but knowing that the only way to keep Hitler and war in Europe and out of America was to keep the British Fleet around Hitler, to keep the Royal Air Force bruising his cruel head, to keep the British Empire with its brave face toward him, called upon the Congress for the passage of the lease-lend bill.

This bill was not to help Britain or Greece or China or Yugoslavia or Russia or anybody else; it was to protect and defend America; it was to save America's men with America's materials; it was to lay a barrier of ships and guns and airplanes between Hitler's ships and guns and airplanes and us, and to do so while there were brave men, supported by braver women, in some liberty-loving lands of the earth left to plead for the chance to man those ships and guns and planes from America.

Yet Senator Wheeler, Senator Nye, Colonel Lindbergh, ex-President Hoover, all this alliance who are the real warmongers of America, rushed to the platform, to the radio, to the columns of the press, to charge Roosevelt and those who stood by him, including the overwhelming majority of the American people, with trying to spill the blood of America, with being warmongers and interventionists—deceiving the people with false issues and false claims.

The wisdom, the courage of America prevailed, and on the 8th of March the lease-lend bill was passed by the American people's Congress, but Senators WHEELER and NYE voted "No."

Who has been the better defender of America—Roosevelt, who tried to stifle the beginning of Hitler's war and called upon others to help him from 1935 up until the very day when the war actually began, or the Wheelers, the Nyes, the Lindberghs, the Hoovers, and other Roosevelt critics, who struck down Roosevelt's hand with their criticism every time he dared to raise it in that holy cause of peace?

Who has been the better defender of America—Roosevelt, who began in 1935 to build a greater Navy to lie around American shores, or Senator WHEELER and Senator NYE, who opposed him?

Who has been the better defender of America—Roosevelt, who in 1939 tried to build a greater air force for America, or Senator WHEELER and Senator NYE, who opposed him?

Who has been the better defender of America—Roosevelt, who tried to put weapons in the hands of those who stood between Hitler and us, or Senators WHEELER and NYE and their allies, who opposed him?

Who has been the better defender of America—Roosevelt, who, after Dunkirk, when Britain was absolutely stripped of guns and shells for her own defense, let her have these guns and shells from our old war stocks, or the Wheelers and the Nyes and their allies, who denounced him for it?

Who has been the better defender of America—Roosevelt, who, when the battle of the Atlantic and Hitler's assassinating submarines had shrunken Britain's hard-pressed Navy, had let Britain have 50 old but reconditioned American destroyers, and got in return therefor naval bases to screen the eastern coast of America and the Panama Canal, or the Wheelers and the Nyes and their allies, who denounced him for it?

Where would America be today if she had followed the counsel of these critics, instead of the leadership of her President, who has dedicated his life to keeping both Hitler and war from our fair land?

Now, this alliance, masquerading behind a slogan which says, "America first," and means "America last" has found a new red herring to drag across the course of American public opinion—Russia. Their eloquent voices, their fervid passion, they have turned upon the people of America, seeking to divide them with hate, prejudice, and confusion. They would deceive the people about the real issue and play with their skilled hands upon whatever credulity they may find. They would have the people of America help Hitler by refusing to help Hitler's enemies. They would pretend that all those who oppose Hitler approve of Hitler's enemies. They would arouse the church and all those whom Russia has wronged, but they say nothing about Hitler, who has denounced God, desecrated the church, persecuted the ministry, ostracized Christ as a contemptible Jew, and by state decree, endeavored to break down the sacred vows of the home and make Germany's unmarried daughters produce cannon fodder for Hitler's conquest of the world.

I AM GLAD RUSSIA HAS GOT IN HITLER'S WAY

Who does not know of a case where the state has welcomed the aid of any criminal who would turn state's evidence to convict any worse criminal? Who has not seen in the forest a fire built to stop a fire?

Who does not see that Russia is not way across the Atlantic, beyond Europe, on the other side of the Urals? It is here—just off the coast of Alaska, its fortifications in sight of Alaska. If Hitler conquers Russia, he will be out of Europe. He will have escaped those alert British ships. He will have slipped out from under that heroic Royal Air Force. He will not have to cross the Pacific. He will be in what are now Russian fortifications; his greedy eyes every day gazing upon the rising sun, which discloses to him the wealth and the glory of our continent and country. When he shall clasp the bloody hand of his ally, Japan, they will tower above the Western Pacific and dominate the whole East, China, India, the Near East, and shortly thereafter Africa—Dakar. Then when their submarines, their raiders, their bombers shall lie within 1,600 miles of Brazil and within 3 miles of Alaska, America will have at last sadly achieved, through Hitler encirclement, the isolation which Senator WHEELER and others so eloquently seek.

I challenge these pretenders to the throne of peace for America to tell America at what price they want peace.

When the braggart of the Mediterranean drove his dagger in France's back, he proclaimed to the world:

"The hour of destiny has arrived for our Fatherland. We are going to war against the decrepit democracies."

"This revolution," he contended, "asserts itself against those who control the riches of the earth.

"It is a struggle of one century against another."

Continuing, he shouted: "This gigantic struggle is only a phase in the development of our revolution. This asserts itself against the stranglers, the rich nations. It is a struggle between young and progressive people as against the decadent people, the struggle of one century as against another century. The dies are now cast."

Listen to Hitler: "Two worlds are in conflict. Two philosophies of life. One of these two worlds must break asunder."

It is well known that the Nazi soldiers' marching song is Today We Own Europe, Tomorrow the Whole World.

Listen to these words from Carl Houshofer, one of Hitler's braintrusters, President of the Geopolitical Institute at Munich:

"A strong determined army of occupation under dynamic National-Socialist command can be recruited overnight in certain parts of the United States. The job of taking over North America will be comparatively simple."

Do you remember what Goering said in 1931, talking about America: "Absolutely unsuspecting people, whom we can fool more easily than any other nation. We will defeat Britain in the next war before the Americans realize that their only protection is gone."

Do these critics tell you these words from Dr. Goebbels:

"We don't worry about America. No military expedition is needed to subdue the United States and teach her humility."

Let these words from Hitler burn into your consciousness, go with you in your sleep:

"Latin America—we shall create a new Germany there. We have a right to this continent. * * * We require two movements abroad, a royal and a revolutionary one. Do you think that is so difficult? I think we are capable of it. We should not be here otherwise.

"We shall not land troops like William the Conqueror and gain Brazil by the strength of arms. Our weapons are not visible ones. It will be a simple matter for me to produce unrest and revolts in the United States so that these gentry will have their hands full with their own affairs. We shall soon have storm troopers in America. * * * We shall have men whom degenerate Yankeedom will not be able to challenge."

Oh, people of America, what can awaken you to your danger? What whipcrack of warning can arouse you until this Nation shall throb with alertness, work, and prayer?

Has America lost the American dream?

Has America's heart become callous, insensible to wrong? Has courage been chased out of the American heart by cowardice? Are America's leaders no longer those long-visioned statesmen of an earlier day?

When God's people and God's Son are assaulted by pharisaical dictators, can they find no defense in America which God has so bountifully blessed?

When men talk of a better world, wherein people shall live happier and fuller lives, free from the torture of want and the shackles of poverty, wherein the mind shall break all prison walls and reach to the peak of the sky and the heart of the earth and to the end of space, wherein the soul, refreshed by the cool waters of overflowing fountains of the spirit, shall soar like birds outrunning sight, beyond time and distance, can they find no America to say "God speed your effort. I will help"?

Greatness carries with it terrific responsibility. You cannot escape it, my fellow Americans, what you think shall determine the kind of a world it is to be. God has a destiny for America. All these long years he has made us what we are. It is now America's time to keep her rendezvous with destiny. By timely and courageous action to keep war out of America I believe—I swear I believe—that America cannot only save the world but her own sons. Every passing day in which we delay cuts down our chance to save either America or America's sons.

God will continue to bless America with peace if we continue to deserve peace.

Pius Louis Schwert

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. PIUS LOUIS SCHWERT, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, Congressman PIUS LOUIS SCHWERT did not serve in this body long, and as a result there are not many of you who had occasion to come into contact with him and learn to admire his personality as I did.

Representing the city of Buffalo, having previously served as the county clerk of Erie County, he came to us with very little experience in national politics, and, like all new Members of Congress, was obliged to lean on his older colleagues "to learn the ropes." I take great pride in the fact that I was able to guide him during the few years that he graced Congress with his presence.

Congressman SCHWERT is no more. His genial smile and pleasant personality has been forever removed from this Hall, and he has gone to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler ever returns. He will be remembered, however, and I am sure that the people of the city of Buffalo and the State of New York will always miss his unselfish services and the charm of his personality.

What Is the Situation in the World Today, and What Is Our Relationship to That Situation?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARY T. NORTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

ADDRESS OF MRS. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt in the St. Paul Auditorium, St. Paul, Minn., June 7, 1941:

I am very happy to be here in St. Paul tonight and to have an opportunity to speak to you all on the subject which must be of interest to every citizen in this country. What is the situation in the world today, and what is our relationship to that situation?

First, I would like to say that since arriving here this afternoon I have had a number of letters and one or two telegrams daring me to state their contents and read them. One or two of them I am going to mention to you later on, but I would like to say at the start that it is a perfectly natural thing when people in a free country are discussing points of view that there should be different points of view in many parts of their country.

You are a great audience, and you have listened to many other points of view. I am quite sure that whether you agree with me or whether you don't agree with me you will be willing to listen and tell me later in the question period of your disagreement.

And now we come to the consideration of what is our position today in the world. Most of the world is at war. We, very fortunately, are at peace. That means that our responsibility is probably greater than the responsibility of any other nation, and because we are a great democracy it cannot be the responsibility of any one man. It is the responsibility of every individual in a democracy.

Before we can really look at the situation that we are in today we must look back a little bit, because, while there is little value in looking back, you must know the background sometimes to understand the present, and it is valuable to look back if you are going to learn from what you find of facts in the past. Therefore, I think it is well for us to look back some twenty-odd years to another period of war.

It was a very different kind of war from what war is today. It was a war, perhaps, for different reasons, because in Europe at that time there were economic stresses at various points. There was an age-old tradition of the balance of power to be kept in Europe, and when that war was over there was a peace conference, and at that peace conference probably the only nation that was entirely disinterested was the United States.

Now many people today are wondering just why it was that we ever went into that war. I was in Washington then, and I remember a good deal about it. Underlying any action of any government there are always various reasons, and you have heard and I have heard that there were interests held by people who had money invested in different things abroad that were supposed to have forced us into that war. I think that is probably true of some interests, because at that time and in a number of years that followed the war the Government of our country even was much more under the control of financial interests of this country than it is today.

Then there were some people who went into that war entirely because they believed that there was righteousness on one side that they had to uphold. One of the people who felt that way very strongly was Theodore Roosevelt, who at that time was no longer a young man, but I remember very well when he came to Washington and tried to go into the war in active service.

The Army did not want him, but he did it because he really thought there was something at stake from a moral and spiritual standpoint. I know that, because I heard what he said not only to my own brother, who went into the service with his son, Quentin, but to all his sons. And there were many, many men who went into that war because they felt that something called democracy, which was important to them, was at stake, and they hoped above all that it was a war to end war.

And then there came a peace conference and a curious reaction in many countries. We weren't the only country that was tired of war. A lot of other countries were tired of war, too, and they felt just the way we felt, and they had made greater sacrifices in human lives than we had made, and also they had lost more materially than we had lost. Therefore they felt even more strongly than we did that they wanted to go back to their private business and look after the things that had been let slide in the time of war.

War has one thing about it which Theodore Roosevelt used to emphasize: It makes people rise to sacrifices. They do it willingly because something bigger than themselves is at stake.

But, once it is over, the reaction sets in. It set in in those countries, and they turned right straight back to the old political leadership and the old political intrigues, and the people who had interests in business went back to their business interests, and so did we. And each of us had so many similar experiences, and this is the part of the story I think we sometimes forget. In every one of those countries the economic situation was very bad.

They had a depression, and it was a bad depression before we began to have it. We had a period of wild prosperity, and then suddenly some parts of our country began to have a little less prosperity. We began to hear murmurs from the farming parts of our country. People were mortgaging their farms, and they were losing their farms and their homes. But in other parts of the country, the industrial parts, for a while the wild orgy of prosperity went on. Suddenly, because we had hardship in one part of the country, it began to react on all the country, and we had no longer any prosperity. We were suddenly like the other countries of the world in the depths of a depression.

Now that is something I want you to think about, because it is something perhaps we can learn from. First, the other countries of the world felt the results of a war. A long period of destruction was a contributing factor to this financial depression, but they also felt something that had been going on before the war actually—the result of a changing period in industry, a period where machinery was displacing human beings.

That has happened before, and always it brings us a period of great difficulty, and we have not as yet learned how to meet it. We have learned this lesson before—we probably will again—but here it was added to the results of a long-drawn-out war, and it hit the countries that lost the most in human life first. Just as here in our own country, we couldn't prosper with one part sick and the other part well. So we eventually went down because we couldn't get on in a world where all of us were not prospering. When the rest of the world was sick, we as a nation couldn't get on, either, because we felt the results of what was happening in the rest of the world.

That is a lesson of the past 20 years that we must study. There is no use in studying history unless you recognize the facts of history and learn something from them. Now, it seems to me that these are facts that we must not forget, because they mean something to us.

We thought at the end of the last war that we could go home and attend to our business and let the rest of the world "go hang." We were sure we could prosper, and we learned we couldn't, and we learned twenty-odd years later that we were facing practically the same difficulties that we faced some twenty-odd years ago.

Now, that is something for us to think about. That is the condition that we must face in the world today. Now, what is our relationship to that condition? You know people, human beings, have to have a life that is worth living for. If they haven't, they don't much care what they do, and they become fairly reckless. They are willing to try anything if life isn't worth while, and, therefore, anyone who has a story to tell, something that gives them a hope, a new idea, that person can get a following. And that is just what happened in Europe.

The most miserable country became for a short time a democracy and then lost its democracy, and it followed someone who offered them a new solution. And because they were told that if they sacrificed, if they disciplined themselves, they could dominate the world, they were ready to listen. It couldn't be any worse than it was; it might be better. And to believe that you are a people that the Lord has directed to dominate the world is a pretty extraordinary thing to believe about your race. And so it is perhaps not so astonishing that they followed someone who would give them that particular thing to hold on to. You will cling to a hope of any kind if it is glamorous and you are miserable.

Well, that leader has continued to make that people believe that they could dominate the world, and even though he has said that he did not begin the war, that the war was begun by Great Britain, it is interesting to note that Austria and Czechoslovakia had lost their freedom before anyone else was on the warpath. And even as each nation was told by this leader that he had no further desire for aggression, the words were hardly out of his mouth when a new country found its freedom gone.

Poland fell, Finland, Denmark, Norway, Belgium, Holland, France, and now quite a number of others—that's quite a roster. And always beforehand there was the same pattern, no desire to acquire any more territory; no desire for aggression. And if you read the statements made by this same gentleman to Mr. Cudahy the other day, you will note that he stated that he had never been guilty of aggression, and that it was ridiculous to even think that he would ever dream of attacking the United States. How could such a thing be possible?

Well, I don't know whether it is possible. I only know that when that gentleman says that it isn't possible it makes one stop and think, because those are the words he has used rather often.

Now, the world has changed a great deal since that other war twenty-odd years ago, and war itself has changed a great deal. It isn't a war of great armies facing each other today. It is a war of navies, of airplanes, of mechanization, tanks, and guns. Armies, yes, but without the other things they are not very much use.

And then, back of everything else, it is a war of peoples, a war of morale of the citizens in their own homes. Who can stand up the longest against anxiety and death coming unexpectedly from the skies and loss of the things that you have lived with and known around you? Who can stoically accept this new kind of war? Today it is a war of the morale of peoples as well as a war of the military organizations of nations.

Now, I don't believe that the people of any of these nations, not even that particularly unhappy German Nation, really wanted to go to war. I think they accepted it because there wasn't really anything else to do, and I think that is so of every single one of the other nations. They defended themselves when they could, submitted when they had to, because there was no alternative but extinction.

No one in their sane mind wants to go to war. That is one of the things I was told to ask you tonight: "Do you want to go to war?" I think it is a stupid question, because I can't imagine any people in their sane senses wanting to go to war. Just the same, a lot of people that haven't wanted to go to war have met war in their country, and that is the question which is before us, and here comes again our relationship to the world situation today.

Where does the defense of a nation begin? Now, the President has said in the past, and I think he would say it again, that we want nothing from any other nation; that we only want to defend our own country.

It is open, however, for discussion as to what is the defense of your country, and that is where we must again think, and think a little bit further than the ends of our noses, because if you wait until war comes to you in your own country—that's what Denmark and Norway and Finland and all the other countries did—you may find you have waited too long for effective defense. There is something to be said today for listening to what the experts who study modern warfare have to say on this subject.

There is a great deal written by people in magazines and press articles on these subjects, but they are not all students and experts. There are many new things that are known today that we didn't know 6 months ago, and we know them because of the experience of other people. I will give you a good example:

I was in an airplane factory not long ago, and I saw some planes there and I asked what they were doing and they said, "Oh, they have come back to have the new tanks put in." A new invention to meet new needs.

Now it is all very well to read what all kinds of people say, but in our situation, in our relationship to the rest of the world I think we had better have in mind the fact that there are people who study the situation carefully, and we had better trust in these people rather than in those who think they know, but who may not have the opportunity to know all there is to know about our relationship to the present situation.

I think that in view of the facts that we have before us today there are many things that we ought to consider. We must clarify in our minds first of all what we think constitutes the defense of our country. Is it to wait within our shores until we are attacked, or is it to prevent if possible the opportunity of any country to obtain a footing which may endanger our safety in the future?

Now it is not only the military point of view that we have to consider because, after all, this military business, as I told you, is a business for experts. We can't know all the things that are going on in the war field today; neither can we know just exactly what production we have or how quickly it is growing. I am told that we are doing much better than we did before the previous World War even when we were in it, but I have no way of checking on that. You have no way of checking that. The newspapers have no way. I can only tell you that I asked my husband if he had a way, and he said he had just acquired a private statistician to try and find out just exactly what was happening. So on the technical military things we will have to take for granted that there are people who really have the interests of the country at heart and whose job it is to work on them.

There are other things, however, that we have to consider, and which I think we can all understand. What would happen if there was a Hitler victory in Europe? Quite aside from the military angle of it and from possible attack on South America or on ourselves, what would happen if there was a Hitler victory in Europe which would affect us?

We are being told every day that what we are being asked to do is to help Great Britain. Now, I am always interested in that, because I have an idea that no nation in this world has ever shown itself so unselfish and so disinterested that it helps another equally large nation without any self-interest being involved. So when that is said I at once begin to wonder just why we would, out of the kindness of our hearts, help Great Britain.

For a long while I have had people say to me, "Well, the British owe us money. Other nations owe us money. Why should we bother with Great Britain?" Why, indeed? The only reason we bothered about them in the last few years was that we needed their trade. Now, they tell you that all we have to do is use a little ingenuity and we could live to ourselves alone. Well, we haven't been able to do it in the past twenty-odd years or more.

When we don't sell our cotton, for instance, what happens? That little balance of trade is what gives us the chance to keep our prices up at home and to give us a higher standard of living than obtains today in any other country in the world. We heard at lunch today about the poverty of certain agricultural workers in Chile.

Now, I know just what the difficulties and the sore spots are in every part of our country, and heaven knows we have plenty. I know a lot of things I'd like to see changed. I know a lot of things that I don't think should exist in a real democracy. But I am going to give you one indication of the difference in our standard of living and the standard of living anywhere else in the world.

Since the war I have been asked to "adopt," or rather, just help to support orphans in other countries. I have at present a Chinese orphan that costs me $20 a year. Twenty dollars a year will feed a child in China today. I have a Polish orphan, a Finnish orphan, an English orphan, and I had a Spanish orphan. This last child has disappeared since they took them out of France back into Spain, so I haven't got that child any more. All those children require $10 a month apiece to feed and support them. Having those children, I decided that I should have an American orphan. I pay for my American child $6 a week. There is your difference in standard of living and what it costs to really do a thing in the most economical way possible because orphans aren't extravagant. They are supported on a restricted standard anywhere in the world.

Now, I want to point the moral to my tale by saying that I don't think when they come to us and say that we must help Great Britain that we are actuated by any desire just to be kind to Great Britain. We thought it over very carefully, and we decided that in the past we needed trade. In the future we were going to need trade.

We knew what freedom of the seas meant to trade under Great Britain's control of the sea. We could imagine what no freedom of the seas would mean if Hitler controlled the seas. Another thing to think about—we are not just being kind to Great Britain. Nations are selfish. I wish we were more intelligently selfish and looked far enough ahead to realize that somewhere along the line there has got to come a time when we will realize that the real good of our race, as well as the good of the rest of the world, depends in the future on cooperation. Selfishness—intelligent selfishness—may lie in thinking about what is good for the whole world, not just what is good for the United States of America.

However, at the moment, I think our relationship to the world situation is perhaps not yet quite prepared for that point of view. We have taken the point of view, however, that it is better for us, as a nation, to aid Great Britain, first of all, because we think about this question of future trade; and, second, because of the foreign economic situation which a Hitler victory will bring to us.

Now, this is no imaginary situation. This is very easy to forecast. Leaving the military thing out of it completely, they tell us, Why should you be afraid of competition with Germany when you have always had to compete with Great Britain? Well, I am not afraid of competition with any country, if it is fair and open competition. We had the intelligence to have the edge on almost any other country, but competition with a Hitler-organized Europe wouldn't be fair and open competition because a great area would be practically slave labor, and a great part of the skilled working group would be just as skilled as any working group we have in this country. It would also have the same advantages of advanced machinery and industrial plants which we have.

Shipyards, machine shops, and all the things that we have, besides a reservoir to draw from in Africa similar to what we have in South America. A population, if you take the whole of Europe and Africa and add in Japan—because Japan probably would be in the combination—of between four hundred and fifty and five hundred million people. Now, that is a sum in arithmetic which we want to remember.

If we had the United States, plus Canada and South America, which would have to be like Africa, a country which you draw on not for skilled labor but for raw materials, we would have between one hundred and seventy-five and one hundred and eighty-five million people. That is a sum in arithmetic that is worth remembering. Four hundred and fifty to five hundred million people on one side and a hundred and seventy-five million to one hundred and eighty-five million on the other.

So I think it is quite clearly the part of self-interest to try to prevent a Hitler victory over the whole of Europe. Those are all, I think, very simple considerations which in thinking about the position of the world and our relationship to it we have to face as a battleground. That takes care of the reasons why we face certain situations today.

It gives us a reason for our military preparation; it gives us a reason for our belief that it is well to help Great Britain while she fights, if we possibly can. It gives us a reason to consider where the defense of America begins, and I think that is something we must consider.

No President, I don't care who he is, wants to send his people to war. No President takes that responsibility without consulting his people, without trying to get the feeling of what his people believe is right and what they believe is in their interest. Therefore, it is an obligation on the people of a democracy to really look at the whole picture. I know you can't be military experts; I know I can't be, but it is possible to try to know and to understand the facts of a situation. It is possible to face what you can do and what it is up to you to do.

I think that it is up to us to make up our minds not only as to what our obligation is to defend our country but what our obligation is at home to make our country worth defending. While we are not at war we have that obligation which we cannot escape. Once you are in a war there is only one thing you can think about, and that is winning the war, because there is nothing else you can do until peace returns.

So every one of us has the obligation to study their own country, their own community, and realize their individual obligation to see that their community has everything possible done to make it a place worth living in. If we could do that over this country in every community, we would really see the progress which democracy must mean.

Our forefathers laid down a principle. They said we had a right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We have a right to it, yes; but it depends on every one of us on what we do with our citizenship, on what we are willing, all of us, to put into the common pot in cooperating together to make that possible for every individual citizen in our own communities. There is no use fooling ourselves. There are many people in this country who either because of race or religion or economic conditions do not enjoy either liberty or the opportunity to pursue happiness.

Now it is up to every single one of us in our own community to try to make our democracy move forward. Only as we do that have we the slightest chance to say to the rest of the world, "This is what we offer you. This is what gives people a chance."

I can't answer the boy who wrote to me the other day and said, "I don't know why I should fight for democracy. I am a strong, healthy boy, and I have had 2 years of unemployment. Now I have got a job at $15 a week making materials to kill some other kids that I don't know somewhere else in the world, and I don't think it is worth it." Well, I don't think it is worth it either.

I think we have only one thing that we can say to youngsters who have been through that, and that is this: At least in our country we as individuals have a chance to vote for our representatives and to see that they really do the things we want; to remove them if they don't. At least here it lies with us as individuals—not with any one person or a thing called a state, but with us as individuals—to take our part in the Government. Even that kid had his vote, and therefore he had the hope that some day he might join with all the other people in this country who care about what happens to human beings to make this country really meet their needs. You can't do it by standing still. Democracy is something that must move forward. It is not just a government—it is a way of life—and our representative has got to see that every individual citizen senses this personal responsibility. Only that way can you actually say we have something worth defending—a country that is growing in a realization of its obligations to all the citizens, to every human being; a country that is finding more and more that it is one great, unified nation.

We come from all the nations of the world. We have no reason for being a nation because of a geographical boundary, because of a racial background. The thing that makes us a nation is an ideal, and to that ideal we have given our devotion and our belief, our adherence, our work. We have learned to play together, to live together, and it is because we have learned that that I can't help having a feeling that now that the time has come for us to defend this idea that we are going to do it all of us together; that we are going to believe that it is worth defending. We have made a nation that is worth defending because it is growing; and if people will believe that, they will do everything they can for that defense.

We are going to be asked to take part in a program of civilian defense. That will mean something for every man and woman to do at home, to do for the defense of the country. It may not all be very spectacular, because the spectacular things do not come when a nation is at peace

Someone asked me the other day if all of the women were going to do the same things that were being done in England, and I said "Thank God, they don't have to at present." We can do things now that will make our country and community better places to live in, and they will be really definite things to do. They will deal with better nutrition; they will deal with more recreation for our youngsters; they will deal with better educational measures.

Yes; if you want to learn to drive ambulances, if you want to learn what you do in case of black-outs and bombings—well, it is a good thing to learn, but for the moment it isn't your obligation. You can go to the Red Cross, which offers you all kinds of training, valuable training both now and in case of need. You can go to the United Service Organizations and do definite work for them, helping in many ways to make life better for the boys moving to camps for training. There are any number of things that men and women will do besides the military things in their communities.

Then you have got here in this country one more responsibility. You have got to think what kind of a world you want to help build when peace does come. You have got to build in yourselves now the kind of character and the kind of fortitude which meets whatever comes and is able to cope with it once you have made up your mind as to the position that you take in the present situation. But no matter what your position is, you know that some day there will be peace in the world.

It may be the kind of a world in which you will have nothing to say, but if it is the kind of a world in which you can have something to say, then you have got to feel the responsibility of thinking very clearly how you want your influence to be brought to bear in making it impossible to repeat the mistakes that were made after the last war. We don't want to go to war every 20 or 30 years and live miserably in between. Let us think what we want to do in the world of the future.

Do you really want a world disarmament? Do you really want to sit down around a table and discuss a world economy in which you perhaps have to sacrifice something so that other people in the world may eat, too? That is a new thing for us to be thinking about. That is that unselfish selfishness that I was talking about. Something like that has got to be thought about if we are going to ever do away with war.

Some people say it can't be done, but, anyway, we have got to be thinking about it if we are going to try to do it. And no other nation can think as we think. No other nation is free to think as we are free to think. No other nation is free to discuss as we are free to discuss. No other nation today has the prosperity even to think that they will be able to help build a world in the future. Now, that makes for us a grave responsibility, so grave that sometimes I think you must go to bed at night and wonder whether you are worthy of the responsibility that is yours today in being a citizen in this country. I go to bed night after night wondering if there is anything that I could do to help bear the burdens of the decisions that we as individual citizens have to be making in the next few years if we are going to be worthy of trying to bring a permanent peace to the world.

It is something, I think, that you and I and every other citizen of this country should pray daily to be given grace so that we may have wisdom, may have courage, may have fortitude to meet our responsibilities, to be grateful for the things that are ours, and to hope that some day we may bring to all the people of our Nation a realization that was the dream of our forefathers.

Wheat Marketing Quota Program

REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, most Members of Congress from wheat-growing sections are recipients of many wires and telegrams from their farmer constituents protesting against the marketing quota program and particularly against the penalty of 49 cents per bushel which has been imposed upon the sale of excess quota wheat. I do not care to go into a discussion of the penalty provisions at this time except to say that I do not favor their repeal. If we are going to have artificial price fixing for wheat based upon Government loans higher than the market, it must be accompanied by the control of production or marketing, or both. Otherwise, the history of the Farm Board will be repeated. The imposition of the 49-cent penalty on the sale of wheat is not intended to be a revenue-raising measure. It is not intended as a fine on the noncooperator. Its purpose is to keep surplus wheat off the market until it can be absorbed without depressing the price. If the penalties go then I think the loans will have to go also.

However, I am much impressed with the justice of many of the complaints which are coming in relative to the administration of the quota provisions. I think a great deal of trouble can be avoided by some simple changes in the regulations. For instance, the regulations define "acreage of wheat" as seeded acreage rather than harvested acreage. Let us see what this means in actual practice. Here is a farmer who had an allotment of 50 acres. He plants 75; 50 acres are winter-killed; 25 acres are harvested. In other words, instead of producing over his allotment, the farmer actually harvested half of his allotment. He in no way contributed to the surplus. Is there any reason why he should not be permitted to sell all of the wheat from his 25 harvested acres without paying a penalty? Those in charge of the wheat program of the A. A. A. seem to think that there is. They say that before he can sell a bushel he will have to pay a penalty of 49 cents a bushel on the normal production of his seeded excess of 25 acres or come to the county committee and assume the burden of proving his actual production on the entire 75 acres. Even in that case he will have to pay a penalty of 49 cents per bushel on one-third of his proven production before he can sell as much as a bushel.

To me this seems an unreasonable and arbitrary ruling. Yet it is being applied to thousands of wheat farmers throughout the country who seeded more than their acreage allotments but who harvested less than their acreage allotments, due to winter-killing, insect damage, droughts, floods, and hail. Is it any wonder that farmers are holding protest meetings and demanding that Congress do something about the situation?

Occupation of Iceland

REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. OSMERS. Mr. Speaker, President Roosevelt's order to the Navy to clear the Atlantic is a virtual declaration of war without the action of the Congress. I shall be very much surprised if the order does not lead to an armed engagement between the United States and Germany within the next few weeks.

The occupation of Iceland is relatively unimportant compared to the President's order to clear the Atlantic in sea lanes 2,500 miles removed from our shores, in a zone declared to be combat waters, and far from the scope either of the Monroe Doctrine or defense of the Western Hemisphere.

At this rate, the Azores, Dakar, and the Cape Verde Islands are also in the Western Hemisphere, and we shall soon be hearing that our first line of defense starts at the Dneiper.

As I understand the President's order, the Navy has been told to shoot at any Axis vessel, sea or air, venturing into the waters around Iceland or in the entire western Atlantic. If we shoot, we can be sure that those shot at will shoot back. If that will not be war, I do not know by what other name it can be called. All of this, of course, was told to the Congress after it had been done, so that the people or their Representatives had no opportunity to say whether they wanted war or whether they did not. The bald fact that the majority of the people still do not want war and that a declaration of war could not muster a handful of votes in Congress makes the President's order even more dangerous.

Secretary Knox, keeper of the keys to the back door to war, practically declared war all by himself, even while the occupation of Iceland was under consideration by the administration. General Marshall followed him by demanding provisions for another A. E. F.

What has happened to President Roosevelt's solemn pledge of October 30, 1940, to the mothers and fathers of America that their sons would not be sent to foreign battlefields? Or was that just campaign hokum? What has happened to the four freedoms for which the President has so eloquently pleaded? The only freedom we have left here is to answer "Ja" to the President's proclamations.

America, Keep Out of War

REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, after the President notified the Congress that he sent the marines to Iceland, I picked up the newspapers the next day and I saw an advertisement by the Fight for Freedom Committee stating, "Now, it is up to you, Mr. Congressman. We have got to fight this war."

What war? Whose war? I want to know.

May I say to the people who put this advertisement in the papers that it is not up to me. I am not for war. I am against war. I am against sending our boys to Europe, and I am going to do everything I can to keep America out of war, and I want those people to know it.

I want to say to the people who are paying for these advertisements that America does not want to fight any war in order to settle the differences in Europe, Asia, or Africa. That is not our business, never was, and never should be. We have enough to do if we stay in the Western Hemisphere and attend to our own business, as we like good Americans should.

Now what is the situation today. We took one more step toward war Monday when the President of the United States notified the Congress that he is now taking over Iceland to protect it. What right has the President of the United States to assume that authority and responsibility? He says that he will convoy materials to Iceland. You remember what the President said, that to convoy means shooting and shooting means war. And that warning from the President of the United States is now being disobeyed by the third-term President. We all remember the campaign promise made by the President on October 30, 1940, when he made this promise to the American people, and I quote:

> And while I am talking to you fathers and mothers, I give you one more assurance. I have said this before and I shall say it again and again and again. Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars.

And now the President of the United States has assumed the authority without the consent of Congress to send your sons to Iceland. Certainly Iceland is in Europe or in the Eastern Hemisphere. No one can deny it and the promise made by the President to keep your sons out of war—certainly the President knows that this is one more step toward entering the great world war and America should be very, very careful that it does not be the aggressor and enter the conflict and have to carry the burden of fighting Europe, Asia, and Africa when the whole world will be against us. God forbid that America get into this terrible orgy of fighting, but let us offer our good offices in every way possible to settle the terrible struggle that is now going on all over the world. Certainly we can cultivate the good-neighbor policy by kindness more than with bullets and we will not sacrifice the manhood of America and wreck our Nation financially by so doing.

Guerilla Warfare

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM DITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, America has set itself to the serious task of rearmament. It should be a single-purpose undertaking. It should command the attention and the ability of all citizens. It should be so all-consuming in its demands that personal piques and political prejudices would disappear. It should be a persuasive force upon those who in times past have felt that private enterprise was a convenient whipping boy for demagogic appeals, and also upon those who have hoped that the persecution of private capital was an easy avenue to some type of state socialism.

Unfortunately, those conditions which should be present have not materialized since the defense program was started. The contrary has been the case. Day by day evidence accumulates which proves that the failure of production to measure up to estimates is due, in large part, to the guerilla warfare which has been, and is being waged by political sharpshooters in the Cabinet against the leaders of industry. As the evidence is examined, one cannot fail but to be impressed with the idea that the brains of the industrial life of the Nation are grudgingly endured or subtly rejected by those in Washington who enjoy the favor of the administration and are permitted to wield its power. Doctrinaries of radical social philosophies and boastful exponents of the theory of state ownership insist that their pet hobbies and their choice hates must take precedence over the established ability of the executives of private enterprise. In the meantime, scheduled deliveries are eagerly awaited by thoughtful men who are alarmed as they see the fearful frustration and failure. That which should be a closely coordinated endeavor continues to be a palpably plain conflict of effort.

At no time in the Nation's history has a more wholehearted and sincere assurance been given to the call of the Government for assistance than that which was provided by the industrial leadership of the country when the rearmament program was undertaken. That assurance had about it, not only sentimentalism, but the all-essential qualities of substantial capacity and skill. To see that assurance ignored and to know that those who have tendered it are humiliated should cause real concern to everyone who is aware of our pressing needs. There have been some expressions of suspicion that certain champions of a new order, who stand in places of authority, would welcome the failure of private enterprise to measure up to requirements, so that Government ownership and operation would appear to be a necessity. It is to be hoped that such suspicion has no foundation, and that no enthusiast would stoop so low as to invite national disaster by peddling political wares at a time such as this. The job to be done is not huckstering, but the more serious work of hastening our production to the point where a sense of security will be ours.

Incidentally, it appears that the most vituperative antagonists of private enterprise are among the most bellicose members of the official family. To some men, warfare is a way of life.

The Consumer Credit Loan Condition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, over a considerable period of time I have been interested in the small-loan organizations that are operating in this country, and for the past year, with the cooperation of an outstanding economist, I have accumulated information on this subject which prompted me to file House Resolution 251 on June 27, and I am requesting the chairman of the Rules Committee to grant me a hearing on this resolution at the earliest possible moment.

Approximately 15,000,000 borrowers have mortgaged the future in their impatient desire to be freed from the anxieties of their present circumstances. In the aggregate, their indebtedness is something over $2,000,000,000.

This great number of people owing these billions does not sound like many people or much money in these days of billions; but it is obvious that, with such a multitude having bartered off a portion of their future for the present, it has and will have a dominant effect on the present and future economics of the whole Nation.

This social and economic condition is worthy of sober, objective thought. If it is a healthy one, it should be encouraged; if unhealthy, treated with a political and economic doctrine of common sense.

The political doctrines or laws governing the making of loans in small amounts have been based upon expected future human conduct and surmised economic trends.

The future activities of these two elements confound the tables of the mathematicians and the wishes of economists, sociologists, and lawmakers. Somehow or another, human beings just will not come out mathematically even unless the common proven and accepted doctrines of economic exchanges are applied.

The need of a small amount of money by an individual is, in the aggregate, no different from the need of any other object that produces human happiness.

What is money that is available to loan out to those who desire it for any one of the multitude of things that it purchases? It is so much stored value, the tangible representative of as much physical property as was given in exchange for it; in other words, a stock of money.

To the borrower, this stock of money represents the identical thing that his desire or need demands to fulfill his wants. He comes into possession of the wanted amount by selling a specified portion of his future earnings, to be delivered in the future to the owner of the stock of money. In other words, due to an impatient desire, he has swapped his future for the present.

The borrower's future that he trades off is his credit money that he issues. True, it is only his promise, and that which he traded it for was only a promise; but due to the fact that it is earned and stored value issued by the Government and legal tender for debt, it is greater in value than his yet-to-be-earned credit money given in exchange. The difference in value depends upon five main factors: First, the amount of cash and credit money exchanged; second, the time in which the credit money is to be delivered; third, the amount of credit money already issued; fourth, the reasonable expectancy of the amount of credit money that will or can be earned, and hence issued; and, fifth, the volume of business done by the firm with whom he executes his exchange.

Individual credit money is comparable to cash money to the extent that the integrity, physical assets, and production capacity of the issuing medium determine its exchange value.

Ceiling prices on given amounts is the way that the law measures the difference in the value of these two different kinds of money. This ceiling rate varies generally in the various States from 1 percent per month on the amount owed each month to 3½ percent per month on the deferred balance owed each month. Usually these rates are limited to amounts of less than $500.

Under various plans and different schemes of lender operation, fitted into some 200 different laws and a thousand or so court decisions, plus volumes of administrative rules, these 15,000,000 borrowers issue their credit money. Consequently there is a literal babel of misunderstanding of what is economically good or bad in that branch of consumer credit that deals in small loans. As an example of this confusion, the States of Virginia and Maryland each have 3½ percent per month laws on amounts owed, whereas the present District of Columbia bill permits 2 percent per month on like sums.

In this enlightened age a consumer, under our present system of credit regulation, needs, or has been made to think he needs, some cash money. He has been hounded by all of the modern methods known to the advertising profession—direct mail, newspaper advertising, radio, and others. Of course, he needs money. Who does not? But an applicant for a small loan is not served in accordance with his economic needs, but is loaned an amount that is the most profitable to the lender under the rate provisions of the law in force in his respective State.

If the law is 1 percent per month or thereabouts, the high rate of 20 percent per transaction is charged usually for 2 weeks or 1 month. Reduced to dollars per transaction, this percentage is $1 for $5, $2 for $10, and so on, up to $5 for $50. Under this system of operation loans are not made for amounts in excess of $50, except in rare instances, but these loans are not paid off on the date that they are due. The lender lends the borrower an amount that he knows he will be unable to pay off on the due date; hence a forced renewal every 2 weeks for several months. The average time that a borrower stays on the books of a lender in this type is 2 years. In the jargon of the trade, this is called "high rate." It is estimated that over 5,000,000 borrowers are indebted on these oppressive contracts today.

In the States where the lending business is operated under the Uniform Small Loan Act, as sponsored by the Russell Sage Foundation, and like laws, instead of deflating the borrower's credit by lending him a small sum, the lenders inflate it by loaning him more than he needs, and for the longest period practicable to them. This system of operation has the effect of keeping the borrower on the books for periods of time ranging from 4 to 10 years. Debt slavery of the borrower by this method is accomplished by many schemes and high-pressure selling methods. For instance, the lenders insist, regardless of the fact that the other debts are not pressing or in default, that all outstanding obligations be incorporated into one loan, and as soon as the obligation is reduced the borrower is, by some trick, induced to increase it to the original amount or more; again he is sold on the idea of putting the amount advanced to him in excess of his needs in a savings account for a rainy day, but when the proverbial rainy day arrives it isn't there; consequently he is loaned up to the limit again, and on and on. Over 10,000,000 borrowers are indebted under this plan of lending.

As a rule, lending companies do not exchange credit information with other creditors. This gives them many advantages, both over the borrowers and other creditors. These creditors are more apt to extend credit under such circumstances. The lender, due to this situation, and the fact that he usually has a better knowledge of the borrower's weaknesses, is in a much better position to enforce collection of his loan to the detriment of other creditors.

The commercial banks have been slow in engaging in the small-loan business. Their reluctance is attributed to three causes. With some it is the fact that they are loaning to those engaged in the business and have large sums on deposit belonging to lenders; with others it is the fact that in their minds the business is burdening people with unnecessary debt; and still others a fear of the stigma that is attached to the business. This last embargo is the present-day lender's best friend. It keeps out competition, and always has done so.

A gross profit of from 30 to 42 percent per annum on an outlay of many hundreds of millions is no mean war chest in influencing the right kind of social attitude and political thinking in reference to an economic problem that has been controversial, since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary—especially when the law is uniform in twenty-odd States, is sponsored by an outstanding social and economic foundation, the legal-aid societies of many of the States, and other circles of influence.

The Russell Sage Foundation does not sponsor the acts of the lenders under the law that it sponsors. This is best evidenced by the fact that the large chain lenders are directly and indirectly inspiring colleges to hold consumer-credit conferences which draw conclusions based upon cold, mathematical equations mobilized by lending institutions, and based upon the system of operation of those furnishing the data.

A characteristic instance of this instrument of propaganda is a recent conference held at a west coast university. One of the large chain loan companies had 11 of its most highly paid employees present, 9 of whom were from the far east. In addition to these, there was the secretary of an institute that specializes in statistics and surveys that have to do with what the large chain lenders hold to be sound lending policies. In company with the secretariat were several college professors from eastern colleges who are on the advisory committee of the institute. Then there were other institute heads and college professors that did not seem to have any means of getting to the conference without lender patronage, either directly or indirectly. Perhaps in an instance or two the schools may have paid the cost of the entrainment.

But if an economic structure that is designed to aid social and economic progress is good why does it take 25 years and several times that amount in millions of dollars to keep proving it?

Certified audits of selected States prove that the companies operating under the law make only a reasonable profit; but these audits do not show all of the ramifications of general headquarters supervision expense and exorbitant attorney's fees nor donations to nonprofit institutes.

At the outset of the adoption of these laws in the several States, the reason given for the high rate of charge was to the effect that the banks would not make loans to this social level. In a Western State one of its banks is making the identical loan to the same borrowers that the personal loan companies make them to, at 6 percent per annum, on deferred balances and in amounts of $50. This bank does not require the borrower to take more than he needs; nor does it encourage him to do so; or will it take the borrower "out of soak" when he has been overloaded by the other lenders.

Prejudicial thinking has always prevailed in the making of laws regulating the small-loan business. All of the prejudice of public opinion is focused on the rate of interest charged by the lender. It best serves the purposes of the lending fraternity to keep the public attitude fixed on the rate. The modern so-called legal-rate lender uses rate of charge as a smoke screen for all of the other sharp practices indulged in by him.

Following fundamental sociological axioms of crowd behavior has enabled the large chain lenders, directly or indirectly, to virtually dictate State regulation, law making, and lending practices throughout the Nation. With a few exceptions, all of the national chain lenders operate at legal rate in the States where the law permits and at higher rates elsewhere.

In the States in which the Uniform Small Loan Act is in effect high raters are operating clandestinely. An outstanding example of this fact is the New York City loan-shark exposé and successful prosecution.

In some 15 States which have not yet passed the uniform law the high-rate business flourishes. Some of the Southern States are in a worse condition than that with which the officials of New York State had to deal.

Such a national economic condition is worthy of national consideration. Whatever people use as a medium of exchange to meet their needs, be it shells, buttons, or their future expectancy, is their money.

There is no intention here to decry consumer credit buying or lending. It is as essential to our economic stability and social progress as our cash money that is coined, regulated, and controlled by the Congress.

Government must have some regulation of money, with practically every consumer group in the Nation issuing its own credit money in exchange for its needs, some consideration must be given to this problem.

The need of congressional consideration is particularly true when this large group of the most needy is having their credit money inflated or deflated at the will or whim of a group of lenders, which, if allowed to go on, will ultimately control the credit money of the Nation. Interest paying is comparable to playing poker with a hole in the middle of the table. If the game goes on long enough, all of the money eventually goes into the kitty. Time cuts the pot for the money lender.

The financial regency now in control of the small-loan business got its start in World War No. 1. Twenty percent per transaction on an approximate $15,000,000 nest egg in 1915 has hatched a billion dollar financial structure. Unchecked in the present defense boom, what will it be? The lenders are buying up commercial banks and insurance companies, and in their spare time they are organizing discount companies to finance credit sales for small independent merchants.

The banks of the country are full of money. Surely the people who must borrow to live are entitled to some sensible efforts on their behalf. The borrower has ever been the slave of the lender. To solve the problem intelligently and effectively requires a comprehensive study and ascertainment of all the factors involved.

A complete exploration of this subject will result in a saving of hundreds of millions of dollars to the workers and common people of the country.

This period is one in which every source and avenue of conservation for the protection of our Government and way of life is required. The problem must be solved.

Address to Graduating Class of Public School 170, New York City

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. BARRY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

EXTRACT FROM ADDRESS OF C. GORDON LAMUDE

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following extract from speech of C. Gordon Lamude delivered on June 24, 1941, before the graduating class of public school 170, of the city of New York, Parsons Boulevard and Gilman Avenue, Jamaica, Queens County, N. Y.:

Members of the class of 1941 of public school 170, my fondest hope and wish for you is a world of peace.

Twenty-four years ago this month I occupied a seat similar to yours in a grammar-school graduating class. This country had but 2 months before entered into the first World War. Scarcely 6 months later, a first-year high-school student, I had to march from our school with my fellow students, lads of 14 to 17 years of age, to the Seventh Regiment Armory on Sixty-ninth Street and Park Avenue, New York City. There we were trained and drilled for 2 hours each week by Regular Army officers. This brought home forcefully to our young minds the meaning of war, its disruptive influence on young lives, and gave life to the full meaning and import of the dreadful reports in the daily newspapers depicting the horrors of armed conflict. This has left an indelible imprint on my mind. And so, when I pray for a world of peace for you, I do not refer to a similar training and preparation. The present preparedness program of our country will undoubtedly obviate the necessity of drilling and training boys between 14 and 18 years of age.

However, there is not one of you, young boys and girls, and members of this graduating class, who will not be greatly affected and undoubtedly the course of your lives changed in the event that the United States participates in the present war conflagration that has involved the entire Eastern Hemisphere. You know from your geography classes that practically all of Europe is bathed in bloodshed, that practically all of Asia has been for years stirred to sanguinary strife, that the issues of war have poured over into nearly all of Africa, and that Australia, which is really a sixth continent, has sent the flower of her manhood into the fiery furnace that is consuming the present generation. The Western Hemisphere of North and South America is the only land which remains untouched by the blood-dripping hands of Mars. When I express my hope of peace for you, it is my prayer that our hemisphere and our great United States should remain out of the present contest of power politics or war for the control of the continent of Europe.

As young Americans who will in a few years undertake the management and direction of our Government, who are the beneficiaries of the sacrifices of our forefathers and our own parents, who are the recipients of the great blessings of freedom and the traditions of our country, it should be your present purpose, youthful as you are, to insure that these blessings shall remain secure. If we enter the present conflagration, it follows as a natural step that we must give up this freedom and our traditions to a dictatorship.

While the declaration of war between Germany and Russia is too recent for anyone as yet to venture an opinion as to its effect upon this country, let us now resolve that we shall consider any change in our present program of peace and preparedness with calm deliberation and selfish devotion to our own welfare. But the fact that Nazi Germany, Fascist Italy, and Communist Russia are now warring on each other shows clearly how ridiculous it would be for this country to enter this war at the present time or in the near future. For I do not distinguish between dictatorships—Hitler, of Germany; Mussolini, of Italy; or Stalin, of Russia—they all spring from the same loins of dictatorship. To espouse the cause of one against another is equally fraught with danger to ourselves. Let us, therefore, review the recent developments and weigh them carefully. In my opinion, the war between Germany and Russia gives us less reason for even considering involving this country in war.

In conclusion, young graduates, it is my hope that on this glorious occasion you have received some real food for future thought and that you will join in my prayer of peace for you and resolve that you will only be in favor of our country entering the war when it is just and equitable and necessary for the sake of our principles and traditions.

Defense Plants in Interior

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM S. KNUDSEN, DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF PRODUCTION MANAGEMENT, TO HON. PAUL J. KILDAY, OF TEXAS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, much has been said about the policy of the War Department in locating newly established defense industries. A couple of months ago, Mr. William S. Knudsen, Director, Office of Production Management, was interrogated on this point by the Honorable PAUL J. KILDAY, of Texas, before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House. The questions and answers are as follows:

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Knudsen, in the early days I believe the National Defense Advisory Commission issued a policy with reference to the location of newly established defense industries, and there were a number of considerations in that policy with reference to the availability of labor, and so on, and as to the locality, to the effect that they should be placed strategically, from a defense standpoint?

Mr. KNUDSEN. Yes.

Mr. KILDAY. And that included the territory between the Alleghanies and the Rockies and far enough from the borders and the coasts?

Mr. KNUDSEN. 200 miles.

Mr. KILDAY. Have you pretty generally adhered to that?

Mr. KNUDSEN. Yes, sir. Of course, you must understand that we have expanded some plants, but they were outside the line because we could not move them away from there.

Mr. KILDAY. As I understand it, that has applied to new installations?

Mr. KNUDSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. And you have adhered to that pretty carefully?

Mr. KNUDSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Is it still your intention to do that?

Mr. KNUDSEN. It is still our intention to do that; yes.

Mr. KILDAY. That would apply to those plants financed through contracts made by the Government contracting agencies?

Mr. KNUDSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. Would it also apply to plants which might apply to the R. F. C. for financing, and require your recommendation?

Mr. KNUDSEN. I think that has been followed there also.

Mr. KILDAY. My city is located about 150 miles from the Mexican border and about 150 miles from the Gulf Coast, and I take it we would be pretty badly out of line.

Mr. KNUDSEN. The only thing I would suggest is that you have a little industry of your own. Of course, I do not make the maps.

I would like to make a statement for the record. This matter of plant locations, of course, is quite a ticklish subject whenever we have them to place. But we have no brief for any particular place in the United States. We began in the O. P. M. to try to do it as fairly as we knew how. We have not any particular pet location in the United States.

Mr. KILDAY. Your idea is to put these places where they would not be in danger from attack?

Mr. KNUDSEN. The map was given us by the General Staff, showing the locations for strategic reasons.

Mr. KILDAY. And that is the continuing policy, so far as possible?

Mr. KNUDSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILDAY. I do not hold you responsible for any advertisements in newspapers, but this morning the Washington papers carry quite a large advertisement by the Southern Governors' Conference.

Mr. KNUDSEN. I was asked to lunch with them, and I was there because I came here this afternoon.

Mr. KILDAY. I want to read you the third paragraph of that advertisement. It says:

"Up to January 31, seven and one-half billions of national-defense contracts (excluding shipbuilding) had been let, of which only 7 percent were placed in 11 Southern States. Of a total of 302 new plants, only 24 were located in the South."

Can you tell me whether or not that is roughly correct?

Mr. KNUDSEN. I imagine it would be. I imagine it would not be put there unless it was correct. But we are not over there, as you know.

Mr. KILDAY. Here is another paragraph:

"Of the eleven and one-half billions of prime contracts awarded up to February 15, a total of 80 percent has gone to 62 companies of financially interrelated groups of companies. This short-sighted policy of centralizing national-defense contracts is dangerous to the welfare of the Nation because it will inevitably result in—"

And then they detail three things:

"1. A shortage of labor and, therefore, the movement of large labor reserves out of the South into highly industrialized areas, making for more congestion and creating vast economic problems when the emergency is over.

"2. Create intolerable bottlenecks in transportation of both raw materials into the congested industrial areas and in the shipment of finished products.

"3. Create vast plant and production facilities in areas already overbuilt industrially, which will become idle and useless when the need for defense production is at an end."

Of course, this is a complaint made by the Southern Governors' Conference.

Can you give us some statement with reference to the exact situation and the necessity for it, and whether that statement is correct?

Mr. KNUDSEN. It is very difficult to give a statement on plant locations without offending somebody. But I can tell you this, as I told the Governors before I came over here this afternoon, that we did have a talk with the Governors at inauguration time when Mr. Knox, Mr. Stimson, and Mr. Hillman and I were there, and we talked to the Governors at that time and told them there were not enough plants to be built to give everybody plants in their particular locality, and we thought the best thing for the locality would be, if we could summarize or sort of survey the existing facilities in that location and see if we could not add some pieces, or work in there, rather than build new plants.

Mr. KILDAY. If you are able to get this subcontracting in full swing, will the existing plants, even though they are small, be used to their full capacity?

Mr. KNUDSEN. I think we have done that, and we have done it in that way rather than to build a munitions plant which would have to be closed up after the emergency was over.

Mr. KILDAY. And leave a city in an industrial area with industrial employees there with nothing for them to do when it is over.

But the program will be to give them as much of the subcontracting as possible?

Mr. KNUDSEN. We are trying to spread that all over the country.

Mr. KILDAY. Frankly, this is the complaint which we have heard a great deal of the time here on the Hill.

I do not know anything about whether their figures or percentages are correct, but this advertisement says:

"Of the eleven and one-half billions of prime contracts awarded up to February 15, a total of 80 percent has gone to 62 companies or financially interrelated groups of companies."

Mr. KNUDSEN. I have not anything to offer you against that. I only know that out of 12,000,000,000 we have 14,500 prime contracts, and I am quite sure we have over 60,000 subcontracts. Whether they are owned by somebody at some central point, I do not know.

Mr. KILDAY. You are not in a position to tell us whether there is a concentration such as they refer to?

Mr. KNUDSEN. I do not think so. I have no facts to give you on that. I will have somebody check that.

Mr. KILDAY. We find this coming out in an advertisement from 11 Governors.

Mr. KNUDSEN. I will put our statisticians on that particular paragraph. That is news to me.

Mr. KILDAY. You will furnish us that?

Mr. KNUDSEN. Yes.

(NOTE.—Mr. Knudsen subsequently reported that upon inquiry he had ascertained that the statistics in the form requested were not available in the files of the Office of Production Management.)

Paying the Price for the Last World War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK C. OSMERS, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE HUDSON DISPATCH OF UNION CITY, N. J.

Mr. OSMERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Hudson Dispatch of Union City, N. J.

This editorial has been sent to me by Edward Steer, war veteran and civic leader of Guttenberg, N. J.

[From the Hudson Dispatch, Union City, N. J.]

PAYING THE PRICE—FOR THE LAST WORLD WAR

Unless you are a World War veteran, you probably did not notice it. But the Hudson Dispatch yesterday carried obituaries of 4 men who served in 1917–18 and who answered the last call before reaching the age of 50.

For a long time the Hudson Dispatch obituary pages have averaged a daily story of a World War veteran dying in Hudson or Bergen. Yesterday the Dispatch recorded these—

Harold H. Horton, 40, one of the youngest veterans of the World War, died of a heart attack. He had moved to New York from Weehawken about 3 years ago.

Otto L. Heinsohn, 44, Hoboken, died at Veterans' Hospital, the Bronx.

George Hess, 48, Hoboken, died at the same hospital.

Albert Sacco, 45, who was wounded in France and never fully recovered, died in Jersey City.

Death is decimating the ranks of the World War veterans with new rapidity and at an average age younger than that at which it has all but wiped out the thin line of Blue and Gray. Veterans of the Civil War and the Spanish-American War usually came home to live to ripe old ages. The service in these wars, if they escaped the minnie balls and shrapnel, usually fortified them in strength and vigor so that they could expect a long life.

But the men who came out of the World War with its hell holes of gas poison, vermin-filled trenches, and exposure to shell shock, don't seem to rate the longevity of the comrades of the previous wars. Even in this war neither side has used poison gas, which both sides used in World War No. 1.

The veterans of that war are now paying the price at a greater death rate than was the daily average during the fighting, 1917–18.

Persuasion by Propaganda

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM DITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, the fiscal year of the Federal Government ended June 30. On that day the last appropriation bill to be passed was one for more than a billion dollars. While a number of the items carried in the bill were severely criticized, the amounts requested by the executive branch of the Government for its own publicity bore the brunt of the attack.

Since 1933 the propaganda program of the Federal Government has grown by leaps and bounds. Millions of dollars have been poured out of the National Treasury to establish and maintain agencies which grind out a steady grist of favorable publicity for the administration. The methods of operation have been so bold and so palpably plain that the motives cannot be mistaken. A "vast enterprise in salesmanship" would be a fair description of the program.

Self-government depends for its success on an informed and intelligent citizenry. Only as the facts involved in any issue are analyzed and understood can honest opinions prevail. Only as such facts are presented in an impartial and uncolored way can a reasonable analysis be made and a proper understanding be reached. Only as the opportunities for such presentation are available to the same extent to both the proponents and to the opponents of any government policy can the rights of a free people to determine their destiny be safeguarded. Controversial questions should be brought before the bar of public opinion in the same impartial way as evidence is presented to a jury. To permit one side a wider latitude than that which is accorded, or possible to the other side, amounts to a partiality which prevents a real appraisal of the merits of any policy.

The opposition to the top-heavy amounts carried in the last appropriation bill for publicity programs demonstrated that the dangers of systematic persuasion by Government agencies are recognized by men of both political parties. It is painfully apparent that the effort to develop these programs is a part of a plan to stimulate public support for and to insure widespread approval of administration policies. Chance could never have created such complete coverage as that which is enjoyed by the officials of the Government as a result of the campaign conducted at the expense of the taxpayer.

With the emphasis which has been laid on the need for economy in government before us, the increasing amounts demanded for propaganda purposes is disconcerting and discouraging. Persuasion by publicity specialists smacks of professional pressure. Freedom to choose is diminished as the appeal of propaganda progresses. Nor should it be forgotten that a program of this kind amounts to a censorship which is all the more dangerous because of its subtility.

"I'm So Happy I'm an American"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. C. GATHINGS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

LETTER OF A PATRIOTIC AMERICAN TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter addressed to the President from a patriotic American citizen:

The text of the letter, dated June 29—just a few days before Independence Day—follows:

"DEAR PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT: I am a married man, 28 years old; a boy 3, a girl 1. Here's how I feel about being an American:

"My ancestors were Czechoslovakians, my wife's English, but we're Americans.

"I look at my refrigerator, my oil heater, and my radio. I'm glad I'm an American.

"My children get cod liver oil, nourishing food, and a doctor's watchful care. They'll be glad they're Americans.

"This morning I went to church. Amongst my neighbors, unafraid and unmolested. I thanked God for giving us America.

"I went home to my wife and kiddies. My little boy, Douglas, came running and said, Hi, Pop. You gonna take me to see the ribber.'

"And I said, 'Sure, Doug., I'll take you to see the river.'

"'And we'll stand on the bridge and see the cars, Pop.'

"'Sure, Doug.'

"'Pop, see the sun. Look see, Pop. It shine in the car's window.'

"'Yes, Doug, the sun's shining on all America.'

"After our walk, we came home and sat down to veal chops, baked potatoes, fresh green beans and corn on the cob. I said grace with tears in my eyes. I'm so happy I'm an American.

"This afternoon, we listened to a radio broadcast of British children, here in America, talking to their parents in England, and I was proud to be an American.

"Tomorrow, I'll go to work. I work in an electrotype foundry, and I love my job. I made it, in fact, from errand boy to production manager in 2 years. I had ideas and I told the boss about them. He's an American.

"Tonight, before going to bed, I told my wife, 'Honey, I'm going to buy a large flag and hang it out the window Friday. The President wants everyone to pledge allegiance to a new and united America. And, honey, I'm going to do my part, because I'd rather be an American than anything else on earth."

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE E. KILBURN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY COMMON COUNCIL OF CITY OF PLATTSBURG ENDORSING GREAT PROJECT

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted by the Common Council of the City of Plattsburg endorsing the great St. Lawrence seaway project:

At a regular meeting of the common council of the city of Plattsburg, N. Y., held February 7, 1941, the following resolution was adopted:

"By Alderman Behan; seconded by Alderman Tyrell:

"Whereas for many years the common council of the city of Plattsburg has recorded itself in favor of national and State legislation leading to the early development of the navigation and power resources of the St. Lawrence River, assuring a higher standard of living for the industrial worker and the farmer, upon whose welfare business is dependent, through the benefits of cheap transportation and abundant electricity; and

"Whereas the completion of this project at the present time would assure the country an inland coastline, free from seaboard attack, making possible adequate development of existing shipbuilding facilities in the Great Lakes and on the St. Lawrence River, and would supply deficiencies of electric power in northern New York and other areas imperative to constant and sufficient national-defense production; and

"Whereas with the completion of the St. Lawrence project, construction of a Hudson-Champlain cut-off would permit down-State New York to tap the seaway and bring increased economic and social benefits to this region: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the common council of the city of Plattsburg petition the Congress of the United States to enact legislation providing for the immediate construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project; also

"Resolved, That the common council of the city of Plattsburg petition the Legislature of the State of New York to defeat the resolution under consideration which would put that body on record against this project and to substitute in its place a resolution supporting the project; also

"Resolved, That the Common Council of the City of Plattsburg petition the Legislature of the State of New York to enact legislation aiding the work of the New York State Power Authority, the only existing agency to represent the interests of the people of this State in the St. Lawrence project, by continuing its present appropriation and enacting legislation necessary to its expansion, if called upon to assume supervision of actual construction of the St. Lawrence project; also

"Resolved, That the Common Council of the City of Plattsburg petition the Legislature of the State of New York to give the people of the State the opportunity to vote on the constitutional amendment introduced at the present session by Assemblyman Robert F. Wagner, Jr., to safeguard the public-power resources of the State from private exploitation, legislation which is a necessary supplement to the Power Authority Act of 1931.

"On roll call, Aldermen Holland, O'Connell, Delaney, Golden, Behan and Tyrell voted in the affirmative; no one in the negative. Carried."

Condemn Sabotage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

LETTER AND RESOLUTION OF ASSOCIATED MASTER PLUMBERS OF TENNESSEE

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I am inserting a letter and a resolution adopted by the annual convention of the Associated Master Plumbers of Tennessee. The position taken by plumbers of Tennessee, as set forth in this resolution, I believe is a fair example of the patriotic attitude of labor in general in that State:

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE PRIEST: During the forty-fourth annual convention of the Associated Master Plumbers of Tennessee, held in Chattanooga, Tenn., May 23–24, 1941, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That we go on record as supporting wholeheartedly our Government in the prosecution of this war emergency; that we condemn all strikes, sabotage, 'fifth columnists,' all 'isms' and all 'scisms,' individuals and organizations that delay, hamper, or prevent our Government in the full prosecution of the war emergency and its efforts to guarantee our liberty, freedom, our homes, and our manner of living; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, our Senators and Congressmen, and the Governor of Tennessee."

Sincerely yours,

ASSOCIATED MASTER PLUMBERS OF TENNESSEE,

J. R. WILCOX, Secretary.

My Statement to Labor Committee on House Joint Resolutions Nos. 59 and 76

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, in speaking on behalf of my resolutions, House Joint Resolutions Nos. 59 and 76 before the subcommittee of the Labor Committee, headed by the gentleman from Georgia, I pointed out that a world-wide contest is going on between two opposing philosophies of life and government. One of those is the philosophy of force and its motive power is dictatorial decree. The other is the philosophy of freedom, and its motive force must necessarily be the intelligence and will to cooperate of a free people. Those free people designate representatives to act for them in many important respects. We, as Members of Congress, hold in our hands, therefore, the responsibility of seeing to it that our way of life and form of government wins that contest. One of the most important factors in doing so would be to demonstrate now that we have an answer to the maintenance of full production and employment after the defense program has been completed.

On a recent trip which I was privileged to make to my district I found, in talking to a great many of the people, that they were not complaining about new duties which they were being asked to assume, nor about taxes, nor about any sacrifices that might be necessary in the defense of their country. But everywhere I was asked this question, "What will we face in our American towns and cities when the Government stops spending all this money for defense and when peace has been restored? Will there be millions unemployed again? Will I lose my job, or is there sufficient vision and courage in Washington to prevent this happening?" These are the questions, gentlemen, that I heard most often. It is because of those questions that we are here considering these resolutions.

I have already explained in my previous statement and you have had evidence in these hearings of the very widespread approval for the setting up of such a commission as would be brought about by the passage of one of these resolutions.

At this time, in making my main statement, it is rather my desire to demonstrate the tremendous importance of these resolutions as I see the matter. All of us are concerned primarily with the national-defense program. We all know that that program will stand or fall depending upon how enthusiastically it is supported and entered into by the people generally. The fundamental question, therefore, is a question of morale. In the world-wide contest which I just mentioned, we are confronted with the competition of a controlled economic order in which the dictator is able continuously, whether in war or in peace, to so direct every person and every factor of production in the Nation as to achieve as nearly as possible their maximum use. Nearly everyone is employed, though under circumstances which no American would be willing to submit to. If our democracy can demonstrate that it has the answer to the type problem of this machine and power age, namely, unemployment, then in the long run the defeat of totalitarianism is, in my judgment, absolutely certain.

The purpose of these resolutions is to help us make this demonstration. Everyone in the United States realizes that the unemployment problem has got to be solved if democracy as we have known it is to survive. Everyone knows that it hasn't been solved. Everyone knows that its apparent current reduction is due to the tremendous expenditures by the Government and the billions of excess of expenditures over revenues. Over a long period of unemployment, the mere cost of relief will break down our system. If, therefore, it is our wish to protect and preserve democracy and a free economic order, it is absolutely imperative that we develop plans and programs for the solution of this problem and for the prevention of its aggravation and recurrence at the close of the defense-spending period. On the other hand, once we have proved that we can do this or even if we are able to give reasonable indication that we can do it, both the people of America and the people of other nations will begin to realize that here lives one great people who without the loss of liberty can gain full production and full employment. Once that has happened, totalitarianism is certainly doomed, but gentlemen, it is not certainly doomed until that day comes.

May I point out also that the alternative to the setting up of such a commission as is here proposed and the development of an orderly program for meeting the situation will inevitably be another period of great expansion of relief and an increasing growth of governmental action in order to meet the situation. If, then, we want to be able at the end of this great crisis in which we now find ourselves to return to a situation where Congress will occupy its proper place and where special administrative powers can be relaxed and, in any cases, abolished, we must have a fundamental and basic answer to the situation that we all know is going to arrive.

These things are not simply my own opinion. Indeed, I should like to read to the Committee a portion of the summary of conclusions of the Temporary Economic Committee which has just recently completed its work:

> Technology will continue to increase labor productivity, displace skilled occupations, and reduce unit labor costs. In the absence of effective offsetting forces, economic and social distress may be expected to accumulate.
>
> The existence of a large amount of long-term unemployment indicates a lack of balance between labor-displacing effects and the compensatory forces presumed to be inherent in our economic system. Estimates of unemployment at the beginning of 1940 range from 8,500,000 (National Industrial Conference Board) to nearly 12,000,000 (Congress of Industrial Organizations).
>
> Among benefits promised by economic theory to offset the evils of the machine are lower prices, higher wages, shorter hours, and development of new industries.
>
> Refusal to make use of price reductions is characteristic of mechanized industry. Price-fixing agreements among competitors are the rule rather than exception.
>
> Even during periods of greatest wage increases, unit labor costs decline, because advances in average hourly earnings are generally exceeded by still greater increases of output per man-hour.
>
> Further curtailment of working hours is distinctly remote, since legislation has established, and public opinion has accepted, the 40-hour week as the norm of employment.
>
> With the possible exception of the Diesel engine, there is in sight no great new peace industry offering promise of taking up any significant proportion of unemployment.
>
> While technology creates tremendous economic problems through labor displacement, it also induces concentration which impedes the operation of price reductions.
>
> A state of serious unbalance exists today. Under present conditions it is likely not only to continue but to become even more pronounced.
>
> The persistence of mass unemployment in the United States, despite marked economic recovery, and the growing emphasis on technological advance should cause grave concern to all thoughtful persons who seek the preservation of democracy.

No statement could be more forthright than that, and none so fraught with serious consequences for our country if we fail to heed it.

Again, from the American Youth Commission, whose personnel, headed by Owen D. Young, is, as I believe you all know, a most distinguished one, we find the following statement contained in a pamphlet entitled "Next Steps in National Policy for Youth:"

> After rising to a high point a year or more hence, the rate of defense activity must eventually come to a decline. When that time comes we shall confront a period of great peril to the internal stability of this country, a period when the most aggressive measures of economic reconstruction will be needed. It is not too soon to begin to plan for that day. The general welfare of the entire country will depend upon the success with which plans can be made. If there is a failure to take adequate steps, all of the recent difficulties of youth, and many of the difficulties which have confronted other elements in the population, will again be repeated on an exaggerated scale.

Here is the testimony of two distinguished bodies of American citizens to back my assertion that we must be about our job, and that perhaps the primary task we have at the moment is the one now under consideration by this subcommittee.

The suggestion as to the method to be pursued has come, as I indicated in my earlier statement, from many sources. I should like here, however, to quote from the findings of the Interfaith conference what they had to say about the importance of the establishment of a commission to develop a fundamental answer to these economic problems:

> To that end there should be a continuing commission, composed of representatives of consumers, farmers, labor, finance, manufacturing, commerce, government, education, religion. We hereby call upon the national organizations in these various fields to come together to form such a commission. For enforceable and coordinated action by the organized social forces of the country governmental leadership is necessary. Government, we strongly recommend, should call those organizations together for devising cooperative, democratic measures to solve the unemployment problem.

The American Association for Economic Freedom, an organization sponsored by a most distinguished group of American citizens from all walks of life, has published and sent out a special little pamphlet entitled "Preparedness for Peace," urging support of the Wagner-Voorhis resolution. I should like to emphasize one thing which they say. The third paragraph of their pamphlet reads as follows:

In supporting the resolution and urging its prompt adoption by both the Senate and House there is, therefore, no commitment to any specific post-emergency economic plan or program. The sole commitment is to the idea that a commission should be created now to study our post-emergency economic problem in the light of our experience during the period immediately following the last World War and during the depression decade of 1930–1940. Hence, if this is clearly understood, it is anticipated that the resolution will encounter no opposition.

May I call the Committee's special attention to the fact that through these hearings, either by direct testimony or by messages sent, the following groups and organizations of national importance have, among others, indicated their support of the passage of this legislation:

The American Federation of Labor.
General Federation of Women's Clubs.
The National Association of Manufacturers.
American Farm Bureau Federation.
The National Grange.
The Farmers Union.
The National Catholic Welfare Conference.
The Federal Council of Churches.
The Central Conference of American Rabbis.
Congress of Industrial Organizations.
The Railroad Labor Organizations.
Cooperative League of the United States of America.
National Child Labor Committee.
American Association of University Women.

It seems to me that this unanimity of support from every possible economic and cultural group in the country is most significant.

I have tried very hard to think of valid arguments against the passage of this legislation. Frankly, I have been unable to do so. The expenditure of the money involved in enabling such a commission to do its work is, in my judgment, of absolutely no consequence whatsoever when we consider that it might well mean the saving of literally billions of dollars of relief expenditures which will most certainly have to be made unless some adequate answer to this problem is found by the method here proposed. It may be said by some that we can do but one thing at a time, that at present we must concentrate on promoting the defense program, that it is too soon to worry about what is going to happen when the present conflict has been ended. I am sure I have already answered this argument in a number of different ways and I shall only say at this point that I am convinced that it is entirely wrong and that it indicates an almost complete misunderstanding of the stuff of which national morale and the spirit of the people are made, and as I have already said so many times it is spirit and morale on which our whole defense program ultimately depends.

Indeed it is my conviction that for such a commission to be set up and to give indication of success in its work might go a long way toward removing one major reason for unrest in the ranks of labor, for if I have heard once, I have heard hundreds of times a remark to this effect:

It is true our wages are fairly good at present, but you know as well as we do that it is only a matter of time until this defense boom is over and then we shall find ourselves without jobs and in the street again, hence we must make the most of the opportunity that we now have.

Indeed, we find in the pamphlet entitled "The Right To Strike," issued by the C. I. O., this significant sentence:

When the arms program is finished, workers will have to face the crisis of mass unemployment and social misery.

Indeed, gentlemen, I do not think I could overemphasize the importance of this feeling on the part of millions of people and its bearing on the success of the defense program itself.

Furthermore, the reluctance of certain industries to expand their plant facilities cannot be attributed to any unpatriotic motives or unwillingness to cooperate with the defense program. On the other hand, what these industries justifiably fear is that we will permit another period of mass unemployment and failure of the American market to furnish an adequate demand for the output of industry when the defense program is completed. I ask the committee to consider how it might affect the outlook of industry in this respect if they felt that a program was developing which would reasonably assure them of a strong and full demand for their goods in the future. This same point could be made regarding our farmers who are producing now the most essential single commodity of all from the defense standpoint as well as from the standpoint of aid to Britain. What can they look forward to? Another period of foreclosure and bankruptcy? Or will they be able to feel their Representatives in Congress are finding ways in which the prices for their commodities and the demand for them can both be steadily maintained through the years?

In the third place, the argument may be used that this is not a job for Congress. But it seems to me that this is obviously the kind of job which belongs primarily to the legislative branch of Government, together with the representatives of the great economic and population groups. Furthermore, it is one way in which we can demonstrate that in this period when increased Executive power is, of course, necessary, we are still performing functions as a legislative branch of Government and are able to show a kind of initiative without which, indeed, the position of Congress in our governmental system is certain to suffer desperately. Furthermore, the period following the present crisis will, and I believe should be, one in which there will be a strong tendency for the Congress to assert its prerogatives and to act in more independent fashion than would be right for it to do under present circumstances. I think I hardly need to more than suggest these thoughts too, because everyone of you will agree with me that the dominant note in that period will be a resumption by Congress of a very independent spirit and attitude. If this be true, then I submit that a program developed solely by the executive branch of Government, however meritorious it would be, would have a most difficult road before it, should some of us attempt to secure its passage in the Congress in such a period. I am convinced that Congress should take this initiative and I am convinced that in developing a program for the continuous economic health of America, the Congress should, from the very beginning, play an important and coequal, if not a leading, role.

It is spirit and heart and hope the American people need. I know Congress is not primarily interested in the future but in the immediate present desperate problem. But the thing that makes people willing to go to Army camps, to pay taxes—heavy and burdensome ones—to run risks, and if need be, to suffer—the thing that spurs people to do these things with a will and a song in their hearts is hope—hope of a better tomorrow for themselves, maybe, but most of all for their children.

And so I appeal for favorable action on one of these resolutions to create now an outstanding commission to work out a program for the prevention of depression and unemployment and the assurance of sustained full production when this critical period of defense spending comes to an end. The Labor Committee has granted that consideration. I believe the resolution will be passed. I believe we are going to undertake our whole job, not just part of it.

There are only two impulses that can drive men to the greatest and most sustained effort and sacrifice. One is the impulse of desperation that comes to people when they see clearly that they must fight for survival itself. Such, I believe, is the impulse behind the British people today. But whether we like it or not, gentlemen, the plain and obvious truth is that the American people do not today feel any such impulse of desperation. The other impulse—and I believe the only other one that is adequate to call forth what has come to be known as an all-out effort—is the impulse of an ideal, an ideal that has some religious meaning in it, an ideal and a hope of a tomorrow that will be definitely and clearly better than today has been. It is upon the wakening of such an ideal in the hearts of the American people that we must today depend completely. And whether or not it is to be awakened depends primarily, I am convinced, on how well the Congress and other leaders of the Nation do their job. May God grant we shall not fail.

Our July Fourth Celebration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE MONTGOMERY INDEPENDENT, MONTGOMERY COUNTY, MD.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Montgomery Independent, of Montgomery County, Md.:

[From the Montgomery Independent, Montgomery County, Md., of July 4, 1941]

OUR JULY 4 DECLARATION OF NATIONAL INDEPENDENCE

INDIVIDUAL DECLARATION OF NATIONAL INDEPENDENCE

On the 4th day of July, 165 years ago, a group of independent individuals signed our Declaration of Independence.

These men had a cause. It was understandable. They could fight and die for it. It united 13 colonies and made them into the United States of America.

In confusion, in delusion, and baited on by illusions, we individuals today are being robbed of our power to think normally or reason justly. To judge between the right and the wrong becomes almost impossible.

On one subject we can still definitely state our opinion—nay our firm belief. Of all countries in the world—bad as things may now seem or become in the near future—the United States of America is the best place for humanity to live and affords individuals the greatest opportunities.

It is our unpleasant duty, risking the making of enemies who can hurt us, to do our utmost to keep for unborn children what was left to us to guard.

MONTGOMERY COUNTY COMRADES

Under the Communist plan of government the farmers are not permitted to own any of the crop which they grow. Under Nazi rule, and under their form of government, the farmers are permitted to own the crops that they grow but the governmental control and restrictions have become such that the word "own" has lost its legal significance.

In Montgomery County, as well, too, the other counties and States throughout these United States, the recent change in our Government's dealings with the farmers has brought about a situation more closely akin to that followed in Russia and Germany than any dare to admit. We are not endeavoring to be alarmists; we are merely stating the facts.

Witness, if you will, the following. It is in no wise exaggerated, save for the use of the word "comrade."

Farmer Jones visits on the farm of Farmer Brown somewhere in upper Montgomery County. They have been neighboring farmers all of their lives. They are exceptionally close friends.

Farmer JONES. Good morning. I see you have a large wheat crop. Looks good, too.

Farmer BROWN. Yes; I believe I'll do all right with my wheat this year. I'll need a good bit for feeding and expect to sell the rest. I planted a few more acres this year—a little more than usual. Hope the price goes up.

Farmer JONES. Did I understand you right when I thought I heard you say that you had planted a larger wheat crop this year—a few more acres, I thought you said?

Farmer BROWN. Yes; I'm expecting to sell about the same amount as last year, but I need more for feeding. Why?

Farmer JONES. Brother, you didn't go above your Government allotment, did you? No; I'm certain you wouldn't be so foolish.

Farmer BROWN. It doesn't matter. I'm not in the Government program. I wasn't in last year, nor the year before, or ever. You see, I just don't go in, and even though I lose some advantages, such as borrowing on the wheat and a few others, I still can grow and dispose of what I want to. If I don't go in the program, I can grow what I think this farm should produce to pay me for operating it. This is a small farm and none of my crops are big.

Farmer JONES. Comrade Brown, you might not know it but you are in the Government program this year whether you want it or not. You're right in the middle of it. You're going to have to pay a tax on all the wheat you are growing over your allotment.

Farmer BROWN. What's come over you, Jones? What's this comrade stuff. You sound goofey to me. I'm not in any program; I feed the excess and sell the rest at the mill. (Brown cuts a stream of tobacco juice at a varmint hole and remarks under his breath, "Comrade, hmph.")

Farmer JONES. Comrade Brown, we farmers are now calling each other that out of deference to the new program. It's spreading like wildfire. I mean the comrade part. You may as well adopt it, too. You have been made a part of the program by Mr. Big's new farm policy. It was recently voted in by my other comrades.

And, comrade, don't get nasty; it won't do you any good. You ain't selling that wheat, or any wheat for that matter, 'cause it's boycott wheat at the mills unless you get the white card. Surely you have heard of the white card? You can get the card by paying the tax. The tax is 49 cents for each bushel. You gotta pay it 'cause you went over your allotment. Me I knuckled down and am better off than you by working less. It's the new order of things.

Farmer BROWN. Comrade, comrade, comrade, damn that comrade business. Damn the word comrade. Listen, Jones, I'll feed all the wheat. I ain't paying a tax of 49 cents a bushel for growing wheat when I didn't want to join such a communistic program. That's strictly communistic. It's just like being in Russia or Germany. (Brown again cuts a stream of tobacco juice at the varmint hole and again under his breath, "Comrade, what's the matter with this bird—wish his pappy was here—he'd whale tar out of him—he'd tan his hide, the lazy whelp—comrade, the guy's screwy.")

Farmer JONES. I sympathize with you Comrade Brown, you just don't understand the new order. I forgive your abusive language against the new order, for you know not what you say. But—you can't feed the wheat without paying the tax. The Government man from Washington will come out and collect it.

You can do but one of two things. If you don't want to pay the 49 cents a bushel tax you can either give it to the Department of Agriculture or destroy it. Either one or the other, nothing else. You can't keep it, eat it, feed it, store it, sell it, or give it away.

Farmer BROWN. Are you sure?

Farmer JONES. If you don't believe me, Comrade, ask the Department of Agriculture. One of the comrades there will be glad to verify everything I've said.

Farmer BROWN. In other words, a small Montgomery farmer can no longer grow wheat crops, and in what amounts, that he wants?

Farmer JONES. Comrade Brown, it is the new order.

Farmer BROWN. You get the hell off my property, you —, you —, you —, comrade, you —."

FINIS

Leaving off the word "comrade," such is the plight of some 23 small but relatively successful farmers in Montgomery County.

It is the new order.

Eminent Newspaper Writer Discusses Proposal for Meeting Post-Defense Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

ARTICLE BY CHARLES G. ROSS IN ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor to be able to include with my remarks the following excellent article on the proposition of a post-defense economic commission, by Mr. Charles G. Ross, one of America's outstanding newspapermen:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of July 2, 1941]

NATIONAL GROUPS BACKING CONGRESS' MOVE TO MEET POST-DEFENSE EMERGENCY—TWO PLANS UNDER CONSIDERATION BY HOUSE COMMITTEE FOR FORMATION OF COMMISSION TO STUDY PROBLEMS AND RECOMMEND APPROPRIATE LEGISLATION TO MEET THEM

(By Charles G. Ross, contributing editor of the Post-Dispatch)

WASHINGTON, July 2.—Strong outside support has developed for resolutions introduced in the Senate by Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER (Democrat), New York, and in the House by Representative JERRY VOORHIS (Democrat), California, calling for the establishment of a commission to study the economic problems that will confront the Nation at the end of the present defense emergency.

Hearings before the House Labor Committee have produced a wealth of testimony favorable to the proposal from a great variety of organizations. Among those which have supported it either through direct testimony or sympathetic messages are the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the National Association of Manufacturers, the American Farm Bureau Federation, the American Federation of Labor, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, the National Catholic Welfare Conference, the Federal Council of Churches, the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the League of Women Voters, the Railroad Brotherhoods, the Cooperative League of the United States, the National Child Labor Committee, the National Association of University Women, and the National Grange.

ALTERNATIVE PROPOSALS

Consideration is being given by the House Labor Committee to two alternative plans with the same end in view—one, for a post-emergency economic advisory commission of 12 members, of whom 6 would be named by the President and 6 would come from Congress; and, another, for a similar body of 24 members, 6 of them from Congress and 3 each to be chosen by the President from the executive branch of the Government, farmers' organizations, labor unions, business groups, consumer cooperatives, and church organizations.

In either case the commission would study the problems of post-emergency adjustment, report to the President and Congress from time to time on the results of its inquiry, and recommend appropriate legislation.

The objective, in brief, is to formulate a program to prevent the oncoming of depression after the defense emergency.

"WILL I LOSE MY JOB?"

"The people," said Representative VOORHIS, in arguing for prompt action on the proposal, "are not complaining about taxes or any sacrifices that may be required for the defense of the country. But everywhere one hears the question, 'What will happen when the Government stops spending all this money for defense? Will there be millions of unemployed again? Will I lose my job, or will there be sufficient vision and courage in Washington to prevent this happening?'

"Everyone in the United States realizes that the unemployment problem has got to be solved if democracy as we have known it is to survive. Everyone knows that it hasn't been solved. Everyone knows that its apparent current reduction is due to the tremendous expenditures by the Government and the billions of excess expenditures over revenues. Over a long period of unemployment, the mere cost of relief will break down our system.

"If, therefore, we wish to preserve our democracy and a free economic order, it is imperative that we develop plans for the solution of this problem and for the prevention of its recurrence at the close of the present spending period.

"Once we have proved we can do this, both the people of America and the people of other nations will begin to realize that here is one Nation which, without loss of liberty, can gain full production and full employment. Once that has happened, totalitarianism is certainly doomed, but it is not certainly doomed until that day comes."

In support of his contention that "a fundamental and basic answer" must be found to economic maladjustments, Representative VOORHIS of California cited some of the recent findings of the Temporary National Economic Committee (the O'Mahoney committee):

Technology will continue to increase labor productivity, displace skilled occupations and reduce unit labor costs. In the absence of effective offsetting forces, economic and social distress may be expected to accumulate.

The existence of a large amount of long-term unemployment indicates a lack of balance between labor-displacing effects and the compensatory forces presumed to be inherent in our economic system.

Among benefits promised by economic theory to offset the evils of the machine are lower prices, higher wages, shorter hours, and development of new industries.

Refusal to make use of price reductions is characteristic of mechanized industry. Price-fixing agreements among competitors are the rule rather than the exception.

Even during periods of greatest wage increases, unit labor costs decline, because advances in average hourly earnings are generally exceeded by still greater increases of output per man-hour.

THE NORMAL WEEK

Further curtailment of working hours is distinctly remote, since legislation has established and public opinion has accepted the 40-hour week as the norm of employment.

With the possible exception of the Diesel engine, there is in sight no great new peace industry offering promise of taking up any significant proportion of unemployment.

While technology creates tremendous economic problems through labor displacement, it also induces concentration which impedes the operation of price reductions.

A state of serious unbalance exists today. Under present conditions it is likely not only to continue but to become even more pronounced.

The persistence of mass unemployment in the United States, despite marked economic recovery, and the growing emphasis on technological advance should cause grave concern to all thoughtful persons who seek the preservation of democracy.

DRIVING IMPULSES

"There are only two impulses," VOORHIS continued, "that can drive men to the greatest and most sustained effort and sacrifice. One is the impulse of desperation that comes to people when they must fight for survival itself. Such is the impulse behind the British people today. But, whether we like it or not, the plain truth is that the American people do not today feel any such impulse of desperation.

"The other impulse, and the only one that is adequate to call forth an all-out effort, is the impulse of an ideal, an ideal that has some religious meaning in it, an ideal and a hope of a tomorrow that will be definitely and clearly better than today has been. It is upon the awakening of such an ideal in the hearts of the American people that we must today depend completely. And whether or not it is to be awakened depends primarily on how well the Congress and the other leaders of the Nation do their job."

War Questionnaire

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY SAUTHOFF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

LETTER AND BALLOT MAILED BY HON. HARRY SAUTHOFF, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, I am mailing a letter, together with a ballot, to every voter in my district. The purpose of this ballot is to get an expression of the views of the people of my district on the question of whether or not the people of my district are in favor of the entrance of the United States into the present World War. The letter and ballot are as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington.

To All Voters of the Second Congressional District of Wisconsin:

Everyone realizes that we are face to face with war. That issue may have to be decided in the near future.

Congress alone has the power to declare war under our Constitution. As your Representative in Congress, it will be my duty to vote on that issue.

How would you have me vote—for or against war?

At this critical hour, the question of peace or war means more than anything else in your life. War affects every one of us.

In order that I may have an expression of opinion from the second district, I urge you to mark the enclosed ballot and return it to me at once. You need not sign your name; just vote and drop the ballot into a mail box.

This is not done because I have changed my views. They are the same as they were in 1917. I merely want to know how you stand.

Therefore, I urge you to mark your ballot and mail it today. All that is necessary is to mark and mail the enclosed card. You do not have to sign your name to the ballot; sign only if you wish.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY SAUTHOFF.

BALLOT

The United States should

Enter the war..... ☐
Stay out of the war..... ☐

Name.....
Address.....

(Signature optional)

Please return this ballot within 3 days of receipt.

HARRY SAUTHOFF.

Navy for Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS J. CAPOZZOLI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

ADDRESSES OF REAR ADMIRAL ADOLPHUS ANDREWS, UNITED STATES NAVY, AND MAJ. GEN. IRVING J. PHILLIPSON, UNITED STATES ARMY

Mr. CAPOZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an address delivered by Rear Admiral Adolphus Andrews, United States Navy, Commandant Third Naval District and Commander North Atlantic Naval Coastal Frontier, before the Society of Tammany or Columbian Order, in the Great Wigwam, Union Square, New York, on July 2, 1941, in celebration of the one hundred and sixty-fifth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence and the one hundred and fifty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the society.

I also include an address delivered by Maj. Gen. Irving J. Phillipson, United States Army on the same occasion, at the same time and place.

The addresses follow:

ADDRESS OF REAR ADMIRAL ADOLPHUS ANDREWS

Distinguished guests, gentlemen, it is a high privilege and a great pleasure for me to have the opportunity of addressing you on this occasion, marking as it does the one hundred and fifty-fifth annual Independence Day celebration of your distinguished organization.

The Society of Tammany was organized just after the Revolutionary War not only as a symbol of our philosophy of government, but also as a living, vital force in its development. At that time there were many persons who thought that the United States and its democratic principles of government could not long survive. Even then there were those who were working subversively for the destruction of the young country and the dissipation of hard-won freedom. These forces are at work again today. The same contribution to the ideals of freedom which Tammany contributed in those critical days of our country's nascence is sorely needed once again.

The Archives Building in Washington carries a very important and interesting inscription: "The past is the prologue of the present." Today we are confronted with the grave question of whether this world is to find its way to the high levels of peace and happiness, or whether nations will be forced back into a dark age of brutality and spiritual death. In spite of our efforts in armament limitations, in spite of our humanitarian ideals and our endeavors to maintain peace among nations, the dictators have forced upon us a problem the solving of which will represent the prologue of our way of life in the twentieth century. Every liberty-loving American knows the only possible solution to that problem and will not hesitate to achieve it, whatever the costs.

In our oath as naval officers we solemnly swear to uphold the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic. Gentlemen, we are faced with both today. The first is the Navy's sphere; but to a great extent it is the duty of every patriotic American to ferret out and subdue every un-American element within our Nation.

The history of the United States has shown that to safeguard our Nation we cannot remain supine until the enemy is at our door. The American way of life calls for something more than mere physical security of the continental limits of the United States. It insists upon the equal recognition and opportunity for trade and peaceful intercourse throughout the world

In 1812 we took up arms against England to insure the proper respect and safety for American seamen on the high seas. Three years later we sent our fleet into the Mediterranean to fight the Barbary pirates to insure the safety of American merchant vessels embarked on peaceful trade in that area. The Boxer Rebellion in China, the defense of the Monroe Doctrine in the Venezuelan incident with Germany—Vera Cruz in 1914—all of these are historical proofs of our traditional stand for our rights on the high seas and throughout the world.

During the lulls of relative peace and prosperity, America has curiously drifted toward narrow isolationism; yet every crisis in our country's history has proved the necessity for the active defense of our rights wherever threatened. There is no such thing as eternal and ultimate security for our philosophy of government. At no given time can we afford to arm ourselves, then sit back and relax our vigilance, with the assurance that we are forever safe from subversive ideologies.

Democracy by its very nature is dynamic, and its defense thus must also be an active, ever-continuing process. It is a paradox that the very prosperity of our country grew out of our world-trade relationships. In lush days we are apt to enjoy the fruits of that hard-won situation without remembering the sacrifices necessary for its achievement or the obligations and safeguards essential to its preservation.

The Navy is the fighting expression of democracy. As a fundamental part of our Nation, it has undergone periods of great expansion when the dangers to democracy have alarmed us. Then when danger recedes, the Navy has been perilously reduced through the ensuing years of false security.

Today we are feverishly trying to make up for the short-sightedness of the 1920's, when we permitted our fleet to be drastically reduced. We know now that the world is not ripe for an idealistic reduction of armaments and a substitution of arbitration for armies and negotiation for navies.

We are now in the middle of the greatest naval expansion program in our country's history. In time we will complete this program and again may face the future with confidence. But until that time our every energy must be bent toward the goal of retrieving, in the shortest possible time, the grave oversights of yesterday.

It takes time to build ships, to equip bases, to train men. We are getting along with that program. Already two of our new battleships have been commissioned. Our outlying bases are being established and equipped with the utmost speed Unfortunately, good intentions are not enough. The task which may well be assigned to our Navy in the fateful months ahead may be gigantic. Every day, every minute saved is vital to the security of our Nation.

My duty as commander of the third naval district brings me in close contact with thousands of civilian workers, most of whom are employed in our great shipbuilding program. We have in the navy yard some 20,000 civilians who are cooperating 100 percent and who, by their loyalty, should be an inspiration to all of us. They realize the need for speed in this building program. Their spirit of unity and teamwork is an assurance of success for our country in this race against time, in this battle for preparedness.

Even as this great democracy has progressed and changed to meet new world conditions, so has our Navy developed to fulfill its protective function. We are improving our methods of fighting every day. We are taking advantage of the sad but valuable lessons being learned by England. New protection in our ships, new offensive weapons, new methods of operation—all are incorporated after proper evaluation. For example, we now find that portholes, particularly near the water line, are a source of weakness in bombing attacks; so we are eliminating them. We are evolving now methods of combating the submarine and airplane menace.

Shore establishments exist for the sole purpose of supplying the needs of the fleet. While we are working night and day to meet these needs in the construction of new ships and the repair and overhaul of old ones, we are also giving every assistance to Great Britain. Her heroic stand in this conflict should be an inspiration to all freedom-loving men.

Sea power has determined the destinies of nations throughout history. Today I am convinced that sea power will be the decisive factor in the present conflict. The seas must be kept free for the peoples and commerce of all nations. It is only through sea power that this can be accomplished.

Of course, the air arm of sea power assumes an ever-increasing importance. We are not content that the United States Navy today possesses the best naval aviation force in the world. We recognize that it must be expanded even more than the other branches of the Navy. It must be given more importance as the ship-based fighting wings of sea power.

Our two oceans are not mere barriers preventing aggression against us. They are the lanes of our commerce, over which we achieved our greatness. We cannot retire smugly behind them in safety. We must protect them, even if that means temporarily turning them into the battle areas of democracy.

You gentlemen are met here this evening, as you have been gathered through so many years in the past, to celebrate the anniversary of the Declaration of Independence. On this occasion I suggest that this observance be reserved not for a celebration of the fruits of the democracy we have achieved but rather for a stern dedication to the serious task of defending it in this time of danger. We must not permit ourselves to be so softened through the enjoyment of our democracy that we can no longer vigorously defend it. This is the time for a serious evaluation of our priceless heritage and a firm resolve on the part of every American to make the necessary sacrifices to insure its preservation. There is a time for argument and a time for action.

As far as the Navy is concerned, it is not for us to decide national policy, not for us to decide whether there be war or peace; it is for us to maintain at maximum efficiency every ship, every naval instrument placed in our hands, to be prepared for any eventuality, to be ready at a moment's notice to defend America with everything at our command No navy in the world today has finer or more patriotic officers and men, each and every one of whom takes his job seriously and is ready to give his all for his country. As in the past, gentlemen, I assure you that your Navy stand ready today with decks cleared and stripped for action.

ADDRESS OF MAJ. GEN. IRVING J. PHILLIPSON TO SOCIETY OF TAMMANY, JULY 2, 1941

I need not tell ou how deeply I appreciate the opportunity of being with you today to commemorate the one hundred and sixty-fifth anniversary of American independence and the one hundred and fifty-fourth celebration of the founding of the Society of Tammany of New York. These meetings are steeped in tradition, and my thoughts inevitably revert to the stirring events which animated the beginning of the Republic and enliven its early history. The Sons of Liberty—blood brothers of the Tammany societies—resisted the efforts of the mother country in its efforts to curtail the liberties of the American Colonies and actively participated in the struggle for independence. As far back as 1772 the first Tammany Society was established in Philadelphia The New York society in whose honor we assemble here was founded 11 years after the signing of the Declaration of Independence and a year before the ratification of the Constitution of the United States.

It purposed to preserve the rights for which its founders had fought; to promote and cherish union between the States; to foster affection and kindness for one another and to assist the families of veterans. How well it has succeeded in these commendable purposes I need not remind you. Let us rather consider briefly its contribution to the defense of the Nation since, at this time, national defense is again of urgent and vital concern to every one of us.

Founded as it was by a group of fighting men that had risked their all in the struggle to free the Thirteen Colonies from British domination, the Tammany Society has supported the Government and contributed freely of its manhood and of its treasure whenever danger threatened Its national-defense record merits repetition wherever valor and sacrifice are recounted. Through a century and a half of conspicuous service this society has invariably arrayed itself on the side of those who believe that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

In 1812, the Tammany Society stood squarely behind the declaration of war against England; it strongly supported the hero of New Orleans in his struggle against nullification; it favored the annexation of Texas by force if necessary. At the beginning of the Civil War, it raised and equipped at its own expense, the Tammany Jackson Guard, Forty-second New York Infantry, and several other regiments and brigades were recruited and equipped in 1861 by the leaders of the Tammany Society. On Cemetery Ridge, at Gettysburg, near the "Clump of Trees" stands the Tammany Regiment monument in honor of the magnificent stand that organization made in stopping Pickett's charge. Before the stone wall on the edge of the Fredericksburg Cemetery, the Forty-second Regiment gallantly advanced under the heaviest of fires and many brave soldiers laid down their lives on that bloody field. At Antietam, Balls Bluff, Williamsburg, like deeds of valor are attested. The Forty-second Regiment, in all, took part in 36 battles or engagements, of which 19 were major conflicts.

Then, in 1898, Tammany raised and equipped a regiment to participate in the Spanish-American War and tendered its services to President McKinley. That this regiment was never mustered into the service, in no way dims the glory of Tammany's willingness to accept its accustomed role. No less gallant were the sons of Tammany who participated in the first World War. Their fighting qualities and will to win brought honor and distinction to the commands with which they served.

And so we of the Army today pay our respects to the men of Tammany for their gallant and patriotic services extending over 150 years. And the end is not yet. The United States again faces an emergency and the sons of Tammany once more are in training for any eventuality which may require their service.

Much has been published recently purporting to show the changes in methods of warfare which the present struggle abroad is disclosing and criticizing the alleged failure of our Army to accommodate its organization, training, armament, and personnel, as well as itself to these changed conditions. Generally, these criticisms pertain to an insufficiency of air corps and armored divisions in our organization, old-fashioned leadership reluctant to rely on "all out" blitzkrieg, the need for new weapons and the improvement of old ones, slow promotion and senility at the top, establishment of a separate Air Corps, the substitution of civilian research and manufacture for the arsenals, employment of civilians to replace military personnel and the elimination of the traditional barriers between the different branches of the Army. Were I prepared to reply to such criticisms the time available to me is too limited to allow even a beginning. However, these are subjects concerning which there has been much controversy since the World War. There are two sides to each of the questions involved and the critics are presenting but part of one side and that side based on interpretations not always justified by the facts. I only ask in the words of your distinguished sachem that you "take a look at the record" before you accept these criticisms at their full value.

I enter no claim that mistakes have not been made, for the one most likely to make mistakes in public affairs is he that does things. I also realize that were our foresight as good as our hindsight we would be much better off. As far back as 1933, the year that Hitler came into office, the then Chief of Staff of our Army stated in his annual report: "As much as at any other time in our history, the Army's efficiency should engage the earnest attention of every loyal citizen. It is my conviction that at this moment the Army's strength in personnel and matériel and its readiness for employment are below the danger line. I consider it of the most urgent importance to the United States that this condition be rectified without delay."

Another common source of misinformation is the tendency to interpret each event that occurs abroad as directly and immediately affecting the operation of our Army. It is a well-established principle of logic that a general truth can only be arrived at from an infinite number of individual instances. To interpret correctly a particular event, one must be familiar with all the circumstances surrounding it in order to be able to assure himself that it is comparable to other situations. Otherwise, Switzerland might find herself building a navy.

Germany, located as it is in the middle of Europe, has been able to plan meticulously how to conduct a war against any of its neighbors and has been able to make its organization, armament, training, and personnel conform to the conditions under which it was apparent that it would wage war. Exact planning is far more difficult in our situation, as our Army must be prepared to fight wherever its services are required. This difference in missions vitally affects all the complicated elements which enter into the building of a modern army.

Much progress has been made in preparing the country and the Army for their respective roles in national defense. That there is still much to be done, and that the time for doing it may be pitifully short, no informed person can doubt. That changes to improve performance will constantly occur is equally apparent. Nor is there the slightest objection to just criticism, provided it is constructive and honest. Such criticism is patriotic and obviously a public duty. At this time your country and your Army are facing the greatest emergency that has confronted them since the attack on Fort Sumpter. Success depends in no small part on the loyal support of the American people. Your society has invariably thrown its wholehearted support behind the Government in every crisis that has occurred for the past 155 years. No higher tribute can be paid to any group or element. It is in the light of such patriotic devotion that we can gaze into the future with equanimity.

Bottleneck Arguments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE MILWAUKEE JOURNAL

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of July 6, 1941:

[From the Milwaukee Journal of July 6, 1941]

BOTTLENECK ARGUMENTS

Add to the list of inconsistent opposition to the St. Lawrence waterway the testimony of the Great Lakes skipper who is afraid that tramp ocean steamers might run the lake vessels out of business. With the ocean trade crying for cargo carriers (and it will be crying for them for years to come), the ships would all desert such a fine opportunity and crowd into the Lakes.

The antiwaterway arguments are getting thinner and thinner. It might be of interest at this point just to call the roll on them, to see what they are like.

The port of New York is, of course, against the waterway. It wants all the trade to go through its bottleneck.

The port of Boston has registered its opposition with the congressional committee now holding hearings on the latest proposal to build. Look at a map and you see why. Boston, like New York, is on a detour for trade between Europe and the American Middle West. The way to keep the detour open is to keep the main road blocked.

Louisiana has filed a protest with the committee. It is afraid that the State-owned wharves at New Orleans will get less business. This runs counter to the common-sense fact that trade which should go by New Orleans will go that way anyhow, and trade which ought not, should not be forced to do so.

Analyze all these arguments and you find a common base—that of self-interest. Meanwhile, 40,000,000 people in the Lake States must sit and wait, blocked from tidewater except through the bottleneck ports that already exist. The potential shipbuilding industry on the Lakes must wait. The union of American and Canadian defenses that would be promoted by the waterway must get along without it.

For over 2 decades now, since the waterway became an active issue during the first World War, we have had this kind of fooling and jockeying. The war itself taught us the necessity of opening up the Lakes. Opponents said we could not start it then because we were too busy with military affairs. During 22 years of peace they defeated it on other grounds. Now they say it would interfere with the defense program—they are back to the arguments of 1918. If we got out of our present difficulties, they would switch back to the peace arguments, those of the twenties and thirties. When some future war came along, we would be too busy once more.

This ring-around-the-rosie is getting monotonous. Let's build the waterway now, for this and succeeding generations.

The Townsend Plan—Real National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. MARTIN F. SMITH, OF WASHINGTON, AT THE SIXTH NATIONAL CONVENTION OF THE TOWNSEND CLUBS OF AMERICA AT BUFFALO, N. Y., JULY 3, 1941.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert the address which I delivered before the sixth national convention of the Townsend Clubs of America at Buffalo, N. Y., July 3, 1941:

The address is as follows:

Doctor Townsend, Mr. Chairman, my distinguished colleagues, and delegates to this great national convention, I am happy, indeed, to have the honor and privilege of being with you on this auspicious occasion and to again deliver a message, as I have at our previous national conventions, in regard to our progress toward final victory. It is a pleasant experience, I am sure, for all of us, to meet in the Honeymooners' Paradise, which Niagara Falls is often called, and I know that many of our fine Townsend couples are making it a real honeymoon, which will recall joyous memories of the one which they spent together some years ago.

OUR NATIONAL CRISIS

My fellow Americans, we are living in one of the most crucial periods of human history, perhaps the most crucial of all time. The peace-loving people of 15 nations, not one of which desired to go to war and nearly every one of which declared a policy of neutrality, have been overrun by the most cruel and powerful military machine the world has ever seen—Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, Luxemburg, France, Rumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Greece, and also Italy, for Italy has been taken over by Hitler and completely subjugated to the Nazi regime. It remains to be seen how long Russia can withstand the onslaught of the Nazi war machine.

World events of the past 2 years have compelled us to undertake the greatest and most costly national-defense program in our entire history. We have had to look some very grim facts in the face and become realistic in regard to the menace which threatens our own future as a democracy and a free people. We have been forced, reluctantly and perhaps all too slowly, to realize that aid to Britain and the other democracies is an insurance policy to insure our own safety and security and, if possible, to keep war away from the shores of America. If our aid to the democracies fails to prove effective, and Russia succumbs, it is altogether probable that Hitler and his Axis partners, Japan and Italy, will in the very near future also attempt to overrun the following countries: Turkey, Spain, Portugal, the French colonies in Africa, China, the Dutch East Indies, Sweden, Switzerland, Australia, New Zealand, Eire, and Great Britain, whose Navy not only protects the English Channel but also the Atlantic Ocean—the sea lane to America—as well.

It has been repeatedly stated and openly avowed and written in official documents so often that there can be no doubt about their intentions that the Axis dictators, as soon as they have completed these conquests, will immediately devote their efforts to the penetration and conquest of Argentina, Chile, Brazil, the less important nations of South and Central America, and Mexico, which may prove a comparatively easy task for these countries are defenseless against modern warfare. The dictators' plans, their blue prints and their time tables are being rapidly translated into actuality, relentlessly and ruthlessly. They have proclaimed that the world cannot exist half totalitarian and half democratic and that they intend to make it all totalitarian. They intend to continue their conquests until they have completely encircled and truly isolated Canada and the United States, a fact which becomes more evident with the passing of each day.

OUR EFFORTS TO KEEP OUT OF WAR

President Roosevelt and Congress have put forth every possible effort to keep our country out of war and how well we have succeeded is proven by the fact that we are practically the only nation in the world which has not suffered any loss of life or property. In view of all the hazards and dangers to which we have been exposed, and the difficulties with which we have had to contend, this is a remarkable achievement. How thoughtless and unreasonable are those who, in the face of this record, can find it in their minds and hearts to accuse President Roosevelt and those who have supported him of warmongering and seeking to thrust us into war. President Roosevelt has shown more patience and toleration and submitted to greater threats and dangers to our safety and future as a free nation than all the war Presidents in our history combined, including Washington, Lincoln, McKinley, and Wilson. Let us read our histories.

THE PEOPLE'S RESPONSIBILITY

How vital and important is it to the United States that our aid to Britain and the remaining democracies is delivered in time to prevent their defeat and the capture and destruction of the British Navy? It is for the American people, for you, and you, and you, and all the men, women, and children of America, to answer that question, for upon you, and your children, and your children's children, will descend the blessing or the curses.

DOMESTIC DEFENSE

I have supported every national-defense measure, and full aid to Britain, because, as I have indicated, that is aid to America.

I have no sympathy with the views of those misguided and misinformed persons, in and out of public office, who favor our huge appropriations for foreign defense and then want to cut and curtail our appropriations and expenditures for domestic defense. I refer to those who advocate reducing our expenditures for the Civilian Conservation Corps, National Youth Administration, soil conservation, Federal aid to roads, rivers, and harbors, and flood control, rural rehabilitation, food-stamp program, Work Projects Administration appropriations, and farm relief.

I disagree entirely with such a narrow viewpoint and hereby denounce it as undemocratic, unpatriotic, and thoroughly unwise. Indeed, it was such a short-sighted policy of indifference to social welfare which contributed to the downfall of France. I desire to quote from the Washington (D. C.) Post, February 24, 1941, as follows:

"FALL OF FRANCE BLAMED ON LACK OF SOCIAL JUSTICE

"An Austrian-born scholar, journalist, and diplomat told an American University audience yesterday that a main reason France fell was the failure of French democracy to provide social justice.

"Dr. Egon Ranshofen-Wertheimer, a visiting professor of international affairs, said that 'even after the outbreak of war the antagonism between French employers and workers did not come to rest.' He spoke to an audience in Hurst Hall.

"'French democracy had degenerated so far,' he said, 'that great sections of the people did not feel it worth while to sacrifice to maintain it. * * *

"'Had the French people believed their republic meant social justice and something higher than totalitarianism, the disastrous situation would not have arisen.'"

My friends, instead let us continue our program of social justice and economic security and thereby strengthen our national defense by increasing the "stake" which our people have in the preservation of our democracy. Our people will then again prove their loyalty, devotion and sacrifice as they have always done in the past. The Townsend Plan, cost of production for our farmers, a square deal for labor, unemployment relief, are just as essential to our national defense—if not more so—than planes, battleships, tanks, guns, and munitions. We are not going to repeat the mistakes and defeatism of France; we are going to insure victory by practicing the virtues of true American democracy. In the words of President Roosevelt, quoting from his Annual Message to Congress: "Certainly this is not the time to stop thinking about the social and economic problems which are the root cause of the social revolution which is today a supreme factor in the world."

PRESIDENT FAVORS NATIONAL PENSION

President Roosevelt, in his address before the national convention of the International Teamsters Union, held in Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., September 11, 1940, advocated a national system of old-age pensions, which is the Townsend formula, national in scope, uniform in every State, and financed by a national tax.

H. R. 1036, O'CONNOR BILL

It is estimated that under our present Townsend bill, H. R. 1036, introduced by our able colleague, Congressman JAMES F. O'CONNOR, of Montana, the sum of approximately $50 per month would be paid to our senior citizens who have attained the age of 60 years, based upon our present gross national income. With the increase in the national income, which will be considerably increased this year due to the national-defense expenditures, and the consequent increase in the volume and velocity of business turnover by the forced spending of these pensions within 30 days as required in the law, the amount of the pension payment would necessarily and gradually be increased also. Instead of paying $45 to $50 per month, as we would at the start, that sum would gradually increase as the volume of business and money placed in circulation increases.

The needs clause—which is one of the worst features of the present Social Security Act—is eliminated. Our senior citizens are now subjected to an inquisition—wholly un-American—and have to take a pauper's oath in order to establish their eligibility for the small amount paid. They are subjected to all the embarrassment and humiliation resulting from a callous probe of their personal affairs and cruel snooping into the most sacred details of their personal lives and in many cases constituting a species of persecution. We strike that abominable proviso from our bill and say that our senior citizens and builders, those who have materially assisted in building our country of today, shall receive their payment not as a matter of grace, but as a matter of right—deferred compensation, if you please, for past services rendered.

Authorities are agreed that our prosperity is measured to a great extent by the velocity of our money turn-over and the Townsend plan by accelerating and speeding up the spending and expenditure of $6,000,000,000 annually, divided among 10,000,000 persons past 60, would step up the tempo of circulation sufficiently to give employment to several million citizens whose services would be required to produce the added foods and merchandise which would be purchased, and sold by the merchant, storekeeper, and farmer. These facts are elementary and so self-evident that I shall not, for I have not the time to, cite and tabulate the mass of figures and calculations which have been compiled by numerous statistical organizations and departments of our own Government. They are contained in dozens of studies and surveys which are available to those interested and they have been placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD many times during the past 6 years. Congressman O'CONNOR and I inserted some of these figures in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on February 18, 1941, and "those who run may read."

REAL NATIONAL DEFENSE

There is a certain irony in connection with the vast, colossal, and staggering sums which we are appropriating in Congress these days for national defense and for aid to Britain, and as I have stated, I have voted for all of them. But I cannot help thinking about those of my colleagues who for years have bitterly opposed the Townsend plan, decent housing, slum clearance, public improvements, all social-welfare reforms because of the cost involved. They have always argued that we could not afford to do these things for our senior citizens, for our less fortunate citizens, for our young men and young women, for the boys and girls of America. They always have asked and never answered themselves the question: "Where are we going to get the money?" What a silly, nonsensical question to ask in the largest, greatest, richest country, with the greatest wealth, natural resources, and productive capacity of any country in the world, in which our national income in one single year is twice our entire national debt, and if we utilized our full productive capacity of goods and services, we can produce in wealth in 1 year three times the amount of our national debt.

The irony—aye, the tragedy—of the present situation is that those who opposed and would not vote for appropriations and expenditures to construct a finer America and bring manifold blessings to her communities and her citizens, young and old, are now compelled to vote 10, 20, 30 times as much money for the weapons of death and destruction. Is it a punishment visited upon us by the Judge of the Universe? It should make every Member of Congress think—and doubtless will before our present national crisis has run its course—for there are valuable lessons to be learned by all of us from the experiences of these momentous days.

We are going to continue our fight for the Townsend plan until the fight is won. We have more support now than we have ever had. Members of Congress are being converted to the soundness of a national system uniform throughout the Nation, financed by a national tax. They are dissatisfied with the present Social Security Act, with its State contributory and noncontributory system, and the un-American "needs" inquisitory test; they are discovering that money can be provided to save, to conserve, to sweeten life, as well as to maim, to cripple, and to destroy life.

APPLIED CHRISTIANITY

Those who have spurned and rejected the principles and teachings of Christianity on the alleged ground that these teachings are impractical are now being totally discredited. They have asserted their own realism and scoffed and sneered at what they have termed the impractical idealism of the Christian religion. The rulers of governments and those in high places in the fields of politics, education, business, and finance, and the arts and sciences, have a fearful responsibility to answer for. They have led mankind down into the darkest abyss and the blackest hell into which the human race has ever been plunged. These blind leaders have been proven to be wholly impractical and unrealistic. Their entire fabric of life, society, and business has crumbled and collapsed, and the idealism of the Christian religion is emerging from the wreck and chaos as the only realistic and practical way of life.

The Townsend plan is just one phase of applied Christianity, and I am glad to have the privilege of calling attention to that fact. It squares with the economics of the Old Testament. It is enjoined by the central commandment, the fifth commandment, Honor thy father and thy mother and thou shalt live long in the land. I called attention several years ago, and desire to remind you on this occasion, that in the Book of Numbers, viii: 25, God commanded Moses to retire the Levites at the age of 50 although they were to minister with their brethren. The Townsend plan is very similar to the plan of restoration to the aged proclaimed in the Book of Nehemiah, v: 1-2. The prophet also outlawed usury, which is undoubtedly the greatest curse of the human race, and the Townsend plan, by diminishing the scarcity of money in circulation, would be a decided step in the direction of abolishing usury.

The Gideons have done a wonderful work in placing Bibles in our hotels for the use and benefit of our traveling salesmen and all the guests. However, they have overlooked the largest semihostelry in America. They could accomplish a world of good by placing a Bible in the office of every Member of the House and Senate in the Congress of the United States at Washington, D. C., where very few offices have Bibles, and very few Members ever read the Bible. The Gideons would spread more light in dark places than they could anywhere, not even excepting darkest Africa, for we have heathen in Washington whom the foreign missionaries have never as yet reached with the Bible message.

In the Books of Exodus and Deuteronomy we find many passages and references to a plan sanctioned and ordained by God, which is very similar to the Townsend plan. The Townsend plan is in harmony with the Scriptures, and is a practical application of the economics and social teachings of the Holy Bible. As such, it is certain to be enacted into the law of the land, for as we approach Armageddon, "men's minds and hearts will turn to the Lord."

Paderewski

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN LESINSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

EULOGIES BY REV. ALEXANDER SYSKI, ST. MARY'S COLLEGE, ORCHARD LAKE, MICH., AND F. X. SWIETLIK, CENSOR OF THE POLISH NATIONAL ALLIANCE

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the eulogies by the Reverend Alexander Syski, of St. Mary's College, Orchard Lake, Mich., and F. X. Swietlik, censor of the Polish National Alliance, delivered during the interment of the remains of Ignace Jan Paderewski at Arlington National Cemetery on July 5, 1941:

ADDRESS OF REV. ALEXANDER SYSKI

Your Excellency Apostolic Delegate to the United States, Your Excellencies Representatives of the President and the Government of the United States and of the Allied Nations, Your Excellency Ambassador of the Republic of Poland, bereaved sister of the deceased, Americans of Polish descent, People of Poland: At the funeral of immortal Skarga only a Skarga should preach. There is no eloquent Skarga among us today, yet silence at this funeral, which has brought us here together, would be a sin.

Since we cannot speak with the eloquence of Skarga, then at least let the mourning and lamenting that this day have broken from the breast of the Polish Nation as it sobs over this coffin be heard over all Poland and over all the world.

"Let tears run down like a torrent night and day; give thyself no rest, and let not the apple of the eye cease," O Polish Nation, because "a prince and a great man is slain this day in Israel."

Need I mention his name? There is no name for him, because every name is too small. His name represents millions. He was cradled in the bed of pain on which the Polish Nation lies. From his cold hand upon the land of graves, flooded today with torrents of blood, has fallen the scepter of the sovereign who succeeded Mickiewicz and Sienkiewicz as the Spirit-King of martyred Poland.

Where was his spirit realm? Alas, let us not ask. He was Poland's sun, her resplendent majesty. He lived in our thoughts of Poland, thoughts which today fairly burst our temples. He lived in our emotions, which this day threaten to burn our hearts to ashes. He was the soul and heart of the nation. He was the chariot and the driver of Israel, like Elias of old.

And as he traveled with us, leading the nation toward the liberation of Poland, suddenly that fiery chariot and fiery horses from heaven parted us asunder. Like Elias, he went up from us by a whirlwind to heaven, leaving us alone. Like Eliseus, wringing our hands, we cry: "Father, Father, the chariot of Israel and the driver thereof!"

Thus we cry, gazing heavenward. We see him no longer, but he hears our sobbing. Moved, he takes hold of the garment of his spirit and rents it in two pieces and lets fall into our hands the mantle of Elias in words radiant with power: "God and Country!"

And returning, Eliseus took up the mantle of Elias from the ground and twice struck the waters of the Jordan with it—as Holy Writ tells us. And behold, the waters were divided, and Eliseus passed over them. And the sons of the prophets of Jericho, seeing this, came to meet him. And falling to the ground, they worshiped him and said: "The spirit of Elias hath rested upon Eliseus."

O Polish Nation! thou art Eliseus. Thy sun has set amid lightning and thunder. Thy enemies have opened their mouths. They jeer and gnash their teeth and say: "Now we shall soon devour them. This is the day. Their strong man is slain. Their Spirit-King, their Elias, is taken from them."

O Polish Nation! thou art Eliseus. The sun of Poland has set. Our Spirit-King, our Elias, has been taken from us, but he has not left us orphans. He lets fall from heaven his mantle. He gives us his testament.

We believe in God, let us believe in the testament of our Spirit-King and Elias. "God and Country!" This is the testament he leaves us, as from the clavichord of life and labor he raises to God his white, lilly-like hands.

O Holy God, Mighty God, Holy and Immortal, deign to look down upon those hands which he raises to you this day from his coffin in supplication for the freedom of his country. See, they are unmarred by any injustice or blood of man. With his spotless palms he places into Thy hands Poland's cause. He preserved unscathed the glorious name of his country. He did not weaken in spirit. Though burdened with sorrow and pain, he did not bow in defeat. That is his testament.

Brothers! Brothers! What have we lived to see? What has come upon us? What do we witness? What are we doing? We are laying Paderewski to rest. We are reading aloud his testament. Immortal in life, he entered unaided, as a genius and a hero, the Pantheon not of Poland alone but of the world and of humanity. And we here return his body to mother earth.

Eternal rest grant him, O Lord, and let perpetual light shine upon him forever and ever. Amen.

ADDRESS OF THE HONORABLE F. X. SWIETLIK

We are assembled in this Pantheon of American heroes to pay our last tribute to one of the great men of our generation—Ignace Jan Paderewski.

Our President has graciously suggested that his mortal remains find a temporary resting place in this national shrine until the time arrives when his native land, martyred Poland, will again eject the invaders from her soil, and take her rightful place among the free nations of the world. No act of our President could be more expressive of the identity of ideals of freedom which animate America and Poland, and of the strong ties of friendship which bind these two Nations than this noble gesture of good will. Arlington is the last resting place of American military and naval heroes.

Paderewski will not be among strangers. The freedom for which they fought and died was the burning passion of his entire life.

While the world acclaims him as a great artist, whose musical genius enriched the souls of millions in many lands for upward of a half century, history will also acclaim him as one of the greatest, if not the greatest statesman of his generation.

And if I were to search in our history for some distinguished American who possessed that love of humanity, unswerving devotion to the cause of freedom, and all those noble and lovable attributes of character which we so admire in the life of Paderewski, I would point to our martyr Abraham Lincoln. For where can be found language which more eloquently portrays the character and life of Paderewski than the immortal words spoken by Lincoln in his second inaugural address:

"With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right."

Poland owes Paderewski a great debt of gratitude for what he had done for her in her days of trial, but a similar debt of gratitude is owning him from every man who loves freedom, and who believes that love of country and devotion to a great cause are ideals worthy of our greatest efforts. Paderewski cannot be replaced. In the words of an eminent American scholar: He was a man of whom any civilization in any age could justly be proud.

It is no wonder, therefore, that his death was the occasion of so spontaneous and universal an outpouring of sorrow throughout this civilized world.

America loved Ignace Jan Paderewski, she admired his genius, his devotion to the cause of his native land, and always welcomed him to her shores as a conquering hero. She stands at his bier today, her head bowed in deep sorrow.

No man more eloquently expressed America's admiration for this great man than did an eminent statesman and a former Ambassador to Great Britain, John W. Davis. Presiding at a gathering of eminent Americans in the Hotel Astor in New York City, when Mr. Paderewski made one of his usual eloquent pleas on behalf of his native Poland, Mr. Davis turned to the honor guest of the evening and said: "Mr. Paderewski, of all men born on foreign shores, you are the closest to the hearts of the American people." The entire audience arose to give their unqualified approval to that sentiment. Paderewski reciprocated that sentiment, because, next to his beloved Poland, no other country was as close to his heart as was our own country.

Let us hope that his exile from his native land will be of short duration. At this very moment the brave sons of Poland are battling courageously at the side of Great Britain, who is so gallantly and at such great sacrifice opposing the forces of evil, and to restore freedom to all downtrodden nations.

They are determined to continue that fight until freedom is restored to their native land. When that moment arrives, and let us all hope that it will arrive soon, Paderewski will return home to find a final resting place in Poland's Pantheon in the Wawel Cathedral. There he will rest beside the heroes of Poland's past, whose deeds of valor earned for their country, in the words of an eminent American author the enviable title of Poland, the Knight Among Nations.

Reduction of Nondefense Expenditures

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. E. COX

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

EXTRACT OF LETTER FROM A CONSTITUENT

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following portion of a letter which I recently received from a constituent:

JUNE 26, 1941.

Hon. E. E. COX,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN COX: The National Economy League, a private, nonpartisan research organization, founded in 1932, has circulated the following petition throughout its Nation-wide membership and other citizens' groups:

"We, the undersigned, earnestly urge that the Congress of the United States, while imposing additional taxes of $3,500,000,000 upon the people, reduce to a minimum unnecessary nondefense expenditures. The Secretary of the Treasury has stated that a saving of $1,000,000,000 can be made. The Brookings Institution, in pamphlet No. 26, estimates a possible saving of between $2,000,000,000 and $3,000,000,000. Studies by the National Economy League show possible savings of over $1,600,000,000. We urge the following savings of $1,652,000,000 in nondefense expenditures, without cutting a penny from defense and without jeopardy to any citizen:

	1942 Budget	Recommended savings
Genera Government	$907,000,000	$100,000,000
Public works	503,000,000	263,000,000
Work relief	1,034,000,000	479,000,000
Civilian Conservation Corps and National Youth Administration, nondefense	363,000,000	201,000,000
Aids to agriculture	1,062,000,000	562,000,000
All other nondefense	2,716,000,000	47,000,000
	6,675,000,000	1,652,000,000

"Your petitioners make this plea with firm resolve that the people's confidence in popular government shall not be undermined by failure to turn our full economic strength to national defense."

A total of 14,680 citizens from 41 States have signified their desires for reductions in nondefense expenditures by signing the above petition.

* * * * *

Very truly yours,
H. G. W. SUNDELOF,
Executive Director.

Stop Negro Discrimination in Our Defense Industries

REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to protest the discrimination against our Negro population in the defense industries. If we can take our colored boys, put them in camp and eventually make cannon fodder out of them, we should give some consideration to their brothers at home and permit the trained and skilled colored workers an opportunity to work in defense industry. Today in many cases they find the door locked against them because of their color.

It will not do to try to recommend our four freedoms to the world if we do not practice democracy at home. I hesitate to say what the morale of the colored boy in the Army will be when he contemplates the fact that his brother, his father, and his sister back home cannot receive any work in the defense industries because of their color. It is a crying shame, that out of a population of 13,000,000 Negroes, all Americans, they are not aliens—thousands and thousands are willing to work and help the Government, but cannot get work because certain industries draw the color line.

Mr. Speaker, the Negro has come a long way in the field of progress since the Emancipation Proclamation which broke the shackles that bound him to slavery. Despite the fact that he was made a freeman as a result of the Civil War, and the institution of human slavery abolished for all time in America, the Negro was still subjected to a form of slavery, an economic slavery with its attendant discrimination and intolerance toward the Negro because of his color.

In ordinary times this discrimination asserts itself in the industrial life of many communities, and it is very difficult for the Negro or friends of the Negro to overcome this obstacle, because many of these industries are privately controlled. But in times like these when the Government has supervision and control over practically all our defense industries, there is no fundamental reason why this discrimination against Negroes should continue.

At an early stage of our defense program the National Defense Commission declared:

Workers should not be discriminated against because of age, sex, race, or color.

The Selective Service Act passed in September 1940 provided that:

In the selection and training of men there should be no discrimination against any person on account of race or color.

Following up this policy the Office of Production Management recently wrote to all defense contractors informing them that in many localities there are workers available who are not being hired, solely because of their racial identity and because of this situation many Negro workers of skills and aptitudes are not being included in many of the training programs for defense. Such practices, the O. P. M. declared, are extremely wasteful of our human resources and prevent a total effort for national defense. In many sections of the Nation, continues the O. P. M., there are today available labor reserves of Negro workers. Plans for their training and employment in capacities commensurate with their individual skills and aptitudes should be undertaken at once.

Since the declaration of this policy there has been some improvement in breaking down discrimination against the Negro. The N. Y. A. is training some Negro youths for defense work. Here and there, carpenters and some other tradesmen are employed, but not in sufficient numbers to absorb the great number of skilled Negroes available at the present time.

The President of the United States recently urged industry to consider the availability of the Negro worker for employment.

In some jurisdictions local committees of citizens composed of Negroes and whites banded together seeking at least a partial solution of the problem. More of these committees are necessary, in my opinion, to convince the employers in these defense industries that the Negro certainly has his place in the defense program, that he is willing and able to play his part, if only given the opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, it is almost beyond understanding we who boast of our democratic processes and who condemn, and very properly so, the spread of the totalitarian philosophies abroad would not in the first place seek to remedy conditions at home. It is regrettable that there is more intolerance in the United States of America, more racial and religious bigotry than in any other part of the world.

It is not a pleasant fact to recall that there has been in the United States since 1882, 5,000 lynchings of the whites and blacks, but mostly blacks. The Negro has come a long way from slavery and has literally lifted himself up by his own boot straps.

Dr. R. R. Moton in his book, The Progress of a Race, has said that no race in such a limited period and under such circumstances has made more progress than the Negro in the United States of America. Instead of being discouraged over conditions which he has not been able to control, the Negro has simply faced the situation, forged ahead, and written on the pages of history a record which has challenged the attention and respect of the entire civilized world.

In 1860 the total Negro population of the United States, 4,441,830.

In 1930 the total Negro population of the United States, 11,890,143.

In 1940, according to the latest figures, the Negro population was approximately 13,000,000.

Cursed with illiteracy while held in human bondage the Negro has made a rapid decrease in illiteracy since he was made a freeman. In 1930 the percentage of illiteracy was 16.3 of the Negroes 10 years old and over, as compared with 22.9 percent in 1920, 30.4 percent in 1910, 44.5 percent in 1900, 57.1 percent in 1890, 70 percent in 1880, and 81.4 percent in 1870. The figures for 1940 are not available, but they are sure to indicate a substantial decline in illiteracy over those figures presented in 1930.

In the field of organization splendid progress has been made by the Negro. I recite the following as only partial list of splendid organizations destined to improve the social and economic life of our colored brethren.

ORGANIZATIONS

Educational: American Negro Academy, New York; Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools for Negroes, national; Association of College Women, national; Association of Teachers in Colored Schools, national; Congress of Colored Parents and Teachers, national.

School fraternities, 6; school sororities, 9.

Organizations for economic advancement: Alliance of Postal Employees; Association of Colored Railway Trainmen; Association of Head Waiters, national; Association of Underwriters of Negro Insurance Companies; Beauty Culturist League, national; and 11 others on a national scale.

Organizations for professional advancement: National Negro Bar Association, Colored Graduate Nurses, National Dental Association, National Hospital Association, National Medical Association, National Association of Negro Musicians.

Organizations for general advancement: National Urban League, New York; National Negro Congress; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

NEGROES IN PROFESSIONS

The number of Negroes in professional service in 1890 was 32,878. In 1930, 135,925 were engaged in professions, an increase of 100,000.

NEGROES IN TRADES

In 1890, 172,970. The number in 1930 was 1,024,656, an increase in 40 years of 851,686.

A summary of progress for 70 years

	1866	1936	Gain in 70 years
Economic progress:
Homes owned	12,000	750,000	738,000
Farms operated	20,000	880,000	860,000
Business conducted	2,100	70,000	67,900
Wealth accumulated	$20,000,000	$2,500,000,000	$2,480,000,000
Educational progress:
Percent literate	10	90	80
Schools of higher training	15	200	785
Students in public schools	100,000	2,500,000	2,400,000
Teachers in all schools	600	55,000	54,400
Religious progress:
Number of churches	700	45,000	44,300
Value of church property	$1,500,000	$210,000,000	$208,500,000

Since 1874, 155 Negroes have been elected to Phi Beta Kappa Fraternity; 132 doctors of philosophy.

The outstanding Negroes in music and arts are Marian Anderson, Dorothy Mainor, Paul Robeson, Roland Hayes, Ethel Waters, and Duke Ellington; in education, Dr. M. W. Johnson, R. R. Moton, Carter G. Woodson; in science, George W. Carver; in politics, Hon. Arthur Mitchell and Oscar DePriest; in literature, James Weldon Johnson, Paul Lawrence Dunbar, W. E. B. DuBois, Alain Locke, and Benjamin Brawley; in poetry, Langston Hughes, Claude McKay, Countee Cullen, and Jessie Fauset; and in the sports, Joe Louis, Jesse Owens, and Ralph Metcalfe.

The military record of the colored soldiers of the United States is one that every American should be proud of. Negroes have fought voluntarily in every war in which this Nation has engaged. They earned the commendation of Gen. George Washington; they fought with Oliver Perry at the Battle of Lake Erie; and with Andrew Jackson at the siege of New Orleans, in the War of 1812. There were several regiments of colored fighters in the Civil War, and 1 out of every 10 American soldiers in the first World War was a Negro. President Theodore Roosevelt on many occasions paid tribute to the valor and bravery of the Negro troops who served during the Spanish-American War, and every military commander who has had contact with the Negro in military service has paid tribute to the military record of these men for faithfulness, zeal, and patriotic fervor.

Col. James A. Moss, commander of the Three Hundred and Sixty-seventh Infantry, who was born and reared in Louisiana, and served for 18 years with the colored troops, said:

If properly trained and instructed, the colored man makes as good a soldier as the world has ever seen. I commanded colored troops in the Cuban campaign and in the Philippine campaign, and I have had some of them killed and wounded at my side. At no time have they ever faltered at the command to advance or hesitate at the order to charge.

Mr. Speaker, is it any wonder that the Negro gets discouraged at times when the doors of opportunity are closed to him because of his color and becomes an easy prey for demagogues or communistic leaders who preach to him the doctrine of racial equality?

In our metropolitan cities you will find large groups of Negroes centered together in their own community preferring to live in close proximity with one another just as other racial groups. There you will find a family life comparable to other segments of our population. It is true that in many sections of these industrial cities the Negroes, like a great many of their poor white brethren, are forced to live in what is sometimes called the slum sections of these cities, under insanitary conditions, and faces, because of these conditions, hardships and a high mortality rate. The Federal Government has assisted materially in remedying these conditions during the past few years by eliminating slums and erecting in their place modern housing, which is bound to have an effect on the health and welfare of these underprivileged people.

I am happy to record that since I have been a Member of Congress I have supported such a program. I have cooperated with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, seeking to write on the statute books of the Nation an anti-lynching law. Twice this measure passed the House of Representatives but failed of consideration in the Senate. Just as the Congress did enact antikidnaping legislation it is certain some day to wipe out this foul blot upon our national history, the crime of lynching of human beings without due process of law.

The splendid advancement made by the Negroes in the field of education insures a strong leadership among this group. Thousands of young men and women are coming out of our high schools and colleges each year, trained to meet the social and political problems of their communities. No longer are they the tools of unscrupulous politicians, who express their friendship on election day and turn their back to them after the sun has set the same evening. No longer do the Negroes in most part vote as Democrat or Republican. They are today exercising intelligence and independent action when they go to the polls in any election.

That there are bad Negroes as well as bad whites all of us must readily admit. It was my experience as a judge for 8 years that when numerous Negroes were sentenced for petty crimes the average was not more than the whites in proportion to the population. The study of the facts revealed to me that there would be less petty crime and delinquency among the Negroes as well as the whites if society afforded a better environment, more opportunity for work, and better sanitary living conditions.

It is my opinion that there is a definite responsibility upon the leaders of the local government and the Nation to respond whenever possible to the assistance of the Negro, and all other groups who are endeavoring to better their social and economic welfare, and who profess an unqualified loyalty to the free institutions of America. Such assistance will pay dividends in years to come and will insure the gratitude of generations yet unborn.

Service Program of the D. A. V.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED. V. IZAC

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, a recent conversation with the National Service Director of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, Miliard W. Rice, concerning various matters of interest to his group, reminded me of the fact that I am myself a member of that esteemed organization of America's wounded, gassed, and disabled World War veterans.

During these trying days of intensive preparation to provide adequate defense for America, we must not permit ourselves to forget America's disabled defenders of the past.

I think it would be appropriate to take advantage of this occasion to tell Members of Congress something about the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, commonly referred to as the D. A. V.

D. A. V. MEMEERSHIP ELIGIBILITY

Formed in 1920 and chartered by Congress in 1932, to render service to, for, and by disabled veterans, the D. A. V. has, since its inception, been the spokesman for disabled World War veterans in Congress and before its various committees, as well as before the Veterans' Administration and its regional offices and facilities.

As implied by its name, the Disabled American Veterans of the World War is composed exclusively of honorably discharged World War veterans who were wounded, gassed, injured, or disabled in or by reason of their World War service. Its membership therefore is composed of a very exclusive class.

Active membership in the D. A. V. can only be secured by those Americans whose bodies bear the scars of wounds or injuries or the blight of disease or disability incurred by reason of their World War service. Less than 10 percent of all living World War veterans are therefore eligible for membership in this rather selective organization.

Wearing the emblem of the D. A. V.—which, by the way, is a replica of the Accolade of Chivalry, portrayed on the wound certificates issued by President Woodrow Wilson—is therefore to wear a badge of honor, indicating that the wearer has sacrificed a part of his blood, a part of his body, or a part of his health in the Nation's most hazardous employment, serving in its armed forces during time of war.

The wearer of a D. A. V. emblem button can be proud of such proof of his patriotism—a real badge of honor.

No one certainly can justly question the true Americanism and patriotism of those who have paid such a high price as proof of their patriotism.

D. A. V. membership is restricted to those American citizens who have earned it by sacrificing their youth and a part of their bodies, or a part of the health of their minds or bodies, in service for our beloved country. There are no other limitations as to membership eligibility. Its membership, therefore, includes men who are Protestants, Jews, Catholics, Mohammedans, and Buddhists, of many different racial origins, engaged in various types of employment, if any, receiving incomes from the lowest up to the higher brackets, including both the humble and prominent; the poor and the rich; former buck privates, corporals, sergeants, lieutenants, captains, majors, colonels, and generals; the employed, the unemployables and the unemployed employables; the uninformed and the well-informed; the helpless and the helpful—a typical cross-section of American citizenry.

During its existence, the D. A. V. has elected former privates, corporals, sergeants, lieutenants, captains, and a general to the office of national commander. Its leaders have had service in Uncle Sam's Infantry, Artillery, Air Corps, Marine Corps, and Navy. It has been led by Jew, Catholic, and protestant. Its present national commander is Vincent E. Schoeck, a prominent attorney in Detroit, Mich. All of these men, with divergent backgrounds, have found a common ground in the D. A. V.—the union of America's disabled defenders—to help to render service to those who need service.

D. A. V. NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS

The D. A. V. has had its national headquarters, almost since its inception, at 2840 Melrose Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio. National Adjutant Vivian D. Corbly has been secretary-manager of the organization and editor of its newspaper since 1925. Capt. Cicero F. Hogan is his assistant.

An excellent newspaper is published by the national headquarters, the Disabled American Veterans Semimonthly, containing accurate, up-to-date information as to the developments concerning all legislation—proposed and already a part of our Federal statutes—Presidential Executive orders, court decisions, Attorney General's opinions, Comptroller General's opinions, and Veterans' Administration regulations, service letters, and other policy matters of interest to veterans.

No disabled veteran is doing right by himself, and those dear to him, if he deprives himself of the interesting news and valuable information in the Disabled American Veterans Semimonthly.

D. A. V. LEGISLATIVE ACCOMPLISHMENTS

During the 21 years of its history, the D. A. V. has initiated much liberalizing legislation on behalf of various groups of disabled veterans and their dependents and has also been largely responsible for the issuance of many liberalizing regulations by the Veterans' Administration from time to time, too numerous and too technical for me to set forth to you in detail at this time.

In spite of the enactment of many Federal and State laws, there are still many inadequacies, inequities, and inequalities of the privileges, preferences, and benefits as to and among various classifications of service-connected and service-connectable disabled veterans and their dependents, which the D. A. V. is striving to have corrected by proposed legislation. Its national service director, Millard W. Rice, has been vigorously pushing forward such objectives in hearings before the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, as well as before other committees of the United States House of Representatives and of the United States Senate.

The D. A. V., as the recognized voice of the Nation's World War disabled, concentrates its collective strength to protect and to advance the best interests of its members and eligibles, and of their dependents, thus helping them, their respective local communities, and our country. Its constitution forbids it to take part, officially, in any partisan political, industrial, or religious disputes. Its national policies, as well as its national officers, are decided upon at national conventions, to which delegates are sent directly by local chapters, thus democratically providing for finding out and abiding by the expressed wishes of the majority.

NATIONAL SERVICE SET-UP

The D. A. V. has had the offices of its National Service Bureau, also almost from its inception, in the Munsey Building, in Washington, D. C., where it now has nine service experts to advise and to assist deserving veterans in the technical and legal prosecution of their equitable claims for compensation, pension, medical treatment, hospitalization, insurance benefits, and in securing suitable gainful employment, private or public.

The national service director, with the assistant national service director, Thomas J. Kehoe, has supervision of the office of the National Service Bureau in Washington, D. C., and also exercises supervision over the services of the organization's 38 nationally paid national service officers—who, incidentally, receive very inadequate salaries, ranging from only $20 to $200 per month, depending upon the number of D. A. V. members in their respective States—as well as over its 56 unpaid national service officers and its 807 voluntary chapter service officers.

All of these unselfish, self-sacrificing officers are themselves disabled veterans. All of them have had the experience of prosecuting their own claims for service connection and compensation. All of them know, by reason of personal experience, of the difficulties and handicaps with which disabled veterans are confronted in their efforts to obtain and retain suitable gainful employment. These D. A. V. service officers know all about the complications and technicalities that disabled veterans must overcome legally to prove the service connections of their disabilities to the satisfaction of the claims and rating agencies of the Veterans' Administration. They understand, of course, that officials of the Veterans' Administration must adhere to the laws as enacted by Congress, with their limitations and restrictions as legalistically interpreted and as administratively applied.

D. A. V. service officers well know that being equitably entitled to service connection and compensation for a disability, by reason of the handicap of such disability, is not the same as being legally entitled thereto.

Because of their understanding of these various problems with which disabled veterans are baffled, these service officers of the D. A. V. are naturally sympathetic to disabled claimants in their efforts to overcome such difficulties. I think it is safe to say that a person who himself has experienced some of the complexities incident to proving himself entitled to certain benefits because of a disability which he is convinced was caused by his World War service, and who himself has had the experience of trying to overcome the handicap caused by such disability, is, consequently, in a better position to advise and to assist other disabled veterans in the solution of their various problems, understandingly, sympathetically, and effectively.

D. A. V. SERVICE ACTIVITIES

The services and accomplishments of these national D. A. V. service officers during the past 12 years is indicated by the following brief résumé, compiled for me by Millard W. Rice, national service director:

Claims handled	672,695
Hospitalizations and medical examinations obtained	73,064
Appearances before rating agencies	164,608
Favorable decisions	90,787
Total monetary benefits	$51,433,774.88

It is, of course, impossible for a brief statistical résumé to indicate the many different types of services extended by service officers. Many liberalizing precedents have been established on the basis of cases handled by D. A. V. service officers, which subsequently have proven of value to hundreds or thousands of disabled veterans having similar claims, the results of which cannot appear in the reports of such national service officers.

These compensation payments for more than 90,787 disabled veterans, and their dependents, have converted such individual disabled veterans from local liabilities into local community assets, bringing increased compensation payments into every community, thus increasing the distribution of purchasing power in such communities, with consequent benefits to each community and its citizens, as well as to each State, directly and indirectly.

Many disabled veterans who gained experience originally as chapter and national service officers for the D. A. V. thereafter have become national service officers, national service directors, national legislative representatives, national adjutants, and other types of service-giving officers of other national veteran organizations.

FINANCING THE D. A. V.

The principal source of income for the D. A. V., by which to maintain this extensive service program, has been through the support of individual disabled veterans themselves, by their payment of membership dues in the D. A. V., through its 37 departments and 807 chapters.

A national per capita tax of $3 per member per year is paid by each local chapter to national headquarters.

Those disabled veterans who have supported the D. A. V.—representing the collective voice of, by, and for disabled veterans—have so earnestly believed in its past accomplishments, in its current service program, and in its objectives for the future as to be willing to make the necessary sacrifices for payments of annual membership dues, which, by the way, average about $4 in most of the local chapters.

During the past 3 years the D. A. V. has extended to its membership the opportunity to acquire life membership, upon payment of $50, generally by a cash payment of $5 or more, plus $1 or more per month until paid. More than 43 percent of all D. A. V. members are now partial or full life members.

Disabled veterans who are members of the D. A. V. realize that it does not have any mysterious source of income. They realize that its strength, prestige, and ability to accomplish constructive services on behalf of individual disabled veterans, and their dependents, rests entirely upon the united force of all of those who are prompted to become and to remain paid-up members of their own outfit.

Local chapters of the D. A. V. finance their own social-service and relief activities out of their portion of annual membership dues, by annual forget-me-not drives, and by such small finance-raising projects as dances, and so forth.

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS SERVICE FOUNDATION

Some donations, but not nearly enough, are made each year to the Disabled American Veterans Service Foundation, incorporated under the laws of the State of Ohio, and regarded as the D. A. V.'s incorporated trusteeship. Five trustees, all of them now past national commanders, are elected by each national convention for a 5-year term, the term of one of them expiring each year, whereas two additional trustees (generally the current national commander and national judge advocate) are elected each year for 1-year terms. This method of electing the trustees was designed to give assurance of real continuity to the policies of the D. A. V. Service Foundation, as to the conservation and administration of its funds, and as to the appropriations therefrom once each year to the National D. A. V. itself, for the maintenance of its national service officers in the various States.

Donations to the Disabled American Veterans Service Foundation have been made by disabled men each year in sums that have ranged from $1 to $200—generally totalling only about $1,000 each year.

This D. A. V. Service Foundation has also been the beneficiary of bequests made in the wills of several disabled veterans. Contributions, moreover, have also been received from other social-service minded citizens.

NEED FOR D. A. V.

D. A. V. members are aware of the fact that the Disabled American Veterans has, in whole, or in part, been responsible for much legislation which has directly benefited thousands of disabled veterans who have never become associated as members—some because they know nothing about the organization, others because they are indifferent to the need for collective action, still others because they are too unthinking or too selfish, and many who have persuaded themselves that they cannot financially afford it.

It is a strange commentary upon human nature that this comparatively small organization of disabled veterans has continued to render very valuable service to thousands of individual disabled veterans in helping them to prove up service connections, secure increased compensation, hospitalization, insurance benefits, and so forth, apparently without their feeling any gratitude for such valuable service, apparently without the realization that they have been free wheeling, and that the service which they have secured has been paid for by other disabled veterans no better off financially, if as well, to contribute to the helping-hand effort, through membership in the D. A. V., to provide for its Nation-wide service set-up.

Every social-minded disabled veteran who is anxious to protect the benefits which may have been awarded to him, and at the same time to help secure needed benefits for other veterans who are even less fortunate, ought to be a paid-up member, if not also an active member, of the Disabled American Veterans—generally recognized as the official spokesman for America's World War disabled.

Helping disabled veterans to help themselves and getting the help of the Nation for those who need help—a big dividend-paying investment in real Americanism—is the self-appointed task of the D. A. V.

Fellow citizens frequently need to be reminded, by an organization such as the D. A. V.—composed exclusively of, by, and for disabled veterans—that an important factor in providing security for America is for America to provide security for its own citizens, and particularly for its disabled defenders of the past, as well as of the future.

America can always feel assured that it will be enthusiastically protected and defended so long as America remembers to protect and defend its protectors and defenders.

An Invasion or an Occupation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. WILLIAM DITTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, increasing apprehension is developing over contemplated economic policies of the administration which appear to threaten the survival of free enterprise under our capitalistic system. While the expansion of the defense program may account for the imposition of certain unusual limitations, nevertheless, there are indications which cannot be ignored that drastic controls are in the offing.

Men who have given careful thought to the tendencies and trends of recent years are fearful that an invasion of a temporary character into the fields of private enterprise is intended as a preliminary to a permanent occupation.

Since 1933 Government controls and regulations of business on an ever-widening front have been urged by keymen of the administration. In fact, this policy has been a part of the fundamental philosophy of the New Deal. Under the N. R. A. industry was required to toe the mark as orders were issued from Washington on production and prices. Agriculture was to come under the thumb of Government regulations as the A. A. A. sought to establish its limitations on the kind and capacity of farm productivity. The intention was to project the edicts of Government managers into every field of private enterprise to make it conform to the plans and specifications of theoretical specialists who had little, if any, practical experience. Only the decisions of the Supreme Court prevented the execution of the program which was designed to delegate absolute discretionary power to the executive branch of the Government over the business life of the Nation.

Under these circumstances it is but natural that those who were fearful of the past efforts to extend bureaucratic control should be suspicious of the present moves in the same direction. The evident desire of many of those who wield powerful influence in the administration to remake America along socialistic lines is so apparent that the more recent trends are alarming as well as disturbing. Federal financing of industrial plants, managed money, price controls—these, and other policies—all supported by a far-flung publicity organization of the Government—are inroads which have extraordinary potentialities.

It cannot be overlooked that the President himself boasted of the "new instruments of public power" that have been created, and which he admitted "would provide shackles for the liberties of the people" under certain conditions.

Much of the distrust and suspicion which exists and which is so exceedingly disturbing, could be eliminated by the selection of counselors and advisers who are committed to the preservation of our fundamental philosophies rather than resorting continually to the champions of the doctrine of an all-powerful state.

The Migrant Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN H. TOLAN
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE SAN DIEGO (CALIF.) UNION

Mr. TOLAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Union, of San Diego, Calif.:

[From the San Diego (Calif.) Union of June 13, 1941]

THE MIGRANT PROBLEM

The investigation of the migrant problem in San Diego, conducted here this week by Congressman TOLAN, is designed to enable Congress to look into the future and be prepared to cope with the problem that is expected to arise when the defense effort slacks up after the war. It is a commendable effort, for the problem is, or will be, national in scope. No single community can solve it alone.

The migrant problem is nothing new to California. The one with which Congressman TOLAN'S committee now is concerned, however, differs in many respects from the one with which this State has been plagued for the last few years. Until a few months ago the problem arose from lack of employment elsewhere and a desire on the part of those who came here to find jobs, few of which existed. Consequently, the relief situation became acute.

Now, however, the migration is the result of a suddenly developed demand for skilled and semiskilled workers in defense industries. These industries, chiefly aircraft and shipbuilding, absorbed the available labor supply in short order and desperate calls have gone out from many communities, urging an increased number of migrants to come to California.

This is necessary and until and unless the call or the migration exceeds the supply of jobs, it is desirable. But it is, at the same time, developing a situation which quite easily could become a major problem in the event of a sudden let-down in defense industries. That is the problem which Congressman TOLAN'S committee is trying to anticipate.

Nobody knows, of course, how long the emergency will last or how long it will be before defense work slacks off. Everybody hopes that the let-down will be easy and that San Diego will feel few of the adverse effects about which there have been varied predictions Multiply the situation here by the number of communities maintaining large defense industries and some comprehension of the State's problem can be gained. Then multiply the State total by the number of States affected—which means most of them, one way or another—and the scope of the national problem can be visualized.

Concern over this phase of the situation cannot be permitted, of course, to overshadow the importance of completing the job we have set out to do. But it is of interest to note that some thought and attention are being given the matter now. If, by a series of hearings in important centers throughout the Nation, Congress can obtain a basis upon which to work out a program for reassimilation of the hordes of migrants that have, for various reasons, shifted the population centers, and have the program ready to apply when the need arises, there should be a minimum of worry when the defense workers finally are demobilized.

In this problem Congress has much to go on. It has the lessons learned over the last 8 or 10 years to guide it; and, while the causes of the present-day migration differ greatly from those which led to the great trek from the Dust Bowl to the coast, the essential features of the dislocation are the same. A great many people are going to require assistance in readjusting themselves then just as they require it now.

Address of Hon. James A. Farley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MATTHEW J. MERRITT
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

ADDRESS OF THE HONORABLE JAMES A. FARLEY, FORMER POSTMASTER GENERAL, DELIVERED AT THE GRADUATING EXERCISES OF THE PACKARD COMMERCIAL SCHOOL, NEW YORK CITY, ON TUESDAY, JUNE 24, 1941

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address delivered by the Honorable James A. Farley, former Postmaster General, to the graduating class of the Packard Commercial School, June 24, 1941:

On this occasion, 35 years after my graduation from this school, I feel a keen temptation to dwell upon the past. There are so many changes that have taken place in the course of that long stretch of years—changes in business methods, changes in the things that must be learned before going into business and, above all, changes in the attitude of the public toward business. It is a pleasure to note with respect to all these things that there has been a distinct gain. Business has, over the past 35 years, developed to an extraordinary degree in its capacity to accomplish greater units of work with smaller units of effort. This has benefited consumer, worker, and investor alike. Because of the great complexity of business, the training necessary to enter it with a fair chance of success must be vastly more detailed and scientific. And, finally, there has developed in the past few years a changed attitude on the part of the public toward the various business enterprises that serve it.

There was a time when it was regarded as good business to give as little and to get as much as possible. The objective of business now is to give as much at as small a price as is consistent with solvency. There was also a time when it was regarded as legitimate to exact long working hours from employees, to pay them small compensation for their work and, at the same time, to pay large dividends to the owners of business.

In the years since then, a change has taken place in the whole attitude toward these questions, partly through the legitimate efforts of organized labor, partly through a more enlightened attitude on the part of employers, and partly because of the necessity that the good will of the public be maintained. New principles of employment have come into being and many of these principles have become embodied in the law of the land.

The greatest change in business, however, has been the development of a new profession of business management. As businesses have grown in size and in complexity it has become impossible, except in the smaller units, for owners themselves to supervise and direct. That has brought about the development of a system of business enterprise in which essentially all the activities are carried on and the decisions made by that group which bears the general name of management. Upon this group falls a threefold responsibility. It is responsible to the public for providing at a fair price a sound and honest product. It is responsible to labor for good working conditions and a fair wage. And, lastly, it is responsible to stockholders for the preservation of their property and for a fair return on investment.

This threefold responsibility involves a great degree of skill in management, of diplomacy in handling human relations and mastery of the technical details of the business itself. Men and women charged with responsibility in management must therefore embody in their intellectual equipment the ability to do many things. In some of the more highly specialized businesses this means a combination of knowledge of finance, of acquaintance with engineering problems, of familiarity with sales methods, of mastery of difficult problems of public relations, and, above all, of the ability to get along with other people. Management has therefore become a highly specialized profession, an honored and respected profession, and a profession that requires the highest degree of training. The time has passed when anyone without training in management can go into business and hope to be successful.

Our schools have had to keep pace with this development and consequently their training has had to go far beyond the simple lessons that were taught when I was a student at this school. You have to know more than spelling, writing, and arithmetic these days to succeed in business.

I believe that this necessity of training efficient managers and directors of industry will, because of the present situation, change to a marked degree our whole system of education. We are going through a period now in this defense effort when the very salvation of the country depends upon the efficiency and the productiveness of American industry. When it succeeds, I believe that the American public will properly recognize the great contribution of American business to the security of our common country. Business will, when that happens, be given its proper place in the hearts and minds of the American people.

But, of course, we are only at the beginning of the development of the possibilities of American business and of business methods. To a greater and greater degree leaders in business must be possessed of all the qualities that will make for a better world. They will not only have to have vast familiarity with their own business, but a good many other businesses as well; not only a knowledge of their own State, their own community, but of the Nation and the world beyond; and, above all, not only a knowledge of things as they are, but an imagination that enables them to conceive of things as they can be in a better world. They must have imagination and courage and the ability to build, with the aid of that imagination and courage, more and more varied products.

I get a little impatient these days when I hear on all sides pessimistic predictions of what kind of a world we are going to have after this war. Some of the things that are being said do not sound like the old expressions of an American faith. However crude the methods of the past were, the leaders of business were men of courage and vision. When our country was a small collection of States scattered along the Atlantic coast, the spirit of the time was optimism. They were faced by hostile empires whose resources were vastly greater than their own. Wars were shaking the world then, as now. But these men made no dire predictions about what was going to happen to them. Instead, they stood up before the world and asserted their unbounded confidence in themselves and in their ability to take care of themselves in any kind of a world. For generations that was the spirit of America.

They asked for no favors, and they feared no future. They developed their industries, they built ships, they took from the earth the treasures that it contained. They planted their fields and gathered their crops. They sought new markets, and they made secure the markets they had. It was out of that enterprise and not out of the conquests of war that the greatness of their country came. And those courageous, bold generations have handed on to us a great Nation with great wealth and great possibilities. It should not be for this generation to sell the future short. It should rather express once more the courageous faith of the past.

I have recently visited South America and I have studied the markets there. I feel that we can work with the countries to the south of us. American enterprise need have no fear of meeting other nations in the markets of the world. We can have faith in our products and in our ability to sell those products and in our ability to make friends of those with whom we trade. We can do this with entire confidence because we know behind us is a country whose resources and inherent strength surpass those of any nation or any combination of nations in the world.

But the greatest strength of a nation is in the minds and hearts of its people. Its strength is in its integrity and its ability to keep its promises and to discharge its obligations.

The indispensable factor in every product is the honesty and truthfulness of the maker. Without honor in keeping promises and in discharging obligations there can be no business life as we know it. A most important book on modern economics is entitled "The Promises That Men Live By." The meaning of the title is that the keeping of promises is the cement that holds together finance, industry, sales, employment relations, advertising, and engineering. In the 35 years since I left this school, I have learned how true is the import of that title.

The same thing is true of all of the world's work. It holds true in government, in political affairs, and in international affairs. For centuries such peace as we have enjoyed has rested upon reliance upon international promises, international law, and upon principles of respect for the small and the weak. Woodrow Wilson said in 1918 in defining American ideals in international relations, "What we seek is the reign of law, based upon the consent of the governed and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind." That means the reign of integrity and truth telling.

In conclusion permit me to say that the security and permanence of those principles in the internal affairs of this country and in its dealings with other nations rests upon the maintenance of democratic principles here. Democratic institutions depend upon a true respect for the sacredness of the individual, upon a belief that he, in himself, has something of the divine in his make-up and that therefore we cannot respect God without respecting the God-like in human beings. No definition of democracy can afford to overlook this fact. Other forms of government have their day and then they fall from their own error. Democracy must live because it is free from that error. It may make mistakes, it may be slow in preparation, it may sometimes be inefficient in execution. But beneath it all, it carries a primeval strength. Upon that strength rests our faith. It is the faith of an American. There can be no America unless that faith lives.

As you graduates go out to take your place in the world and to carve out your careers, always remember that the opportunities of the present that you enjoy were born out of the toil, the foresight, and the patriotism of earlier Americans. When you face the uncertainties of the present world chaos, remember that your ancestry faced like perils and came through far stronger for the experiences. Every era of danger begot a greater Nation, just as every era of discouragement in your careers will beget a better character if you rise above your difficulties and fight through to a solution of your problems. As individuals and as a Nation, our problems may loom large. I am sure that every American is confident that their President and their Government will solve successfully the world problems which confront us. What all can do as a Nation, each can do as an individual. I leave you in full confidence that you will carry on your careers with distinction to yourself and honor to this school.

Address Before Ohio State Aerie, Fraternal Order of Eagles, at Toledo, Ohio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

ADDRESS OF THE HONORABLE MARTIN L. SWEENEY, OF OHIO

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a speech delivered by me to the delegates of the Fraternal Order of Eagles of Ohio in convention assembled at Toledo, Ohio, Saturday, June 21, 1941:

Past Grand Worthy President Conrad H. Mann, Past Grand Worthy President now Grand Secretary John Abel, Mayor Edward Blythin, of Cleveland, worthy State president, and members of the Ohio State Aerie of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, I am mighty happy to come here from the sultry climate of Washington to enjoy the cool breezes of Toledo. It is now about 90 degrees in the shade. You know what I mean.

I look forward to these occasions, never having missed an Ohio State Aerie convention since I was honored by you to serve as a worthy State president of the Ohio Aerie some years ago. More important than the social contacts made at these annual reunions is the serious business confronting us when we take inventory of the activities of this great organization.

At the outset I want to tell you how proud I am to once more be on this platform with the genius of this organization, Conrad H. Mann, and I pray God will spare him for many years and give him health to be with us at similar occasions until he passes on. The exalted position we hold today as a fraternal organization in these United States is primarily due to the untiring efforts of Colonel Mann.

Some years ago there was a popular song that went something like this:

"You made me what I am today
I hope you are satisfied."

Paraphrasing that title, I believe if the Eagles had a theme song today it would be dedicated to Conrad Mann in this fashion:

"You made us what we are today
You bet we are satisfied."

I congratulate you for the splendid membership record you made during the past fiscal year under the guidance of our great State secretary, Matt Brown of Springfield, who is now a national figure in our fraternity, and a worthy successor of those illustrious sons of Ohio who spent many years in the service of this order. I refer to our brothers who have passed to the great beyond, Tom Cogan and Michael Burns, and to our living brothers, Howard Ragland and Henry Berrodin, who, thank God, are still with us.

Ohio is and has always been the hub of Eagledom. Because she is the hub of Eagledom we have some mighty important things to say on occasions like this. The popular theme of expression today is national defense, and it is proper to have that subject discussed at a meeting of this kind.

The membership of this fraternity is made up of the working class of Americans, who, after all, are the backbone of the country. They are bound close to us because of the social and economic problems we have been trying in a small way for the past few years to solve. In the field of social economics we have made more progress than any fraternity in the country, thanks to the capable leadership of Conrad Mann and Frank Herring. We have made substantial contributions to the social gains enjoyed by the underprivileged in our midst. Because we have plowed the field and garnered the harvest we cannot sit idly by when attempts are being made under the guise of national defense to destroy the social and economic gains secured by labor after a struggle of a half century of effort. These social advances must not be retarded; on the contrary, they should be extended, and the weight and power of this organization should be in that direction.

Speaking of the Nation and defense, I must tell you the story about Pat Murphy in Cleveland, who was missed from his church on Sunday. O'Brien and O'Toole put the tail on him one Sunday and followed him. They discovered he was attending services at a local Baptist Church. Said O'Brien to O'Toole, "Something has come over Murphy; we'd better go and tell Father Gallagher." So they went and told Father Gallagher they had seen Murphy going into the Baptist Church. Father Gallagher did not believe the story and said he would send for Murphy. Murphy came, and Father Gallagher said, "What's this I hear about your going to the Baptist Church?" "That's right," answered Murphy. Father Gallagher said, "There must be a reason." Murphy replied, "There's a damn good reason." "What is it?" asked Father Gallagher. Murphy asked, "Haven't you heard about our national-defense program?" "Why, certainly I've heard about the national-defense program; what's that got to do with your going to the Baptist Church?" Murphy said, "It's got a hell of a lot to do with it. You know I was on W. P. A. for 4 years. My four sons were around the house idle without any work. Now I am working at the White Motor Co. at $50 a week; Jimmy is working at the powder plant at Ravenna for $100 a week; Tommy is working over at the Thompson Products making airplane parts and getting $75 a week; Eddie is out at the TNT plant at Sandusky making $65 a week; and the youngest boy, Jack, is making $50 a week as a steamfitter. We were going along fine until a few weeks ago, and I pick up the paper and saw a big story on the front page reading, 'The Pope comes out for peace.' Now, who the hell would not join the Baptist Church after that?"

I am not going to talk about a defense program that relates to battleships, tanks, and instruments of destruction, necessary as they are, because we live in a realistic world. I support wholeheartedly a defense program to protect our country from invasion by any foreign foe. We all agree on total defense for that purpose, but I have in mind another defense. It has been touched upon here today by the distinguished gentleman who represents the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Ohio, and by his honor the mayor of Cleveland, and that is the civilian defense program. In the setting up of this program we must insist that the cornerstone of such an enterprise be free speech, free press, and the right of free assembly. More than ever before the virtue of tolerance is needed during this war hysteria. In many communities are individuals who have been frustrated one time or another and who have ambition to become a detective, a G-man, or perhaps a spy. It is just possible, as we go forward in our civilian defense program, these individuals, armed with a commission and a badge, may embark upon the disreputable business of spying upon their neighbor—spending their own spleen against individuals they do not like by making false reports concerning their conduct and activities.

Those of us who lived prior to and during the last World War well remember the un-American system of espionage that caused many innocent people to suffer.

This order pioneered in the field of old-age pension, mothers' pension, workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance, collective bargaining for the workers. These laws would not and could not have been placed on the statute books of the States of this Union without the ground work performed by the Fraternal Order of Eagles. Now it appears that some pseudo patriots wrapping the American flag around them and shouting in the name of national defense have determined to destroy these gains to which I referred, and without investigating accuse the organized labor groups of lacking patriotism because they dared to engage in their constitutional right to strike for a few cents per hour in their wages to meet the rising price in the corresponding cost of living. We see groups who were never friendly to labor groups, and individuals who believe in a disfranchising system by payment of a poll tax; groups and individuals who believe in the continuation of child labor and who are bent on destroying collective bargaining, because as they say some Communists have wormed their way into the labor movement.

Let me say without fear of contradiction that the Government of the United States has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars running down subversive activities; that our Department of Justice know full well who these Communists are and can put their finger on them any time they wish and very properly incarcerate them behind the bars. The mystery is why it has not been done to date. Because of the activities of a few of these subversive elements the splendid body of American workingmen are stigmatized.

I was more than proud to hear the representative of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, in his address here today, emphatically state that since his Department took over the national-defense supervision of industries not one discovery of sabotage has been made to date. My friends, this is a fine record, and it demonstrates what some of us have been saying for months, that the so-called act of sabotage was a figment of the imagination, that it would not and could not take place where none but good American citizens are employed who have the interest of their Government at heart.

We need in this country today more of the Voltaire philosophy. Let it be remembered that it was Voltaire, the French liberal, who said: "I may disagree with everything you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it."

As I stand before you on this occasion, sharing this platform with Conrad H. Mann, I wonder what is in his mind as he reflects upon the condition of our country and the world in general today. Conrad Mann, you have been a symbol of what the United States of America has meant to a struggling youth. You have tasted the bitter dregs of poverty and hardship, and after grasping the opportunity presented, you became one of America's leading industrialists. The transition from poverty to security never changed your inner spirit. Your thoughts and actions were always in the direction of making life worth while for the little fellow, as you have often expressed it.

You have come from the poor. I am sure you do not believe that the poor people of England who run to their shelters at night to guard against a rain of fire and death from the sky, or the poor people of Germany, who have to run to their bomb shelters for protection against destruction, are the causes of World War No. 2? No; I believe you will agree with me when I say that the poor of any land do not bring about these incessant wars. War is a racket, so characterized by the late Gen. Smedley Butler. Selfish international bankers profit by wars. They are men who profess the Jewish, Catholic, and Protestant faiths; some are atheists, but all are strangers to Christ.

This World War No. 2 would not have occurred had it not been for the infamous Treaty of Versailles. An idealistic American President, Woodrow Wilson, sincerely sought to impose his 14 points for world peace upon this treaty-making body, but they literally, to use a vernacular, threw one after another of his peace points in the ash can, and it is reported and I have for my authority Lincoln Steffens, who in his autobiography stated, "One of the delegates to that memorable peace conference actually spat in the face of Woodrow Wilson." It was reported that the French delegate Clemenceau ere the ink was dry on that famous document said, "It was good for seven wars."

The reason why the peace treaty failed was because the delegates entrusted with the power of their respective countries closed the door to Christ, and like every criminal bent on further activity of crime proceeded to cut up the real estate of the world and divide the loot.

We paid a terrible price for our entry into the last World War. We emerged with 23,000 new war-profit millionaires and the longest bread lines of any country in the world. We inherited a post-war depression that is still with us, not to speak of the tremendous loss of blood and treasure we sustained. Must we now, 25 years later, take our sons and lay them on the altar of sacrifice and once more have a nation we aided, characterize us as Uncle Shylock, refuse to pay their legitimate debts, and will it be possible at some future date when the American soldiers of World War No. 2 journey to the Capitol in Washington ask for a bonus to have the machine guns and bayonets turned upon them. No; I do not think it will happen if the American people will become articulate and insist that President Franklin Delano Roosevelt keep his solemn pledge that our boys will not be sent to fight in any foreign battlefield.

There are those who believe we should spend $7,000,000,000 and more to purchase tanks, guns, and airplanes to keep the war over there. I have no quarrel with that school of thought that restricts itself solely to material aid. If these instruments of destruction are blown up in the Atlantic Ocean, or destroyed on battlefields, they can be replaced, but the important thing for us to keep in mind is that we cannot replace the broken bodies of American-born boys. That is what we are going to guard against. [Applause.]

Let it also be remembered that approximately 1 year ago, when we were starting our general defense program, leading industrialists came to Washington and said: "We will not turn a wheel unless we know how much profit we are going to make." Did Congress reach out and draft industry then; did they call out the troops? No; they prepared and passed a bill giving industry the green light on the cost-profit system. Now, because labor, as I indicated before, exercises its constitutional right to strike when mediation fails, the threat is abroad that troops will be called out and the participants of strikes will be forced into concentration camps. I sincerely trust that reason will prevail and that we never reach that stage of industrial strife.

The United States of America is not the Soviet Russia of Stalin; it is not Germany under despot Hitler, or Italy under dictator Mussolini. We could well take a lesson from England, who has had two major strikes during the last year, despite the fact she is fighting for her very existence. It demonstrates to me the flexibility of the democracy of the working classes in the British Isles. Yet there are controlled radio announcers, and columnists, and that sort, who say that the laboring man is not patriotic because he dares exercise his right to strike under certain circumstances. Let me respond that it is the laboring man's sons who are now in camps, preparing to defend this country; it is the laboring man's son who will go to Dakar and who will be shipped to the Azores, to Africa, and to Iceland, and then, God forbid, over to Central Europe to finish the war and maybe to finish democracy over here.

Let us have respect for the other fellow's viewpoint and, like Voltaire, permit him to exercise his right of free speech. There is a line of demarcation between free speech and license which every sane citizen recognizes. While I am on the subject of propaganda let me say one does not have to be pro-British to be pro-American. To be pro-American all you have to be is a good American. Within the folds of this order are Catholics, Jews, and Protestants, all subscribing to America first. We march, shoulder to shoulder, in battle for social legislation, and we ask you to continue and hasten the work to be mapped out by our leaders in the future. Make no mistake; regardless of this war hysteria, America will find her soul.

When we passed the peacetime conscription law, which I characterized as a negation of democracy, they told us we were about to be invaded in a few weeks; when we passed the lend-lease bill the same argument was presented. Thank God we have not been invaded and with the resources and power that are ours we will never be invaded by any foreign power. During the last World War many of us will recall Lord Northcliffe, of England, who propagandized us into the war. He spent $75,000,000 deliberately telling lies to our people to stir up their emotions and bring about our participation in that horrible catastrophe. He went to England after completing his propagandizing and he is reported to have said, according to H. C. Peterson, author of Propaganda for War, "The Americans, they dress alike; they talk alike; they think alike—what sheep."

To an extent that statement may be true. We are a democratic people and we have our weakness as a Nation. We have some blank pages in our history. One page is a serious indictment against our democracy, since the year 1882 there have been 5,000 lynchings. This is nothing to boast about when we seek to impose our four freedoms upon other parts of the world. We had 12 years of national prohibition that no other country in the world would dare experiment with or put into law, but we do not talk about that. We have our weaknesses, but we are a power despite the fact that sometimes our people move on a mass-psychology basis.

In the University of Iowa some years ago while a professor was instructing a class in psychology, a young man rushed into the classroom shouting a kidnaping and murder had been committed. The fellow had confessed and some of the town folks were going to hang him. The professor said here is a good chance to try our my theory, and I shall give you three questions:

How many of you would be willing to join the lynching party?

How many of you would be willing to go as spectators?

How many of you would prefer to stay away?

When the results were tabulated 64 announced they were willing sight unseen to participate in the lynching, 60 said they would go as spectators, and 76 preferred to stay away. This is indicative of the cross section of America.

We have had bigotry and intolerance in this country during its brief history but we have always overcome it, and organizations of this type have done their part in driving under cover every agency that would destroy our free institutions.

I said before war is a racket. If it is not a racket I ask any one in this audience to answer this question:

Why did this Nation of ours sit idly by and allow Japan to buy scrap iron in this country for the past 5 years and process the same into cannon to kill the helpless Chinese, and at the same time make loans of millions of dollars to the Chinese Government to wage war on the Japanese?

If war is not a racket why did we loan millions to the gallant little nation of Finland to fight the Russian bear, and at the same time sell our oil and gasoline to service the bombers of Soviet Russia to rain death upon the people of Finland?

If war is not a racket why did we purchase Russian gold at $35 an ounce that they process in Soviet Russia at less than $4 an ounce?

If war is not a racket why do we permit at the present time American capitalists to engage in the oil fields of Brazil, the richest oil fields of modern times, and sell their oil to the Japanese who make possible delivery to Germany to carry on the war?

If we are part of that system we should be courageous enough to tell the truth, and the more we tell the truth the less chance of our involvement in a foreign war.

You patriotic Eagles have a duty to perform as you leave here and go back to your respective homes. Our duty as indicated is national defense, but I repeat it must be based on tolerance. This Fraternal Order of Eagles knows something about the virtue of tolerance. If I cannot speak well of a brother Eagle, I won't speak ill of him. That has been our slogan since the birth of this fraternity. That slogan is the essence of tolerance. Nations may well pattern after that philosophy.

A refugee wrote a beautiful poem. I feel it is apropos to recite here at this time:

"'What is the real good?'
I ask in musing mood.
'Order,' said the law courts;
'Knowledge,' said the school;
'Truth,' said the wise man;
'Pleasure,' said the fool;
'Love,' said the maiden;
'Beauty,' said the page;
'Freedom,' said the dreamer;
'Home,' said the sage;
'Fame,' said the soldier;
'Equity,' the seer.
Spake my heart still sadly,
'The answer is not here.'
Then within my bosom
Softly this I heard.
'Each heart holds the secret;
Kindness is the word.'"

That was written by John Boyle O'Riley 50 years ago, a man who knew the meaning of tolerance, who suffered in a British prison for his native land, and subsequently escaped and found asylum on the free soil of the United States. Here he became a poet and a writer of great reputation.

Thank God for the privilege of addressing you once again. May God bless you and this fine, liberal organization

Antilabor Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. HOOK

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

ARTICLE FROM NEW YORK PM

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following news item from PM, on the bill now pending before the House:

[From the New York PM of July 9, 1941]

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT SEEN AGAINST ANTI-LABOR LAWS AS HOUSE STARTS DEBATE

WASHINGTON, July 9.—With President Roosevelt reported to have thrown his weight against any drastic antilabor legislation, bitter conflict was expected in the House today when the May bill comes up for debate.

The bill, chief target of combined A. F. of L. and C. I. O. opposition, authorizes the use of troops to "afford protection to all persons engaged in the operation of such plant or industry who voluntarily desire to work." It is neatly appended to the bill authorizing deferment from the draft of men over 28.

Both A. F. of L. and C. I. O. leaders have contended that the measure in fact would provide Government sanction for violent strikebreaking in any defense labor walkout.

Philip Murray, C. I. O. president, conferred with President Roosevelt yesterday, and the May bill, as well as other proposals aimed to curb unions, was discussed. While no statement on the outcome of the meeting was made, C. I. O. leaders appeared optimistic after a separate meeting with Speaker RAYBURN and Representative MCCORMACK, House majority leader.

Thomas Kennedy, secretary-treasurer of the United Mine Workers led the delegation. When the session ended he said it was very satisfactory. The comment was regarded here as indication that the President had passed reassuring views along to his legislative leaders.

THE HILLMAN STORY

Coinciding with the renewed optimism in labor circles was Sidney Hillman's comment to reporters. The labor spokesman in the O. P. M. said:

"I can't think of a strike affecting national defense orders at the moment."

He also met with President Roosevelt yesterday on the eve of the momentous Congressional debate.

The day's interviews climaxed a last-minute drive by labor groups here to stem anti-union measures. More than 200 C. I. O. representatives gathered here Monday for the campaign.

Another significant session on the defense-labor front was a meeting yesterday between Mr. Murray, Bernard M. Baruch, who headed the War Industries Board in the last war, and Brig. Gen. Edwin M. Watson, the President's secretary. Mr. Murray has been pressing for drastic overhauling of the defense set-up with "industry councils," representing labor and management, formed to push the production program. It was assumed that this was one of the subjects of discussion.

No Price Ceiling on Meat Contemplated

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY B. COFFEE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

LETTER FROM LEON HENDERSON, ADMINISTRATOR OF THE OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION AND CIVILIAN SUPPLY

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted, I am inserting a letter from Leon Henderson, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration and Civilian Supply, which gives some assurance to the livestock industry that no action is contemplated to place a price ceiling on meat.

Since many cattle feeders have recently sold their fat cattle at prices below cost of production, some encouragement to continue feeding operations is necessary. Otherwise, numerous Corn Belt farmers would be inclined to sell their corn to the Government under the loan program and let their feed lots remain idle.

The following representatives of producer organizations attended the conference with the O. P. A. C. S. hereinafter referred to: F. E. Mollin, secretary, American National Live Stock Association; E. W. Sheets, secretary, United States Live Stock Association; B. B. Brumley, president, National Live Stock Marketing Association; J. B. Wilson, secretary, Wyoming Wool Growers; Fred R. Marshall, secretary, National Wool Growers Association; W. J. Miller, secretary, Kansas Live Stock Association; and C. J. Abbott, director, Nebraska Stock Growers Association.

This conference which I attended had two objectives from the producers' standpoint. The first was to protest the low price ceiling that had been placed on hides and the second was to obtain some assurance that no price ceiling would be placed on the principal livestock product, meat. Since the Department of Agriculture has encouraged meat production to meet the emergency, the livestock feeders who have been fearful of a price ceiling being established will welcome the assurance contained in the following letter from Leon Henderson:

OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION AND CIVILIAN SUPPLY,
Washington, D. C., July 7, 1941.

Hon. HARRY B. COFFEE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. COFFEE: Following our recent meeting with the representatives of the livestock producers, I want to assure you again that the step which we have taken in this Office to check the speculative increase in hide prices should not be taken as indicating that we are contemplating action on livestock prices or the price of meat.

While under present circumstances you will understand that no one can make any long-range promises, I do want you to know that no such step has at any time been under consideration in this Office, nor do I see any present likelihood of such action. I would be very disturbed if anticipation of such a step should handicap the stocking of feeders during the coming year, and I would like livestock producers to know that I keenly appreciate the importance of maintaining a fair margin between the cost of feeder cattle and the price of finished stock. I know that a good many farmers are feeding cattle this year on a very narrow margin over the high prices paid for feeder stock and that actual losses have been considerable, in spite of a relatively strong beef market. Protection of feeder margins, as well as fair returns, must always be a factor in any consideration of cattle or meat prices.

Our action on hide prices, including kid and calf skins, was to meet a special situation more or less peculiar to this commodity. A speculative movement in these prices developed during the spring which led to forward buying of shoes and other leather products, heavy forward buying of leather from tanneries, and heavy buying of hides by the tanneries themselves. This promised to reflect in unreasonable prices for leather products and eventually a liquidation which would react on prices throughout the industry. In late May the Army found it necessary to reject bids on a million pairs of Army shoes and approximately one-quarter million pairs of Civilian Conservation Corps shoes, and this Office took steps to check the spiral. We had no thought whatsoever in seeking to control livestock prices.

I would appreciate any steps that you may be able to take to place this interpretation of our action before the livestock producers.

Sincerely yours,

LEON HENDERSON, Administrator.

Poll Taxers and the Unemployed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 12, 1941

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, so long as so many of our States require the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite to voting, the unemployed anywhere in the United States will not get the proper consideration due them in a democracy where all men are supposed to have equality of opportunity. I make this statement without fear of contradiction, for I shall cite facts to prove my contention.

NATION-WIDE PROBLEM

I wish to express again the words in my statement, "anywhere in the United States." It is well known that Federal laws operate the same all over the United States and that they are passed by the votes of Representatives from all sections and districts of the country. Thus, if certain restrictions are put into the laws governing the W. P. A., largely by means of the votes of one section of the country, all W. P. A. workers will suffer from these restrictions, regardless of how their own particular Representatives might have voted on that issue. This is why the voting requirements of 1 State are of vital concern to every other section of every other State. Let me illustrate. The Casey amendment providing for an increase in the W. P. A. appropriation was defeated largely by the 78 Representatives of the poll-tax States. In other words, had the Representatives from these 8 poll-tax States had the same percentage for the amendment as did the other sections of the country the amendment would have carried, and a greater number of the already certified needy could have been cared for than will now be possible.

I want it understood that I quarrel with no man because of the way he votes on any issue. I believe every Member is honest and conscientious and votes according to the way his voting constituents desire him to vote—please note I said "voting constituents." In fact, in a representative government such as ours, the voters back home take care of the man who disregards their wishes too often. My colleagues from the poll-tax States are to be complimented for their faithfulness in following the American principle of representing their voting constituents.

Their faithfulness to this principle is attested to by the fact that, although they comprise but one-sixth of the membership of the House, they hold twice that number of chairmanships of the different committees. Committee chairmanships, it will be recalled, are rewards for length of service in the House.

SOME EVIDENCES

As I have said before, on every liberalizing amendment to the W. P. A. bill, the poll taxers voted overwhelmingly against these amendments. Despite the fact that the administration strongly urged the elimination of the 30-day lay-off, for example, only 13 of the 78 poll taxers—all Democrats—saw fit to support the proposal.

As I have said before, the same general ratio was true on the Casey amendment. I have watched the procedure every time the W. P. A. bill has come up since I have been in Congress. It has always been the same. The section of the country which has been called our No. 1 economic problem has given the least support to the measures which would benefit their unfortunate people the most.

At first this seemed strange to me, but when I realized that these people had little money on which to live, let alone pay for the right of voting for their elected representatives, I could readily see that their interests would be sacrificed for the interests of those who can pay the poll tax.

The W. P. A. bill has two strikes against it before it ever gets out of committee, for the chairman of the subcommittee handling the bill comes from one of our poll-tax States. He is one of the ablest men in the House and thoroughly believes in and practices the American principle given above—that in representative government the representative must serve his voting constituents.

Thus we see that justice to our unemployed of the Nation can be obtained only when they are able to go to the polls in all sections of the country with the power to reward or to punish according to the treatment their segment of society has received.

I urge all to sign discharge petition No. 1 to bring to the floor the Geyer anti-poll-tax bill which is now bottled up in a committee whose chairman comes from a poll-tax State.

More Dead Soldiers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the President told Congress that, acting under his orders, forces of the United States Navy had arrived in Iceland. He further advised us that he had sent soldiers to Trinidad and British Guiana, and the press tells us that he has ordered the Navy to sweep the sea of German war vessels.

As the President carries on his undeclared war in violation of his oath of office, for the preservation of our Constitution, it might be well for us to read Sleeping in Flanders' Field, by Bond Davis. That our boys and we, before they meet the death to which the President is sending them, may consider the reason that death should come to them, let us read this message which runs as follows:

I'm just a dead soldier in Flanders,
Once again the bombardment is near,
And I wonder is anyone living
Can tell me just why I am here.

I fought in the war to free people,
And really I hated not one,
Like me, they were husbands and sweethearts,
Until, someone gave them a gun.

They marched you away from your village,
And poisoned your mind with war hate,
And told you of glories, unending,
If a bullet should meet you, by fate.

You were fighting the fight of the righteous,
You were making the world free for all,
But I wondered just what they were telling,
The boys in the other trench wall.

Since the summer of '15 I've lain here,
While the poppies grew over my bier,
And mothers and wives and children,
Watered our graves, with a tear.

I'm just a dead soldier in Flanders,
Once again the cannons will roar,
And I wonder if someone can tell me,
Just what they are fighting for.

—Bond Davis.

Let all those who believe that we should not again sacrifice American lives, join Stalin, the most vicious murderer of modern times in a war which may cause us our freedom, make known to the President and those Senators and Congressmen who would crowd us into this war, their opposition to such a course, this by letter to public officials, to the press, through public speech, and by private conversation.

Prize Winners in Fathers' Day Contest in Spokane, Wash.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES H. LEAVY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, I have upon previous occasions brought to the attention of the Congress of the United States the significant fact that Fathers' Day had its origin in the city of Spokane, Wash., which city is my home and a part of my congressional district. The originator of this beautiful idea is a very brilliant and estimable lady, who was born and reared in my congressional district and who still resides in Spokane, Mrs. John Bruce Dodd.

It was back in 1898, when Mrs. Dodd's mother died, leaving her and five other small children entirely dependent upon her father, that the idea was conceived by her that the Nation should set aside one day in the year and pay homage to the fathers of America. Mrs. Dodd, a few years ago, referring to the motives actuating her in giving to America Father's Day, said:

His kindness and the sacrifices he made inspired me. I thought fathers ought to be revered as mothers always were.

When Mrs. Dodd made this statement she had in mind her father, William Jackson Smart, who after the death of her mother was both father and mother to his six motherless children.

One of Mrs. Dodd's friends a few years ago, referring to the tragic experience in her childhood days wrote:

In the Big Bend hills of the State of Washington, the day had its nativity in a lonely farm dwelling. There sorrow ministered amid the moaning of the March winds.

A father sat with bowed head in his aloneness. About him clung his weeping children. The winds outside threw great scarves of powdered snow against the windowpanes, when suddenly the last-born tore himself from the group and rushed out into the storm, calling for his mother. Yet even his baby voice could not penetrate the great silence that held his mother.

Hurriedly the father gathered him back to his protection, and for more than two decades William Jackson Smart, alone, kept paternal vigilance over his motherless children.

From the day that the beautiful thought was first given currency in Spokane, Wash., by Mrs. Dodd, 43 years ago, the idea has grown until now by common custom it is recognized throughout the Nation and in many other parts of the world, and the third Sunday in June is known as the day when the sons and daughters of this Nation pay affectionate tribute to their fathers, just as they do to their mothers upon the second Sunday in the month of May.

Mother's Day is officially recognized by congressional action. In the Sixty-third Congress, both Houses passed a House joint resolution declaring the second Sunday in May of each year to be officially designated Mother's Day, and authorizing the President of the United States to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of America to give public expression of their reverence for the mothers of this country on that day.

I have always felt that the same official recognition should be given Father's Day, and therefore have introduced a similar House joint resolution and am hopeful that it will be enacted into law.

In order to emphasize Father's Day, the Spokane Chronicle, one of the leading daily newspapers in my district, conducted a contest this year, paying cash awards to the first and other prize winners. The contest was divided into two divisions. One was a grade-school division and the other an adult division.

The first prize in the grade-school division was won by a bright little fellow, 8 years of age, whose name is Eugene Kvalvik, a second-grade pupil of Samuels, Idaho, and the prize-winning letter follows:

WHY I THINK MY FATHER IS THE BEST FATHER A SON OR DAUGHTER EVER HAD

My father is a swell guy, and I am going to remember him on Father's Day because he is a great sport and will play—help me fly kites—and, of course, he likes fishing as well as I do. But, O boy, he is strict. I guess it's because he wants me to grow up to be a good boy, and I am going to do everything he says, even pulling weeds in the garden, which no one hardly likes to do, but, you see, it's got to be done. So I am going to be good to my daddy so he will be proud of me, as I am of him.

Other winners of grade-school prizes were: Margaret Ruth Olsen, 9 years, 2920 Riverview Drive, Spokane, Wash., John Lewis Anderson, 10½ years, Rosalia, Wash.; Raymond Simonson, 14 years, North 5113 Washington, Spokane; Jerry Cawdrey, 11 years, North 1311 Lidgerwood, Spokane; Shirley Forriester, 10 years, 225 True Avenue, Pullman, Wash.; Vera M. Buth, Fairfield, Wash.; and Albert R. Stevens, 12 years, East 1928 Heroy, Spokane, Wash.

In the adult group, Howard E. Smith, North 2423 Stevens, Spokane, was the winner of first prize, his entry being a poem, as follows:

Any boy in the world would be proud of my dad,
Cause he's the best father any boy ever had—
In giving advice he's been more than fair
And convinced me it pays to be on the square.

In season we're out after pheasant and hun.
We don't always get them but we have lots of fun.
When fishing time comes, it's the old rod and reel,
And as a general rule we fill up the creel.

At horseshoes and golf we're always together,
And a swell game of pingpong in inclement weather.
I'm just twenty-one and feel like a man,
But still prefer dad to the rest of the gang.

I'm taking up flying and cruise fairly steady
And when Uncle Sam calls, I expect to be ready.
It kind of hurts dad but he admits that I'm right
And he'd like to go with me and help win the fight.

In addition to Mr. Smith as first prize winner, other winners in the adult division were Velma Stewart, Daisy, Wash.; Betty J. Cooke, West 1706 Dean, Spokane; Patricia Keenan, East 3140 Twenty-eighth, Spokane; Ellen McNutt, Rice, Wash.; Mack Worthen, West 1304 Dean, Spokane; Mary Elizabeth Thomas, 306 Colorado Street, Pullman, Wash.; Constance Matlock, 1204 Coeur d'Alene Avenue, Coeur d'Alene, Idaho.

There were more than 200 entries in this contest, and each of them was an exceptional written tribute of a son or daughter, displaying affection for his or her father.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to make a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD these prize-winning letters and to give to my colleagues this brief biographical sketch of the fine lady who gave America and the world the idea of Father's Day, and the historical facts in connection with its origin.

I feel that the Spokane Chronicle deserves special mention because of the time and space it has given in furthering the idea of Father's Day through a prize-winning contest, and I am sure in time scores of other leading newspapers of America will emulate the practice inaugurated by the Spokane Chronicle.

Americans, Guard Against That Alliance With Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEWIS D. THILL
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

ARTICLE BY LEE CARSON

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, when President Roosevelt allied this Nation with Communistic Russia by promising aid to the so-called "reds" he placed this country and himself in a dubious position. After the President promised to spread the four freedoms over the world, he now is pledged to aid a country and a form of government which is Godless and unmerciful, which has a record of bloodshed and starvation of millions, and a program which is designed to overthrow our own free institutions by force and violence. It would have been much better for this Nation to let the two ruthless dictators, Hitler and Stalin, fight it out, while we set our own house in order and prepared our own defenses.

As a result of this new-found affection for Russia which Roosevelt seems to display, the Communists may burrow deeper into industry, labor, and the Government. Americans must be on guard now more than ever before. Eternal vigilance is still the price of liberty. The following newspaper article discusses the problem:

[From the Milwaukee Sentinel of July 5, 1941]

RUSS-NAZI WAR GIVES UNITED STATES REDS NEW CHANCE—BURROW DEEPER INTO INDUSTRY, LABOR, AND GOVERNMENT, REPORT OF DIES COMMITTEE SCOUTS

(By Lee Carson, International News Service staff correspondent)

WASHINGTON, July 4.—Dies committee talent scouts today returned from a swing around the red circuit to report that American Communists are taking full advantage of the Soviet-Nazi war to burrow deeper into industry, labor, and the Government.

Un-American activities experts declare the Communists expect Stalin and Hitler eventually to make peace, with Stalin losing a few oil fields and granaries. In the meantime, American Communist chapters are entrenching themselves more firmly in key positions.

GET INSTRUCTIONS

In the possession of the Dies committee is a copy of alleged instructions sent out to all Communist groups.

The instructions urge:

"Now that Germany has attacked the Soviet Union, the United States will have to go along with Great Britain and the U. S. S. R. in the fight against the common enemy, and as a result of this the Government will let up on the persecution of Communists. This will place the Communists in a wonderful position to accomplish things that otherwise would be hard to achieve. Everyone was urged to redouble their efforts in the branch organizations and to secure as many members as possible, and to continue the drive for the control of the basic industries through the trade unions."

JAPS ARE PROBLEM

Concurrent with worry over the Reds comes another anti-American problem. According to the investigators, the Japs are some 3,200 strong on the west coast, have a fleet of almost 1,000 small boats "manned by reserve officers of the Japanese Navy and under direct command of Tokio." The Japs, like the Nazis, keep an unrelenting hold on their subjects in this country by threats of reprisal to their families and friends still in Japan.

Home Versus Office

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH E. CASEY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of yesterday:

[From the Washington Post of July 8, 1941]

HOME VERSUS OFFICE

The taking over of the Dupont Circle Apartments by the Government has aroused a storm of protest from tenants, some of them on long leases, who have been asked to move on less than 2 weeks' notice. To hunt new quarters in the tropical heat of a Washington summer would be a hardship under any conditions. But it is a gruelling experience, and for some a hopeless quest, with the city already crowded to overflowing with newcomers. Yet the personal discomfort of the evicted tenants, who have been somewhat jocularly referred to as "refugees," would weigh little in the balance against the needs of the Government if one could be sure that the Government is acting wisely in casting out several hundred persons, many of whom are Government employees working on defense assignments.

And this has yet to be proved. The efficiency of a Government worker depends quite as much upon his having a bed as a desk in an office. Although the Dupont Circle Apartments will take care of a good many more office workers than roomers, dispossession of tenants cannot be justified on any such crudely statistical basis. The simple fact is that Washington is confronted by a housing problem that is daily becoming more acute. And the Government is aggravating that shortage by moving into quarters never intended for such use. This is only a single instance of encroachment. But it is sufficiently conspicuous to serve the purpose of a "stop and look" signal. It stands to reason that the legislation already introduced into Congress to control rentals will be made infinitely more difficult of administration if the Government itself enters the market as a competitive bidder for restricted living quarters. At least the authorities should ask themselves whether the time has not come to call a halt until they are assured that adequate accommodations can be found for the people whom they dislodge.

We have stated many times that the national-defense program has to be integrated and coordinated. No one program can be pushed ahead regardless of the effect upon other parts of the program. And obviously the program cannot be developed in disregard of the personal needs of the men and women without whom nothing could be accomplished.

The President Betrays Us

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, by ordering American boys to Iceland, Trinidad, and British Guiana, and sending other boys on ships to clear the seas of German raiders and submarines, the President has violated the promise he made us when he said, "Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign war." More reprehensible, if possible, is his conduct in sending them to fight a war for which we are not prepared.

We are not so blind that we cannot read what is happening throughout the world. We are not so deaf that we cannot hear what is being said in public and over the radio. Nor are we so dumb that we cannot realize and understand that ordering American warships and planes to wipe German combat units from the high seas, means a shooting war and the sending of American boys into a foreign war.

The President is deceiving no one by his statement that the freedom of the seas will be maintained. We know that his purpose is to prevent Germany being successful in her attempted blockade of England. He is not attempting to maintain freedom of the seas. He is giving orders that our Navy join the British Navy and aid in a blockade of Germany. He is sending our Navy to join the British Navy in destroying freedom of the seas.

We know, as does he, that sending American boys to Iceland means, if his claim that Germany intends to seize that land to be true, the sending of American boys into a foreign war in direct violation of his solemn promise—a promise made to secure his re-election.

We know that his statement that the sending of American soldiers to Iceland, Trinidad, and British Guiana, his orders to the Navy and to the Air Force is a defense move, is not true. We know that he is but following his usual practice of saying one thing—doing another, his custom of deceiving the American people, by false statements.

He knows that he has no right to make war.

He knows the sole power to declare war is vested by the Constitution in Congress.

He knows that this latest move of his, his previous moves, are steps in the making of offensive war. He knows, as do we, that he is violating his oath to support and uphold the Constitution of the United States, the oath which he took when he assumed office.

He knows that he is usurping the power of Congress.

This Congress, if it wishes to maintain and preserve this a republic should cite him before the bar of Congress and compel him to meet the charge that he has been unfaithful to his trust; that he is betraying our people on the foreign front as he betrayed us here at home when he aided the drive of communistic controlled and dominated unions to deprive Americans of free speech, of the right to work.

He is leading us into a war for which we are unprepared, which for us can only end in disaster under his incompetent leadership.

What America Means to Me

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

ADDRESS OF DR. CLIFFORD E. BARBOUR, PASTOR OF THE SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, KNOXVILLE, TENN.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend and revise my own remarks in the RECORD, I include the following patriotic address by Dr. Clifford E. Barbour, pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, of Knoxville, Tenn.

Dr. Barbour is an eminent minister of his church, occupies a large place in the affections and esteem of the people of Tennessee, and exerts a wide influence for good, especially among the young people. His address is well worth reading by the people of the Nation.

What America means to me! I suppose there has not been a day since the establishment of our country through the sacrifice of the founding fathers in which there have been more people earnestly concerned with discovering just what being an American means. The boys and girls in all our public schools in America are singing with gusto, I Am an American. Every literate man, woman, and child is singing with faith and hope the prayer song of Irving Berlin, God Bless America. Last Sunday 100,000 people gathered in Chicago to give expression to their joy in observance of "I Am an American" Day. Over 200,000 gathered in Washington, and the official estimate of those who came together in Central Park in New York was 750,000, the largest group ever to gather together in America for any purpose whatsoever, and probably the largest group ever assembled any place in the world except on the field of battle. No one was forced to attend any of these meetings. There were no parades. There were but a few men in uniform. No propaganda ministry had promoted the meeting. No one was made to attend. This was America awakening to all the devotion that had been too long dormant. We are all thinking about what America means.

America means something in the realm of the material. There are things that are physical that are peculiar to our country. We are a Nation where skyscrapers are built, towering to the clouds. We build the biggest railroad engines, the biggest bridges, the fastest airplanes, the most luxurious automobiles. America means assembling lines and mass production. America means steak and fried potatoes, fried chicken, and country ham. It means hot biscuits and gravy. It means bacon and eggs. It means apple pie and cheese. America means the best-dressed men and the most fashionable women in the world. America means mammoth high schools, palatial movie palaces—the picture magazines. America means these things in the realm of the material.

However, these things that distinguish America and Americans on the surface are not the things that we pray God to bless nor are most proud to possess. There are some other values that are much more significant and for which we would be willing, though perhaps not gladly, to give up these good material things that are ours. What are they?

I

First. Freedom! Not freedom of behavior, but freedom of opportunity and achievement. No society can offer to its constituents freedom of behavior. In order that the good of all may be maintained restrictions and restraints must be willingly accepted by each. That is how this and other democracies were instituted. In order that ideas and ideals for all might be maintained, each willingly assumes obligations and restraints. There is a discipline of behavior upon which a democracy must be built and maintained. During the last generation there developed a growing desire to throw off all restrictions and restraints, and insofar as we were successful in cutting ourselves loose from discipline, just so far also was democracy weakened. No; it is not freedom of behavior that America means, but freedom of opportunity and of achievement. America offers to each the free expression of his capacities and the achievement, great or small, which may result from such freedom of expression. An employer may establish standards for work and expect his employees to adhere to those standards. However, the employee is privileged to give up his job any time he likes and find expression for his capacities in some other avenue of industry, and there is no one to say him nay. Let a worker in Germany try to quit his job and the state will step in, either forcing adherence to the requirements of the program of production established by the state or the individual will find himself incarcerated in a concentration camp. In Russia a person who kills another man may be sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment, but a person who interferes with the industrial program of the state is executed. But in America freedom means freedom of opportunity for the expression of one's capacities and the achievement of the measure of success that such capacities may produce.

America means freedom also of the press, freedom of assembly, and freedom of religion—rights and privileges established for us under the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. No one can tell me what to preach or what not to preach. In Germany those who dare to criticize, from the point of view of religion, the program of the state are either liquidated or confined. In America every man's conscience is his own guide concerning matters of faith. In America also it's still possible to have great assemblies of people speak out even against the Government that assures them freedom of assembly. In no place in the world except in the democracies could such things happen. In America we do not even have to agree with the President, and always there are a few millions who do not.

II

Second. America means equality. This does not mean equality of equipment. God created all men equal, but not of equal talent. To one it is given to be a great musician, to another to play only the second violin in the back row. To one is given the qualities of a great executive, but another only the virtues of humble service. To one is given the capacity to control men, to another the capacity to follow. No; there is not equality of equipment either in America or anywhere else in the world. But in America there is the equality of expression for whatever one's equipment may be and fair play for all before the law, and, at least in ideal, fair play for all in the economic and social order. Whatever a man's economic position may be, he has the same voice in matters of government as every other citizen; and if he has much money, or if he has little, he has one vote at the ballot box. Whatever his social status, his position before the law is the same as the position of any American. Whatever his individual standing, he is free to express his opinion in the press, over the radio, or in private or public address. No Gestapo or Ogpu is going to eavesdrop in an effort to compromise him and bring punishment for any deviation from the support of the program and policy of the dictator. Every American has the privilege with every other American of expressing himself freely.

III

Third. In America the individual counts. In the totalitarian states the individual is of significance only as he becomes a useful contributor to the purpose of the head of the state. When the individual interferes with such purpose, he is either killed or confined. In America the Government functions by the will of the people and for the purpose of making sure the rights and privileges of individuals. In America the individual counts.

IV

Fourth. All of these benefits which come to us as Americans are based on the conviction of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. We believe that God made man in his own image, and that life must be organized so that man may achieve God likeness. Whatever his racial background or national inheritance, every man in America is reckoned to be a child of God, with the impress of eternity upon his soul. It is because we believe in that which is spiritual that freedom and equality prevail, and that the rights of the individual are at the core of our democracy.

This is what America means to me, and with all reverence and humility I say, "Thank God I am an American!"

End the Un-American Practice of Employment Discrimination in Defense Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS F. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, in regard to my bill (H. R. 4149) to prevent employment discrimination in defense industries on account of race, color, or creed, I wish to call attention to the Committee on Fair Employment Practices just created within the Office of Production Management by Executive order of President Roosevelt.

The purpose of this committee of five is to investigate complaints of discrimination in defense employment and to end such discrimination.

Every American, in and out of Congress, who have been shocked by the way in which Negroes have been barred by airplane and other industries having defense orders will be delighted to know that the President's order also specified that in all subsequent defense contracts negotiated by the Government there should be included a provision prohibiting the contractor from discriminating against workers because of race, creed, color, or national origin.

The President directed further that all Government vocational and training programs for defense production shall contain special measures of assurance against discrimination.

This seems to make unnecessary further effort to get my bill, H. R. 4149, favorably considered. However, I am sure that every Member of Congress who receives future complaints as to discrimination will present these complaints to the new committee and thereby help to see that the Executive order is strictly obeyed. I, for one, am determined to do all in my power to end the un-American practice of race discrimination.

Small-Loan Companies Must Go

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

LETTER AND ARTICLE BY MERRELL DOUGHERTY

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and accompanying article:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 8, 1941.

HON. DEWEY SHORT,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SHORT: Since you have expressed a desire to have placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD my front-page exposé of the un-American small-loan companies, which appeared in the Cincinnati Chronicle, Independence Day, July 4, 1941, I am enclosing herewith my article verbatim.

As I see it, there is no better way to serve the cause of American independence than to give back the inherent American heritage to those who have been filched by these financial heretics.

Not as a reformer but as an "informer," I prefer to be recognized. "Inform the people with truth, and truth will make the people free."

Thanking you, I am
Sincerely yours,

MERRELL DOUGHERTY.

BLOOD MONEY

While all free peoples throughout the world are united in the theory, if not the actual practice, of saving democracy and the sovereignty of the individual in war-torn countries, we Americans should not turn blindly away from the bleeding sides of our own brethren whose personal sovereignty is on the auction block of human slavery. I am referring to the pernicious practice of modern-day usury as legalized by most of the States and operating under the questionable misnomer of small-loan companies. Six percent interest is not unprofitable for any investor. Eight percent is too much, and 42 percent per annum should not be tolerated. Yet many States have legalized this 3½-percent interest rate per month.

I have before me the figures of Mrs. ———, who borrowed $160 December 2, 1940. Earning a salary of $100 per month as a charwoman in a Government office, and supporting an invalid husband, this poor woman (there are thousands more just like her) pays back the original loan at the rate of $13.89 per month. For the 5-month period ending May 2, 1941, Mrs. ——— paid in five equal monthly payments of $13.89 a total of $69.45. Of this amount $44.62 applied to the principal of the note and $24.83 applied to interest on the note, leaving a net unpaid balance of $115.38.

Small-loan companies were originally sold to the gullible politicians and the unsuspecting public under the guise of gross inefficiency of legitimate banking.

This might have been true in the days of the "10,000 bank failures," but there is no license for permitting this abominable plague to grow and spread its lethal virus further.

There is a growing suspicion that the same vested interests who dominate high finance were also behind this pernicious program; that they are the "holding companies," and the small-loan companies are their bootleg subsidiaries. An investigation of all small-loan companies should be made—now. And the facts should be disclosed.

Yes; civilization, humanity, democracy, and decency are at stake, and we must not try to establish them abroad while they perish at home.

The malpractice of small-loan companies, who wring their "blood money" from the warped minds and wracked bodies of our underprivileged—these are their only victims—should be definitely labeled un-American. They must go.

MERRELL DOUGHERTY.

Independence Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK, OF NEW YORK

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address I delivered on the village green of St. Paul's Church, located in Mount Vernon, N. Y., on July 4, 1941:

Mr. Chairman, reverend clergy, ladies, and gentlemen, I know of no better place to celebrate the one hundred and sixty-fifth anniversary of our National Independence Day than here on the village green at St. Paul's Church, Mount Vernon.

With the historical background of St. Paul's Church and the men whose names were connected with it in its earlier days, what a fitting place it is to celebrate this great day.

Many of those who took part in the early history of our country, especially in the Revolutionary days, attended this great church. Many of them took a very patriotic part in establishing this great democracy which we have enjoyed for over 150 years.

Right here in this churchyard it has been said and acknowledged that the freedom of the press, which meant the dawn of civil liberty, was born in the fall of 1733 by one John Peter Zinger, who printed and published a small paper giving the accounts of an election for which the people were anxiously waiting. Later on, when our own independence was secured and the Constitution of the United States was adopted, it gave to the people of America freedom and liberty not equaled in any part of the world, for under our Constitution there is no discrimination against anyone because of his nationality, creed, or race, providing the individuals respect our laws and live up to the Constitution, which is so essential to keep law and order in our land

For over 150 years our people have lived as one united family, except during the Civil War, and in that war we positively established the freedom of man in this country. We must continue doing so and we must not let the Old World's intolerance or hatred enter our land. Unity is demanded more today than in any other time of our history. Realizing what is taking place in the Old World and with nation after nation being destroyed against the will of the people, we must prepare this country of ours to meet any emergency, and if we are attacked be in a position to destroy our enemy. I believe it is the duty of all loyal Americans to be ready at all times to make any sacrifice, even life itself, in defense of our flag and country.

For that reason we are assembled here today on this historic village green to acknowledge to the world that we are a united people, ready to defend the United States against all enemies at home or abroad.

The great trouble with the people of the world has been that they have been more interested in material things than in spiritual things and they have forgotten their religion, which means so much to the human race. If religion should be destroyed, civilization is lost, and when I say religion I mean "that which teaches the brotherhood of man."

We have a great responsibility in this crisis. We must not shirk it. We must do everything to make it safe not only for the present generation but for the future generations to come. It is our duty to build bridges of safety, bridges of security. Yes; bridges that will preserve this great democracy for those who are to follow. This is your duty. It is my duty.

I will recite to you a short poem which I believe is most appropriate at this time.

An old man, travelling a lone highway,
Came at the evening, cold and gray,
To a chasm deep and wide;
The old man crossed in the twilight dim;
The sullen stream had no fears for him.
But he turned when safe on the other side
And built a bridge to span the tide.
"Old man," said a fellow-pilgrim near,
"You are wasting your strength in building here;
"Your journey will end with the ending day;
"You never again will pass this way;
"You've crossed the chasm deep and wide,
"Why build you the bridge at eventide?"
The builder lifted his old gray head,
"Good friend, in the path I've come," he said,
"There followeth after me today
"A youth whose feet must pass this way,
"This chasm that was as naught to me,
"To that fair youth may a pitfall be;
"He, too, must cross in the twilight dim;
"Good friend, I am building the bridge for him."

In conclusion I wish to sincerely thank the committee who honored me with the invitation to speak here today at this celebration. I trust this country will continue celebrating Independence Day for generations to come.

Federal Tax on Admissions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

LETTER AND MEMORANDUM FROM JOHN J. BENNETT, JR., ATTORNEY GENERAL OF NEW YORK

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and accompanying memorandum:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
DEPARTMENT OF LAW,
Albany, July 1, 1941.

Hon. MARTIN J. KENNEDY,
Congress of the United States,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I enclose herewith copy of memorandum setting forth the position of the State of New York on the question of Federal taxation of admissions charged at pools, beaches, baths, and recreation facilities of the State of New York and its municipalities. I hope you will see your way clear to support the amendment to the Internal Revenue Act which is being proposed, copy of which is also enclosed.

With kindest regards, I am

Sincerely yours,
JOHN J. BENNETT, Jr.,
Attorney General.

[Enclosure.]

MEMORANDUM ON THE QUESTION OF FEDERAL TAXATION OF ADMISSION TO BATHE IN POOLS, BEACHES, BATHS, AND RECREATIONAL FACILITIES OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK AND ITS MUNICIPALITIES

The people of the State of New York, by many acts of the legislature, approved by the Governor, have adopted a program of recreation to promote the health and welfare of the people of the State. On several occasions the people have directly approved this program by voting affirmatively on bond issues to provide funds to finance the program. The various municipalities of the State have followed the lead of the State administrations in providing like recreational facilities for their own citizens. The Federal Government, during the depression, made large sums available in the form of loans, outright grants, W. P. A., C. C. C., N. Y. A., and other funds for like purposes.

The policy of the Federal, State, and municipal governments has been to provide funds from various sources for the acquisition of necessary lands and to construct buildings and equip them for recreational use. In the initial stages moneys are also supplied for maintenance and operation, but more and more the policy has developed to make modest charges for the use of recreational facilities wherever possible so that the cost of maintenance and operation may be paid by the people using the facilities and not out of general taxes. The policy is not to collect for the use of facilities more money than is actually needed for maintenance and operation. As a matter of fact, in almost no cases do the charges pay the entire costs of carrying on these projects. Resort is still made to the taxing powers to make up the difference between the actual costs and the amounts that can be collected.

In all cases the charges are adjusted to meet the ability to pay of the users of the facilities. Administrators in charge of recreational areas have always to keep in mind that the real purpose is to improve the health and general welfare of the people. The charges are continually adjusted whenever it is found that they are proving too much of a handicap and attendance is falling off. On the other hand, the administrator must always keep in mind that the public policy is to meet the recurring charges for maintenance and operation out of receipts instead of resorting to the tax roll.

Recently, the delicately adjusted control of this State and local policy has been thrown out of balance by demands of the Federal Government that State and municipal agencies collect from users of recreational facilities an admission tax to be turned over to the Government. This demand is contrary to the theory which has been sustained by the highest court in this country, that the Federal Government has no power to tax a State. The answer of the taxing authorities to this broad argument is that the tax is not levied on the State but on the users of the facilities and therefore the question of one sovereign taxing another is not involved. This is specious reasoning. The fact is that the State collects for admissions as much as can be collected without discouraging the use of recreational areas. Any tax that is added to what the State charges will simply cut down the use, which as a matter of policy, the State is encouraging. If the tax is not added to the present charges then it must be paid out of the charges collected by the State and the State has that much less money to pay the cost of maintenance and operation.

It would seem that Congress in enacting the admission tax section of the Revenue Act had in mind this fundamental theory, and considered it so well accepted that it was not necessary to make an exception to the law. In writing section 1701 into the Revenue Act providing exemptions in the case of admission to religious, educational, or charitable entertainments Congress extended the general theory that State functions should not be taxed, and specifically exempted all those things which are generally considered to be for the good of the people as a whole, even though they are conducted by individuals or private societies or associations. This section also exempts societies or organizations conducted for the sole purpose of improving any city, town, village, or other municipality, or of maintaining a cooperative or community center moving-picture theater where no part of the net earnings inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, or where the net earnings inure exclusively to the benefit of persons in military or naval forces of the United States or National Guard organizations or members of the police or fire department of any city, town, or village or other municipality. It is not reasonable to think that Congress would exempt from taxes entertainments which private individuals considered to be for the general good of the people, and at the same time tax admissions to recreational areas which the State itself has constructed and declared to be set up for the general health and welfare of its people.

There is no need to argue over the wording of the act or to go into a long dissertation on the right of one government to tax another. The fact is that this policy of recreation has been adopted by a number of States for the general welfare of the people and it should not be burdened by placing a tax on it. The best way to clarify the question is to amend the law and specifically state that recreational facilities conducted by the State or any of its municipalities will be exempt from this tax.

A distinction is made in the case of facilities that are essentially entertainments rather than for the recreation of the people, such as shows and athletic events where the number of participants are few compared to the great number who go to enjoy the entertainments or diversions rather than to participate in them. For this reason the proposed amendment excepts from the exemption taxes levied on admissions of spectators.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO INTERNAL REVENUE ACT

SEC. 1701. Exemptions from tax: No tax shall be levied or collected under this subchapter in respect of (a) any fees, charges, or admissions, all the proceeds of which inure exclusively to a State or any political subdivision thereof, or to any public corporation created by special act of the legislature of a State for a public purpose, no part of the net earnings of which inure to the benefit of any private stockholders or individual, provided that this exemption shall not apply to fees, charges, or admissions collected from spectators at athletic exhibitions, performances, or contests.

Old-Age Pensions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. O'CONNOR

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES F. O'CONNOR, OF MONTANA

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech which I delivered before the convention of Townsend Clubs at Buffalo, N. Y., last week:

My dear friends, it is a great pleasure for me to meet with this representative group of people who during this intense heat came from great distances and with great personal sacrifices to themselves. This convention is composed of the finest, sincerest, and patriotic group of American people whose purpose in meeting is not grounded on selfishness but to bring about a great and needed economic change in our distributive system. That there is a need for a fundamental change is admitted by all. A part of this change is the necessity for dealing more humanely with the aged or our senior citizens. Back of this great thought is the President of the United States. This is what he said on September 11, 1940, in an address in Constitution Hall in the City of Washington:

"Our old-age pension system must be improved and extended. The amount of the pension should be increased and above all, these pensions must be given in a manner which will respect the dignity of the life of service and labor which our aged citizens have given to the Nation.

"It is my hope that soon the United States will have a national system under which no needy man or woman within our borders will lack a minimum old-age pension which will provide adequate food, clothing, and lodging at the end of the road without having to go to the poorhouse to get it, and I look forward to a system which, in addition to this bare minimum, will enable those who have faithfully toiled in any occupation to build up additional security for their old age which will allow them to live in comfort and happiness."

Thus you will observe that our President has committed himself to a national system of pension.

I want to make clear one point before proceeding, that nothing can happen in Europe, Asia, or Africa that will free America from its economic ills, and victory, defeat, or compromise over there will leave us with our major problems, unemployment, poverty among our poor people and among our aged people, lack of distribution only magnified manyfold and made more difficult of solution. The repercussions whatever they are when peace is finally declared, will put us in a position of facing the most trying and ardous times through which this country has passed or we hope we will ever again have to face. So looking for no hope from that source on the conclusion of this debacle in Europe, unemployment and hunger, a lower standard of living for everybody will stalk our footsteps everywhere. We must prepare now to absorb the shock which is inevitably coming.

The phase of economic recovery in the Townsend plan has not been given the importance by the American people that it deserves. To my way of thinking it has chartered a proposed course that, if followed, would go a long ways in helping in this crisis and the one to follow. We have tremendous sums of idle money today, and upon the conclusion of this war we will, whatever the result, have still more. One of the reasons for this is that the Federal Government has entered the field of financing worthy projects and in that field it is there to stay. This leaves no place to go for this great bulk of private funds except to be invested in Federal securities. Remember idle money makes idle men. Expenditures of the annuities provided for in the Townsend plan would put a large part of this great huge sum of idle money to work. As this money is put into the economic stream and purchases goods or the necessities of life for our aged people, it gives employment to other persons to reproduce the same or similar things that are bought.

Again it will make room for the young fellows as the aged worker is retired on a competency. The young people must have employment. Many people say this country cannot afford this plan. My answer is that the country cannot afford not to adopt this or a similar plan. We cannot afford to have our young men tramping the roads, streets, and alleys, idle, hungry, and looking for work. They will fall into crime. That won't do. These boys are our future men.

This plan is not based on need to aged people. Our present social-security law is wholly wrong on this point. It provides for the payment of $20 per month, providing the State matches that sum. No State, to my knowledge, with the exception of California, has done this. Consequently, in some States the aged people receive very few dollars per month. Moreover, the States have the right to determine the question of need. The reason why the Townsend plan will work is that 85 percent of the people over 60 years of age are in need. It would cost more to determine need for all than it would to pay the other 15 percent their annuities. Besides, this 15 percent will have to spend that money. It might be proper to state, there will be approximately 11,000,000 people who will be qualified to receive this annuity. The bill which I introduced, the Townsend plan, will bring in around $50 per month per person. That will go a long way in providing a reasonable way of living and put into circulation a huge sum of money.

The method for the collection of this money is a simple one, a gross income tax with an exemption of $3,000 per year. It will be based on pay-as-you-go policy. In brief, if this plan is put into operation it will serve two specific needed purposes. First, to provide a decent living for our aged people to which they are entitled as American citizens of a Nation with more than 50 percent of the resources of the world and 7 percent of the population of the world. We should be ashamed of ourselves to permit any aged person to live on less than the necessities of life. This plan is a humane, decent, and American way of treating our aged people. Second, the plan will stimulate business. It will put into circulation as I said before a huge sum of money. It will cause a tremendous lot of goods to be consumed and will put to work hundreds of thousands of young men in reproducing the things consumed by this means. As we go along with this spending the national income will be increased and the amount to be paid to the annuitant will thereby be increased. Some people say, "Well, it will reach a run-away amount." The answer to that is, Congress will be in session and can always change the tax to regulate the amount to be paid.

Now, I introduced H. R. 1036, which is the Townsend Plan, at the request of the Townsend organization. I did this because I firmly believe in it. We who are backing this bill did everything we could to secure a hearing upon it before the Ways and Means Committee of the House. Up to date the committee has refused a hearing. Therefore it became necessary to file a discharge petition to take the bill from the committee and get it on the floor of the House for consideration. This petition was filed on June 10 of this year. Up to date 126 Members of Congress have signed this petition. You will recall that 101 voted for this bill when it was up for passage 2 years ago so you will see that the sentiment is growing for the bill. We will make every effort to secure the needed number, namely, 218.

I want to speak a moment about a rule of the House which provides that it takes a majority of the Members of the House to have a bill even considered where a committee serves as a bottleneck to prevent consideration of a bill. In other words, it takes as many to cause a bill to be considered as it does to pass a bill. That is a harsh and unreasonable rule in my opinion and sooner or later it must be changed if democratic processes are going to be observed. I tried to have this rule amended 2 years ago to provide on a petition being signed by 145 Members of the House that it automatically discharged the committee and placed the bill before the House for consideration, but I was unsuccessful in my attempt. I am going to try again. The highest number of votes ever cast for any bill this year was 391. Now then, nearly one-third of that number have already within 20 days signed my petition and there have been absent from the House during this period on an average of 140 Members. It is safe to assume that many of those would have signed if they were in attendance.

I want to leave this thought with you that Dr. Townsend, the founder of this plan, has made the Nation conscious of its need. He has earned a place in the affection and hearts of the American people that few in private life have ever attained. Whatever bill that is passed providing for a decent pension, Dr. Townsend must, in justice, be given the credit whether it is his plan or some other plan. Unselfishly and laboriously he has striven for this great humane, needed measure. I also wish to add that many Members of Congress, including myself, have fought and will continue to fight and struggle until victory shall crown our efforts.

We cannot hope to challenge the world's attention to the benefits of democracy unless we make democracy work in America. How should we make it work? We cannot sit supinely by and deal in platitudes and say we have a nation of four freedoms—the freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom from want, and freedom from fear. In theory, that is what we have, but we have not been making this theory work. One-third of our people would today be in want were it not for the defense program in being engaged in the manufacturing of things to kill people with, and with the defense program millions of our aged people are in want. What an indictment against the statesmanship of this country to have to admit that we could not or did not solve the want problem. Are those poor people who are in want free of fear? When they get up in the morning of the first day of the month, they don't know if they will have enough to get through until the last day of that month. Freedom of religion, let us see about that. We are all striving for the same objective, namely, the salvation of our soul and we are supposed to have the right to obtain that objective through any religious faith we adopt. Yet I have known where teachers in our public schools were discriminated against because they were of a certain religious faith. The old Ku Klux Klan is again sticking up its reptilian head emitting its poisonous spew. We have not equality of our racial groups. Persons are today being discriminated against because by accident they happen to belong to a certain group. This, my friends, is not democracy at work. Our job is to see that it actually works. After all democracy is the hope of the world and it can be and will be made to work.

Nazi-ism, fascism, and communism won't do. They deny the freedom of man. Man was not born to be dictated to by any person. I am unalterably opposed to any form of "ism" that has for its purpose a state or socialized ownership and control of the resources and property of the country, as well as the personal rights of the people. The most that can be said as between these "isms" is that there is a distinction without a difference. Hitler and Stalin, each the leader of a pack, are now at grips. So far as affecting the morals and welfare of the world, victory either way would make little, if any, difference. However, they have been hunting for victims in two packs in the past. Should either win now all would hunt in one pack. In the past each, fearful of the other, spent time on the watch. Should a winner emerge, the pack would give its entire time conquering free peoples. It would be better for the world, however, for Hitler not to win, as he is the shrewder and more efficient in his work, consequently more dangerous. The history of both show that they have been trying to outdo each other in brutality, human massacre, wickedness, and human slavery. Each hand is equally bloody. It is obvious that we must arm to the teeth as quickly and as effectively as possible. Let there be no doubt, if Hitler beats Stalin, my friends, we must be on our guard. We have called him and his people every name in the catalog, and we now must be prepared to back those accusations up or else take the consequences. I want to emphasize that we must not get into this European war. It is going to be a long, disastrous, and bloody one. Human lives do not and will not count. We must stay out of this caldron of human butchery. We must be on our guard to keep this country free from any foreign entanglements with any foreign nation. This we must fight until the end. Should we be so asinine as to be led into this European mess of killing, no such thing as a Federal pension will take place for years and years; any kind, Townsend or otherwise. I repeat again we must stay out. Let us not follow some finespun theory that England is our first line of defense. That is England's theory, not ours. We are willing to help her all we can short of war without stripping ourselves of our needed defense materials.

Now, my friends, in closing let us first of all thank God that we are Americans, that we are a free people, that we can and will reach a point of more nearly perfection than we now have. Let us be tolerant of those who do not agree with us. Let us try to help the weary, depressed, and those in want as we go along. Let us ask the Government to lend its helping hand to these millions of people who believe as you and I do. Let us continue to lend every mite of our power to preparing a defense for our Nation so that it may achieve victory in any contest. Let us at the same time spend more time on our knees and pray to our God that the leaders in our world, who are motivated by pride for fear someone else will go down in history greater than they, also by greed and selfishness because of the desire of power, be given light to the end that this insane destruction of human lives and property cease and that God in all His wisdom and charity will again become triumphant. Let us have faith in our God; let us have faith in our country; and, lastly, let us have faith in ourselves and we will win.

Independence Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM G. STRATTON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM G. STRATTON OF ILLINOIS

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address which I gave on July 4, 1941, at Hillsboro, Ill., at the Independence Day celebration sponsored by the Montgomery County Republican Central Committee:

Friends, as we meet here today to celebrate our country's anniversary, war rages, and brutal tyranny is rampant in the world.

We cannot help but realize that only in free America is it possible to gather in meetings of this kind and exercise the right of free speech. These rights are a heritage—won by our ancestors in their war of independence. Now, as the war fever rises, we have to be more diligent than ever to insure open and full discussion of the grave problems affecting every American. It is not too late to see that tolerance and understanding, rather than bigotry and persecution, are necessary if we are to maintain our strength and morale in these critical times.

As the crow flies or the bomber speeds, Hillsboro, Ill., is today the same distance from London, Berlin, or Moscow as it was in 1776. It is also true that because of the shortening of the time it takes to traverse space today Europe is much closer to us and more able to influence our political decisions and foreign policy than during the Revolution when we hoped we had severed for once and for all the political ties which bound us to the Old World. We are closer to Europe's troubles today, but it is just as much our desire to avoid the conflict as it was the wish of our colonial forefathers to be released from participation in the troubles on the Continent and nearby isles. By judicious statesmanship and an alert foreign policy, backed by an impregnable defense—the best Army, Navy, and air force in the world—we can keep the distances from Europe's war capitals just as far removed.

Our revered revolutionaries, whose courage we are gathered here to commemorate today, declared their independence and desire for freedom from Europe with its tyrannies and endless wars. Yet now 165 years later we are almost up to the firing line of the worst holocaust which the incendiary European nations have ever started.

The 3,950 miles from Hillsboro to London, the 3,100 miles from Hillsboro to Berlin, and the 5,000 miles from here to Moscow, were put between us by the spirit of the men of 1776. Theirs was more than an act of liberation from the despotic control of a grasping, selfish European monarch who symbolized the old world's exploitive philosophy toward the Western Hemisphere. They fought for the true philosophy of freedom. They implemented that philosophy with a system of government which has safely weathered every crisis confronting our land. They created the "four freedoms" about which we hear so much said today One would almost think that the current "patriots of publicity" not only coined the four freedoms but had a monopoly patent to dispense them among the Americas. The men of that age which is summed up in the phrase "the spirit of 1776" fought and bled that we might be here today to enjoy our freedom and seek happiness.

Not only do we hear a lot of ballyhoo about the four freedoms, but we are being asked to fight abroad for them. But there are other freedoms. One is the freedom to vote on issues which are vital to every American citizen. Another is freedom to learn where the Government is leading its people. I doubt that any country in Europe has been less informed about the intentions of its government than we have been in the United States. It is doubtful, in my opinion, that any country has been more misled about the actual developments of the war. For many years the true facts about Europe have been hidden from us. Whenever anyone made an attempt to disclose the facts they met with the utmost criticism and opposition.

The rights, liberties, and freedom which we still possess were not purchased in the international market place; they were bought with the blood and toil of patriots. Valiant Americans have, in the past, given their lives gladly to protect these blessings. What a mockery of that faith to send our young men to be slaughtered again in the useless carnage of a foreign war. In the last World War, Americans fought to end all war, and yet what an unholy fraud was practiced upon them. Shortly it became all too apparent that instead of banishing war the seeds of another conflict had been sown and democracy was fast withering. Are we again to be plunged into the fight to save Europe from itself?

In this hour let us hope that an enduring peace may yet be achieved in this warring world. The men who sacrificed their lives in the last war fought and suffered to achieve peace. Peace founded on justice is the only path to progress and prosperity. War not only destroys the lifeblood and resources of a nation but leaves a terrible aftermath of depression and misery in its wake. Before we again plunge headlong into the dark whirlpool of strife we must be sure that we are fighting in defense of American independence. Much as we may abhor the barbarism and complete disregard of human values in other lands we should recognize the tragedy of hurling ourselves into the abyss.

We must beware of the subtle propaganda of those who would lead us into war to serve their own selfish ends. What shall it profit this country to save the world and lose its own heritage?

Fellow Americans, 80 percent of the American people are against America's involvement in the war. I believe that 80 percent is a good majority, and that the majority ought to rule. This is a democratic principle. We were told and are still being told that at the election last November the majority of the people elected a President, that in a democracy the majority rules, and that the elected President must be accepted by all the people. If that be true, and I am not questioning it, by what new principle of democracy does the majority rule in one case and not in another? And who determines when it shall rule and when it shall not rule? Was the election last November a free election or a controlled plebiscite? If a much smaller percentage of the American people was a ruling majority in November 1940, why should 60 percent of them not be a ruling majority in July 1941?

But I believe, and all the indications are, that the American people's war against war is succeeding. It is gaining ground steadily and notably. The President himself is hesitating because of it to take the last fatal step toward which he has been moving. It will fully succeed if we do not relax our efforts now that the advantage is with us; in spite of name-calling and smears by those on the war side; in spite of incidents to put a ban on free speech recently in Florida and Philadelphia, the city of brotherly love; in spite of interventionist propaganda, aided and abetted from overseas; and in spite of saber rattling in high places.

The American people do not want war, and they are determined that they shall not have it—at least not until they themselves say so. When the people themselves say so, that is democracy. When it comes by Presidential decree, that is dictatorship. When it comes by the will of the few, that is oligarchy. We are a republic governed by the will of a majority of our people, and we want to remain so. The will of the people in 1776 decided our country's fate. If this Republic is still a nation of, by, and for the people, we should all be allowed to decide our fate today.

The intensity of the so-called "racial" animosities in Europe, perpetually fanned by political propaganda, is difficult for the average American, the man with little personal contact with those countries, to comprehend. I think such understanding is important in our decision between the advice of President Washington: Stay out of the quarrels of Europe; and the advice of President Roosevelt: All out for another Don Quixote crusade in Europe, Asia, Africa, and the isles of the seas. I believe that racial animosities and conflicts are intensified, not minimized by war. We disregarded the advice of George Washington in 1917. The result was a bigger and better headache for us and for Europe, if not for the world. Are we foolish enough to repeat in 1941? Is it not possible that by staying home this time, giving all our intelligence and resources to creating a better and stronger democracy here, and with "Malice toward none, with charity for all" we may give a more substantial impetus to a more peaceful world order like the one we are gathered here to celebrate today, based less on force and more on understanding and justice. Do we imagine, again, that we, really and truly, are defending our own homes, our own shores, our own way of life, by running bloody errands for other people in Europe, in Asia, and in Africa?

Let us, for a few minutes, take a look at the latest outbreak in Europe between Hitler and Stalin. Communistic Russia, whom we were denouncing a few weeks ago, has requested and is now awaiting material aid from the United States. This brings me back to our highly publicized "four freedoms."

When "red" Russia beckoned as an ally, it certainly caused the "four freedoms" to blush. The Bolsheviks are not on speaking terms with freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom from fear, and freedom from want. They don't know each other and have never met. The Communists are fighting Finland, the only European country which did not default on her debt to us, and now we are about to freeze her credits and help to starve her people while our lips piously proclaim the "four freedoms." What an embarrassment? Surely enough to cause red faces.

The inexorable law of events has exploded the unsound, hypocritical contention that this war is for the "four freedoms." It is, as the European wars for centuries have always been, for power and economic domination. The slogans such as, "Make the world safe for democracy" in 1914–18, and now the same tune in the key of the "four freedoms" are merely means for the administration leaders in Washington to mislead the people.

Are we going to fight Russia to force her to adopt the "four freedoms"? And if Poland, Greece, and China are restored will we then force the "four freedoms" on each of them or will we permit those countries to revert to pre-war status quo of dictatorships?

And who would restore our four freedoms here at home if in the newest of the ever-recurring European wars we should intervene and lose our democratic way of life? And remember that if we do intervene in a foreign undeclared war, despite the fact that the American people have been told many times before election day that our boys would not be sent into a foreign war, then democracy has been dealt a staggering blow at home. In my estimation, our Republic will be dead if this happens.

We will have lost everything we have fought for and cherished since our 1776 Declaration of Independence, which we are all gathered here to celebrate today.

It is not a new thing for an administration which fails to solve domestic problems at home to turn to a foreign war as an escape measure, and it has been suggested in a newspaper column that the present administration is following precisely this course.

I say to you here and now that we can best serve ourselves and humanity by maintaining inviolate our free institutions here at home. And to that end, realizing our sacred obligation to defend America at all costs, I pledge to you that as long as I represent the people of the State of Illinois in the halls of your Congress, I will not cast my vote to sacrifice the flower of American youth in any foreign war.

Penalties Against Farmers For Raising Wheat in Excess of Their Quotas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH, OF OHIO

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the radio recently:

Ladies and gentlemen, I want to discuss with you this evening an issue of the gravest moment, namely the penalties which are to be in effect against wheat farmers who had not signed up under the A. A. A. program.

While this question naturally is of more immediate concern to farmers than it is to those of us living in urban areas, yet it involves very much that vitally concerns all of us.

Most people know something about the A. A. A. program, that some farmers have signed up under it, and that some have not; that those who have signed are subject to what is known as crop quota controls, or restrictions in the amount of, say, corn and wheat they may plant; and that those who have signed up receive certain money payments from the Government.

Some have participated in the Government's farm program because they believed in it.

Others have not taken part in it because they did not believe in it.

Many farmers have participated in the program who did not believe in it at all. Since they are forced to pay additional taxes to pay for the program they have felt their only means of protection was sharing in it.

The most important thing for us to keep constantly in mind in considering the questions we have under discussion is this: The farmers and all the people of our country have been from the beginning of the Government's farm program assured and reassured by every spokesman and advocate of the program that it would never be made compulsory. Every assurance has always been given that individual farmers would always be perfectly free to join or not to join.

Never, never was the program to be compulsory. So long as it was not compulsory, we were told, nobody could complain, all the farmers would still be free and our democracy would not be in jeopardy.

The truth is the program has been largely compulsory from the start, but we shall not discuss this now.

But those of us who understood the law and had watched, knew better. We were never deceived by these promises. We knew and repeatedly warned that this scheme would ultimately become completely compulsory.

As is now known the Government's farm program has become completely compulsory. The farmer is no longer free to sign up or not to sign up. Now the strong arm of the Federal law stands over him and tells him he must sign on the dotted line, or else he will be severely punished.

Aye, what is so much worse that we are terrified is that some of those farmers who had not signed up are now forced by the law passed on May 26 of this year, not only to sign for the future, but are being penalized and punished for not having signed up a year ago.

Wheat farmers who had, of course, sowed their wheat last fall, who had not signed up under the program, and who planted more acres of wheat than they would have been allowed to plant had they signed up, these farmers must now pay a penalty of 49 cents a bushel on all such excess wheat they harvest.

Five weeks ago today there was held throughout the country in the rural area what was termed a wheat quota referendum. The purpose of this so-called referendum was to determine whether the wheat farmers who had not signed up under the A. A. A. program should be forced to do so, and be penalized for having planted more wheat last fall than the farm bureaucrats would have allowed them to plant had they been signed up.

This so-called referendum was not only to fix the amount of wheat farmers can plant in the future, but applied to wheat sowed last fall. It was retroactive.

This so-called referendum passed. The effect is, as stated, those farmers who had not signed up, and who have more wheat planted than they would have been allowed to plant had they signed up, will be penalized on all such excess.

Suppose a farmer who had not signed up has planted 20 acres of wheat, and he is allowed only 15 acres. He must do one of several things with the 5 excess acres:

He must pay the Government 49 cents a bushel for all of the wheat raised on the 5 acres; or

He must store this excess wheat under Government bond for an indefinite period of time, until the A. A. A. at some future unspecified date decides it can be released; or

He must store it under Government bond and receive a loan on it amounting to 60 percent of what the farmers who are signed up under the A. A. A. can get on all the wheat they raise.

The farmer who has not signed up can get a loan on his excess wheat only, but only 60 percent of the amount made to cooperating farmers. Farmers who have signed up can get a loan of 85 percent of parity on all their wheat.

If the wheat is stored the farmer is liable for any and all storage charges.

This farmer is forbidden to feed his excess wheat, give it away, except that he can give it to the A. A. A., or do anything else with it but what I have indicated.

There is no way whatever that this farmer can escape some sort of penalty.

Let us examine the eligibility of the participants, the machinery and method of the wheat quota referendum.

I do not now have the figures for the whole Nation, but the number of wheat farmers who were eligible to vote was very small.

In Ohio less than 25 percent of the total number of wheat farmers was eligible to vote.

Actually only 75 percent of the eligible farmers voted.

The referendum lost heavily in Ohio, the vote having been 16,943 against and 15,543 for.

A two-thirds vote was required for the measure to carry. While it lost in Ohio, it carried in the Nation.

But I want you to listen carefully to the next figure I shall give you.

When the vote in Ohio is analyzed it is seen that less than 9 percent of the wheat farmers in the whole State cast their ballots for the measure.

Is there a single person listening to me who believes that was right?

Yet this so-called wheat referendum was hailed by the agricultural bureaucrats as a democratic procedure.

All the farmers who had planted 15 acres or less of wheat, whether they had or had not signed up were not eligible to vote.

Who was eligible to vote?

Only farmers who had planted more than 15 acres of wheat, whether they had signed or not, were eligible to vote.

Nevertheless, farmers who have 15 acres or less of wheat, though they are not allowed to vote, will be forced to secure wheat market cards before they can sell their wheat.

The farmers who had more than 15 acres planted had the whole say as to whether or not their group should be penalized. Furthermore, only farmers who had more than 15 acres of wheat were permitted to serve on the voting board.

Just what brand of democratic process is this?

Who will say this was right?

The people who conducted the so-called wheat-quota referendum and tabulated the votes were, in this section, at least, and more than likely all over the country, composed mostly of A. A. A. township committeemen and county supervisors. Committeemen and supervisors are paid employees of the A. A. A., and therefore had a financial interest in the outcome of the referendum vote. This is not meant as any reflection on the integrity of any of these people. I know many of them and they are fair and honest and can be fully trusted. Some of them do not even believe in the program.

But will anyone contend that this was a proper procedure? Should not those farmers who were opposed to the quota have been entitled to equal representation on the board that conducted the voting?

In view of this manner of conducting the referendum vote on wheat quotas, how do we know a majority was cast for it?

Furthermore, most, but not all, of the people who conducted the vote made an active campaign to get out all the votes favorable to their side, even to the extent of hauling them to the voting places.

They made no effort to get out the votes of those they knew were aginst the quota.

In fact, it is clearly evident that in many instances there was deliberate effort to keep farmers who opposed the quota from voting.

All the farmers who were eligible to vote were supposed to have been notified in writing of the time and place of the referendum. I know of numerous cases where farmers who were opposed had not received any notice. There are two such instances in my own family.

The most significant thing about the campaign made in favor of the quota restrictions was the complete silence about the penalties to be imposed. These were never mentioned. Many of the cooperating farmers, as well as those who had not signed up, did not have all the facts relating to the penalties when they voted, and many cooperating farmers who voted in favor of the measure would not do so again, since they have learned of the viciousness of the penalties.

I have failed to see in any notices that were sent to farmers or appeared in newspapers any explanation of the penalties that were to be imposed.

Much propaganda was put out by the proponents of this measure that unless the quota was approved wheat would drop materially in price. Assurance was given that voting for the measure meant dollar wheat, that if it lost the price would drop very low. In answer to these wholly unfounded statements I should like to refer you to an analysis I made of the effects of crop loans on prices of wheat, corn, cotton, and tobacco, which analysis appears on page 5561 in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 26, 1941. That analysis shows that when no loans were made during the time since crop loans have been in operation prices were higher than when loans were made. It shows, furthermore, that when the least amount of loans was made the prices of crops involved were the highest, and vice versa.

The real evidence at hand appears to indicate that this political interference in agriculture is actually lowering farm prices, rather than raising them. As a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, which considers much of this legislation, I feel the A. A. A. is right now striving to keep agricultural prices from rising more than it is to raise them.

The farmers have not had their share of income since 1920. Now when they might have an opportunity to get what they are entitled to, why shouldn't they have it?

Many other irregularities, or what would be when compared with ordinary election procedures considered as irregularities, took place in conducting the so-called wheat quota referendum.

If the people of this country are going to stand for this unjust, this inequitable and unfair penalty on the wheat farmers, God help us.

Not only will the farmers become regimented to the point of becoming slaves to the Washington bureaucrats, but it should be expected that labor and all industry will be bound to go the same way.

For the farmer next would come corn, then oats, rye, and so on until the last farm product was under centralized political control.

Can it be we are blind to what all this really is and means? Can we not see and understand that this is communism? Is it possible we do not realize that unless this is stopped it will go on and on until it has destroyed all property and human rights, the home, the church, and even the dignity of man himself, just as it has already done in Russia and is on the way of doing in Germany and other nations?

As you know, I have introduced a bill in Congress to repeal the act which makes these penalties possible. I want your support. The wheat farmers who are adversely affected by this act are rising up in the mightiest protest that this Nation has ever witnessed. Certainly I have never seen anything like it. Counties and States in great numbers are rapidly and spontaneously forming a national organization to bring the necessary influence to Washington to have these penalties repealed.

Marion County farmers are organizing. Give them all the help you can.

Suits are being instituted here in Ohio and possibly elsewhere to enjoin the A. A. A. from imposing the penalties.

My friends and fellow Americans, we just dare not let this pass. As stated, I am certain many who voted for this measure did not understand the penalty features. Surely many did not know the terrible effects the penalty would have upon those affected who, let us be careful to remember, are our own countrymen and neighbors.

Roosevelt Tours, Inc.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM G. STRATTON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE AMERICAN GUARDIAN

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article which appeared in the May 2, 1941, issue of the American Guardian. This article is very appropriate at this time, when the administration, in repudiation of its preelection pledge, is now urging Congress to repeal the present law restricting the service of the National Guard and draftees to the Western Hemisphere.

The article follows:

[From the American Guardian of May 2, 1941]

ROOSEVELT TOURS, INC., ANNOUNCES FREE TRIPS ABROAD

Excursion to Belgrade, Cairo, Buenos Aires, and all corners of the earth.

Luxurious American flagships.

All expenses paid—including Bethlehem bayonet, Goodyear gas masks, Du Pont grenades, hospitalization, knotty-pine coffin, dignified white cross, and gold stars for mothers.

No passport required.

We have left no stone unturned in our untiring efforts to make this unique trip a reality for this summer—the best that big money can buy is being rapidly made available.

For further information inquire at the White House or our branch offices at Wall Street and Downing Street.

"See the world through a gun sight."

We plan, you go.

The Proposed St. Lawrence Seaway Is an Invasion of the Rights of the American Workingman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein the following address opposing the St. Lawrence project delivered by me as a participant in the National Radio Forum sponsored by the Washington Evening Star and broadcast over the blue network of the National Broadcasting Co. Monday evening, July 7, 1941.

The address follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, so that there may be no misunderstanding, let us remember that the proposed St. Lawrence project is divided into two component parts—first, as a seaway which contemplates the establishment of a 27-foot channel from the mouth of the St. Lawrence River to Duluth, Minn., a distance of 1,677 miles.

The second part of the St. Lawrence project involves the construction of a large hydroelectric power dam at Messina, N. Y. This dam is calculated to produce 5,000,000 horsepower of electric current annually, 4,000,000 horsepower to go to Canada and 1,000,000 horsepower to New York State alone, no other State being a beneficiary of this hydroelectric power dam. The cost of the dam will be paid by the Federal Government and will be approximately $93,000,000. The power project, when completed, will be turned over to the State of New York, who will operate it, and over a period of 50 years pay back to the Government from the revenue obtained the original cost of construction.

When you view the project in two parts, namely as a seaway and power project, the natural question arises: What is the total cost? Those in favor of such a project are ultraconservatives in arriving at a cost figure, while those opposed to the project are unable to accept the modest cost claims of the advocates of the St. Lawrence project. On the other hand, leading and reliable industrial engineers in Canada and the United States place the cost in excess of $1,000,000,000, some contending that $1,350,000,000 is a sensible and sane estimate.

That these industrial engineers are proceeding on a sound basis is very evident when we recall the estimates that were given for the construction of the Panama Canal. The original estimate of $160,000,000 was absurd when the final cost was revealed as $375,000,000. Then, too, the Suez Canal was estimated at $30,000,000, but when completed the total cost was $80,000,000.

Aside from the great cost of this proposed project, let us keep in mind that we are being asked to construct this project at a time when the American people through the Lend-Lease Act are pledged to give Great Britain the necessary implements of war to continue her resistance against the Nazi government. England needs ships, planes, cannon, ammunition, and other military supplies. Why should we be asked at this critical period in world history to divert our manpower, materials, and financial resources to a project that cannot possibly be completed before 1947, and when completed the seaway portion will be frozen over 5 months of each year? In addition, only 15 percent of the population of the United States will benefit from the St. Lawrence project, with the remaining 85 percent of American citizens being called upon to pay their share of the cost of construction, estimated to exceed $1,000,000,000.

In estimating the cost of construction, there has been nothing said concerning the cost of defending the St. Lawrence project. Military experts are of the opinion that it will require $1,000,000,000 to erect the necessary defenses at strategic locations along the 1,677-mile front. Nor has a word been uttered about the maintenance cost of these defense posts. For the maintenance cost of the channel and locks alone, $20,000,000 will be expended annually for the seaway part of the project.

When we consider the cost of construction estimated to exceed $1,000,000,000 and add another billion dollars for the erection of defense posts requiring additional millions for maintenance costs, we can readily see that this proposed St. Lawrence project is destined to cost us billions of dollars. I am sure you will agree that this is a tidy sum of money to saddle on the already overburdened taxpayers of America.

For a moment let us dwell on the effect the St. Lawrence seaway will have on the American market and transportation facilities. Upon completion, the St. Lawrence project will open the Great Lakes to world shipping and within a few months you will have dirty, cheap, ill-manned foreign tramp steamers flying foreign flags dumping their cargoes at Great Lakes ports instead of on the Atlantic seaboard, as is being done at the present time. These foreign vessels do not meet the standards of American shipping—in wages, living or sanitary conditions. The wage paid these foreign seamen is about half of the amount paid our American seamen. In addition, the foreign vessels or their crews pay no taxes, nor are they subjected to any toll charges. On the other hand, American shipping interests and seamen pay taxes, only to see such revenue applied to building a project that is establishing ruinous competition and threatening to sabotage American shipping and the American market.

As a striking illustration, let me cite the invitation to bid issued by the city of Detroit on May 1, 1939, for 642 tons of cast-iron pipe. This invitation was sent to six firms in Chicago, one in Virginia, and one in Nancy, France. The bid was finally awarded to the French company at a price of approximately $24,400, and the next highest bidder was the Virginia company at $29,400, or $5,000 higher. The difference between the French bid and the Virginia bid was reflected in the transportation cost and the cost of labor. This pipe was shipped from France through the Strasbourg Canal, thence down the Rhine to Rotterdam and thence by a dirty, ill-manned tramp steamer to Detroit, utilizing the present 14-foot channel from the mouth of the St. Lawrence River to the Great Lakes. Therefore, it is reasonable to assume that if the St. Lawrence project is approved, the American manufacturer may expect severe competition of this type in all commodities.

These foreign tramp steamers in addition to disrupting the American market will deal a death blow to the transportation facilities of our Nation.

At the present time American railroads employ more than a million American citizens, and long trains carry millions of tons of freight to and from seaboard ports. These foreign tramp steamers will deprive the railroads of this freight traffic, and the devastating effect is more fully realized since every thousand tons of freight lost to the American railroads means the elimination of one freight train. When you remove freight trains you destroy the jobs of railroaders. Thus we have foreign seamen on these dirty tramp steamers benefiting at the expense of the American railroad employees.

The proponents of the St. Lawrence project are making glib promises to the farmer of the great Middle West. They promise new markets and increased prices because of a reduction in transportation costs. The farmer is told he will save 4 cents a bushel on wheat; yet in order to save that 4 cents the American taxpayer will be called upon to pay 15 cents a bushel in the form of a subsidy. We must not forget that on general cargoes the subsidy to be paid by American taxpayers will be $3.50 per ton. The farmer must not forget that when the Great Lakes are opened our farm markets will be open to agricultural products of foreign nations, such as we experienced in having Argentine beef competing with American packing-house products.

So far little has been said concerning the effect of the St. Lawrence project on the coal industry of the United States. We must not forget that these tramp steamers coming into the Great Lakes region with cargoes of foreign coal will create a greater import market for subsidized and tariff preferred coal of Great Britain, Nova Scotia, and Russia. This foreign coal produced by sweat labor and transported at distress rates will displace American coal produced at American mines under American working conditions. This would be in addition to the competition of crude and fuel oil produced from foreign sources under the same conditions.

The power part of the St. Lawrence project will produce hydroelectric power which will displace, both in Canada and the United States, the use of American-mined coal. And let us keep in mind that while this hydroelectric power may appear cheap, it, too, is subsidized by the American taxpayer.

Taking into consideration the importation of foreign-mined coal, and crude and fuel oil, together with the coal displaced by the power part of the St. Lawrence project, you will have destroyed a 35,000,000-ton American coal market. For every million tons of coal displaced we must keep in mind 1,000,000 man-days are lost to good American citizens in the mining and transportation industries.

The St. Lawrence project is nothing new. For the past 40 years it has been talked of at different intervals, only to be shunted aside as impractical and unsound. Now, when we are engaged in a gigantic effort to build an adequate national defense, advocates of this economic monstrosity have garbed it in the armor of national defense and presented it to the American people, hopeful that patriotic fervor will cause the Nation to accept it lock, stock, and barrel.

In foisting this project on the American people, advocates of the St. Lawrence project have forgotten that the timely admonition attributed to Abraham Lincoln was never more justified, when he said "you can fool some of the people all of the time, and all of the people some of the time, but you cannot fool all of the people all of the time."

Surely you good people in the State of Minnesota are not going to accept a project that will permit Finnish iron ore to be dumped on the American market at a cheaper price and in competition with the ore from the great Minnesota iron range; you good people in Michigan and Wisconsin are not content to see your great agricultural market destroyed by foreign competition and the wages of labor seriously menaced; you good people in the great Mississippi Valley should not be expected by your Government to see your great import and export market destroyed by foreign vessels plying our inland waters; you good people living along the Great Lakes who have been asked to visualize the construction of huge shipyards cannot help but realize that should the St. Lawrence project be completed, when the war is over such shipyards would be in deadly competition with shipyards on the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts, who would then be free to engage in construction of trans-Atlantic as well as Great Lake vessels.

As Admiral Land, Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission, so aptly said when commenting on such a situation—"it would be the survival of the fittest."

Finally, you good people who dwell in railroad communities in the great Middle West are fully conscious that when railroad traffic is reduced by the St. Lawrence project your jobs are in jeopardy and many thriving railroad towns are faced with the stark reality of being transformed into veritable "ghost towns."

We who live in the industrial States and on the seaboard are not being fooled by parading an old political pet—the St. Lawrence seaway—in the cavalcade of national defense. Nor are we fooled by the efforts of the great State of New York through political affiliations to secure a power project benefiting New York State alone—yet being paid for by the already overburdened American taxpayers. Nor are we going to play the "sucker game" with real estate agents in the Great Lake region who are licking their lips and rubbing their hands in glee awaiting the golden opportunity to profit from their speculations in land.

In joining us in defeating this political and economic monstrosity—the St. Lawrence project—you are enlisting in a cause that will repel an invasion of the rights of the American workingman and contribute to the general welfare of every American citizen. Yes—you will be giving voice to the sentiments that should be inscribed on every heart—Let us preserve the home and the job of every American workingman.

Mass Meeting of America First Committee, Akron, Ohio, July 7, 1941

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STEPHEN A. DAY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. STEPHEN A. DAY, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. DAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered at a mass meeting of the America First Committee, Akron, Ohio, July 7, 1941:

The time has passed when the Congress of the United States can be stampeded. Every hard-working Congressman has from necessity become a student of world affairs. Every Congressman who appreciates the vital need of America in this crisis knows that no solution will be accepted by the American people which is not an American solution. In this new spirit of appraisal and with the expression of over 80 percent of the millions of American people before them, the Congress of the United States is prepared to make a decision. That decision will be that the United States of America will make every preparation for American defense, but will never vote to send the son of an American father or mother to fight and die on foreign soil in any European, Asiatic, or African war.

A noticeable change has taken place among the leaders in Congress who have supported the New Deal wholeheartedly. The turning point came on June 28, 1941, in the pronouncements from the floor of two outstanding administration supporters. The first of these was Senator WALTER GEORGE, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and who more than any other carried through to adoption the lend-lease bill. Senator GEORGE, speaking after the fullest study and reflection, weighing the trend of America toward totalitarianism, said in part as follows:

"Mr. President, the way to national unity in America is not through methods of totalitarianism. It is not through asking for powers for which there is no need, and which cannot be wisely exercised without disrupting the orderly processes of living and making a living in the United States.

"The way to national unity is to give our people the assurance that when we are called upon to move into the actual range of fire and send our men there, whether on board naval vessels or in the aircraft, the American people themselves will have some opportunity to pass upon that question; in other words, that they will have the ultimate decision, through the machinery to which they have become accustomed and the only machinery which they have at hand, will be able to pass upon the question of whether an actual state of war shall be brought into being or a formal declaration of hostilities shall be made by the people of the United States."

My fellow Americans, Senator GEORGE has joined with WHEELER and Lindbergh and with the America First Committee that the Congress of the United States must pass upon the question of war for the American people. I can say to you tonight that the voice of the American people has been heard in Washington and that the Constitution of the United States still lives in all its glory and integrity in the hearts of a loyal Congress.

On the same day Congressman WOODRUM of Virginia, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, who piloted through the House the authorization of $7,000,000,000 to implement the lend-lease bill, arose on the floor and in answer to the statement that the War Department was planning to ask the Congress to make a formal declaration of a national emergency which would put the Nation on a virtual war status and make it possible for troops to be sent anywhere in the world, said:

"The man today who stands before the American people and advocates a declaration of war either does not know anything about what he is talking or else he is utterly stupid, or both.

"The idea of this country going off now and trying to settle the conflicting emotions and ideologies of Europe to me is ridiculous, even if we were prepared to do so, and we are not. There are many reasons why we should not go abroad. It is only necessary to state one, and that is we have not the troops nor the equipment.

"Mr. Speaker, if anybody has a notion in his head, either in the War Department or in any other department, that they can come to this Congress and get any sort of declaration that will put us aggressively into the European war or that will send American expeditionary forces abroad, I think the sooner they get the idea out of their heads the better it will be."

How ridiculous is the proposition that we should go to war now? The answer is provided in a fair consideration of the following facts. If we go into the war, we cannot go in part way. It must be total war and involve not only our Navy and our air force, but our men. We must provide and equip and successfully land on foreign soil an expeditionary force of 10,000,000 men. To transport this vast army abroad will necessitate the building of 40,000,000 tons of shipping. It will take 10 years to provide these ships. To my mind it is not merely ridiculous but criminal to urge the slaughter of American boys into a war now when all authorities know that we are hopelessly unprepared.

We have heard much about blowing Hitler off the map. Commanding, as he soon will, the entire continent of Europe with the most perfectly mechanized army and powerful air force the world has ever seen, those who call for a complete victory over Hitler must weigh their words. No advocate of war can now say that if it is America's duty to insure a British victory we can do it without the use of our manpower. I do not ask you to take my word for this but I call your attention to an interview on July 4, 1941, of General Wavell, commander in chief of the British Armies in the Middle East, to Harold Denny, of the New York Times. General Wavell, you will recall, is the one British commander in chief who has some victories to his credit. He stated in part as follows:

"Mr. DENNY. Do you hold with the views that only tools are necessary to win the war?

"General WAVELL. No; undoubtedly we will need manpower if the war continues long enough. I have no doubt it will.

"Mr. DENNY. Can you win the war without America's full-scale participation?

"General WAVELL. We will have to have airplanes, tanks, munitions, transport, and finally men."

Reflecting upon these words from General Wavell, what are we to think of the recent utterances of Colonel Knox, our great Secretary of the Navy, who has become a one-man general headquarters? Colonel Knox urges us to get into the war now, utilizing the American Navy to drive all German submarines from the seven seas. The colonel, without regard to the expressed statements of Senator GEORGE and Congressman WOODRUM, has no patience with Congress. He wants to declare war himself. He knows that we are totally unprepared for war and that shooting of submarines will bring total war. He knows that after this shooting by the American Navy we must go to the extent indicated by General Wavell. He knows that it will take 40,000,000 tons of shipping to transport the gigantic American expeditionary force and that these ships cannot be provided in less time than 10 years. Then why does Colonel Knox make these belligerent statements which have not been made by President Roosevelt? There is only one answer. Colonel Knox has watched the development of the American Navy with such enthusiasm that he is like a little boy who wants to shoot off fireworks on the Fourth of July. He simply cannot wait to hear the big naval guns sending their salvos over the waters of the high seas. Colonel Knox is hysterical and as an able newspaper man cannot resist the thrill of big headlines. Cooler heads prevail in Washington and Colonel Knox must indulge in a cooling-off period.

To understand the present world situation we must realize just where we stand today. Eliminating a few small neutral nations, Britain and Soviet Russia are not fighting merely Germany but the combined nations of the world. Lined up with Germany are Italy, France, Hungary, Rumania, Finland, Japan, and Turkey. Spain and Portugal are in sympathy with Germany and Norway, Holland, Belgium, Yugoslavia, and Greece have been conquered by Germany. China is still fighting Japan and can be of no help to Britain. We can now say to those who urge that we defeat Germany, they must realize that we must also defeat practically the entire world in both Europe and Asia.

President Roosevelt has stated that we must by force impress the four freedoms on the entire world. To do this we must overthrow by our armed forces all of the nations which I have just mentioned and in addition thereto India and the entire continent of Africa. President Roosevelt has stated that we must become the arsenal for the entire world, to help all nations fighting Germany. The Congress has already appropriated $43,000,000,000 for our national defense and aid to Britain. The President has stated that he will provide total aid for Soviet Russia in her fight with Germany. Trained experts have estimated that if we enter the war we must appropriate at least another $100,000,000,000 and that the war will last from 10 to 30 years.

Think what this means. Small boys now 11 years old will ultimately be drawn into the hell of war and perhaps millions yet unborn. There is no use trying to dodge the inevitable consequences of our involvement in this war. President Roosevelt has said that it is a war between two philosophies of government and that we cannot hope for peace in America until the Hitler philosophy has been entirely crushed from the face of the earth. Fellow Americans, this can mean only one thing. America must decide now, if it follows the Roosevelt leadership, to make destructive war the permanent policy of the United States for from 10 to 30 years. It means national suicide for our form of government—and economic slavery.

Men have differed as to the definition of dictatorship. But men do not differ that our involvement in a war of this magnitude must mean dictatorship. President Roosevelt is 59 years old. He may be this dictator for 10 years but it is practically impossible that he can live long enough to be our dictator for 30 years. Who will be this dictator? He may be now just a young boy. These facts are astounding. But, can anyone say that they are not true prophecies? With the world engaged in a war of this magnitude, the only peace that could follow would be a peace following exhaustion. It is time that we seriously reflect on the awful machines of war which men have in their hands. It is time that a united America solemnly resolve that we will spare no time or effort in making this Nation strong and impregnable for the protection of ourselves and the Western Hemisphere and that we shall not destroy our beloved America, by involvement in a suicidal war that will destroy every vestige of the institutions which we love so dearly.

I wish to say a few words on the situation in Britain. The British Empire which we are asked to help at this hour is not the British Empire of 1917 and 1918. The British Empire of 1941 is controlled by left-wing Socialists. The real power in Britain is not Churchill, it is Beaverbrook, Bevin, and Laski. If we understood the true situation we would not be surprised that Britain is willing to make an alliance with Stalin. Similar forces control both of these nations at this hour. The British Empire of 1917 and 1918 would never have embraced the red doctrines of communism. The world shudders at the prospect of a triumphant Soviet Russia. Total aid to Soviet Russia by the United States means the use of our armed forces to perpetuate the power and sway of godless communism. This change of events has made millions of Americans pause and reflect. Today we are fighting France—short of war, it is true—but if we follow the leadership of those who advocate war now, our American bombers will soon be dropping their instruments of death upon Paris and the cemeteries where lie our American dead of the last war. These bombers will also be carrying death and destruction to Rome and even the Vatican itself. Senator PEPPER has openly advocated that we should blow Tokyo off the map. Picture if you can the products of American industry and American labor passing over the lands where millions are starving in Poland, Holland, Belgium, and France and not carrying food but deadly bombs to make worse the suffering of these helpless people. Will the people of these lands bless us and ask for the four freedoms or will they forever curse us?

I have given much study to a movement that is growing in America to overthrow the Constitution of the United States and to destroy forever our American independence. This group chose the free soil of the great State of Ohio for the holding of their annual convention at Cleveland, on June 28 and 29, 1941. We dare no longer refrain from understanding what this movement called Federal Union and led by Clarence K. Streit means to those who love American liberty. The scheme is for union now between the United States and Britain on a basis that will make the United States merely a dominion or colony of the British Empire.

All news now coming out of Washington is censored, and the people are not told the facts. The truth is known only to the President and those within the inner circle handling and operating the $7,000,000,000 of war materials which we are giving to Britain. When the plan for union with Britain is completed there will be no need for Britain to repay us, since the American people and all subjects of the British Empire in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Ireland, the British Isles, and Africa will be all citizens of one government, the rulers of which will be Winston Churchill and Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

When news came that Soviet Russia was under attack by Germany, who first took to the radio and told the American people what was their duty in this changing scene? Was it not the voice of Winston Churchill speaking from London who told us that we must join our blood, sweat, and tears with Stalin and his blood-soaked comrades to save the world for the new order and the triumph of the new triumvirate of democracies? Who practically commanded us to waste no time in helping that great democrat, Josef Stalin, before President Roosevelt had made any pronouncements?

The backers of this movement do not advocate a League of Nations or a mere alliance. They go much further and advocate a complete union. Union now with Britain means also union with Soviet Russia and the hordes of India and the tribesmen of Africa. We would no longer be citizens of the United States but subjects of the British Empire and on the same voting basis with the millions who now live in abject poverty in many parts of the British Empire. The scheme seeks to delude the American people with the promise that our 130,000,000 people will constitute the largest segment in this federal union. It is common knowledge that Britain has offered a dominion status to India, and its 350,000,000 are almost three times as large as the United States in population. General Wavell has been transferred from the Middle East to India, and I have no doubt he has been sent there to cement the ties that bind the poverty-stricken denizens of India to the British Empire. If Britain enables Soviet Russia to defeat Germany, the 167,000,000 denizens of Soviet Russia will be in the Federal Union. What chance would our 130,000,000 of Americans have as against the 350,000,000 of India plus the 167,000,000 of Soviet Russia plus the millions of inhabitants of the British Isles, Ireland, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa? Mr. Streit claims that the Constitution of the United States authorizes this sort of a treasonable selling out of the American people, and for this I have asked the Dies committee to investigate him and his followers, and just as sure as there is a God in heaven I shall not stop my fight until this treachery to free America has been branded with the same brand that we place upon Communists, Fascists, and Bundists in the United States of America.

An Associated Press cablegram from London on July 2 stated that it was suggested that an honorary seat in the House of Commons and an honorary membership in the British Empire be offered by Winston Churchill to President Roosevelt so that henceforth July Fourth will be known as Interdependence Day instead of Independence Day. This follows the plan of Federal Union, Inc., sponsoring Union Now with Great Britain. Under that treasonable proposal, as set forth in Mr. Streit's book, Union Now With Britain, there is to be a joint presidency of Churchill and Roosevelt. The Congress of the United States is to be subordinated to the Union Parliament. President Roosevelt as an honorary Member of the British House of Commons would be able to build the Union Parliament. Such a suggestion shows how far we have gone along the road that must end in the complete selling out of the United States of America. Friday was July Fourth, Independence Day. So long as red blood still circulates in the hearts of real Americans this shall never be known as Interdependence Day. I am more determined than ever after receiving a tremendous response from all over the Nation to my broadcast of June 15 to fight those who would betray America into Union Now. Over 100,000 copies of this broadcast have been requested by patriotic Americans, and within another week a second hundred thousand copies will be printed.

The tide is turning in Washington. The Congress is determined to drive the serpent of internationalism from the free soil of America. We have commenced to put the Communists in their place. They must not be allowed to regain their power and influence in Washington because of the German-Russian war. We must not stop there. With your help we will check the betrayal of America into a Union Now with Britain. We have a right to cherish our American independence. No man can take this birthright from us. Just as in 1776 the wrath of the American people must be made known, and when the American people decide that this mongrel new union shall not happen here, then I am satisfied we shall remain free and independent.

I could not return to Ohio without expressing my affection for this great State, which gave me birth. I was born but a few miles from Akron, in Canton, the home town of President McKinley, the great Christian President. True to the teachings of my boyhood in Ohio, I want to be known as an American who loves his country and no other. These critical times call for a full measure of devotion so that liberty shall not die in the last great citadel of its protection. We can have sympathy with foreign nations, we can divide on questions of domestic and foreign policies, but all true Americans must feel in their hearts that America is first.

I shall return to Washington and tell the Members of Congress that there is no need to question where Ohio stands in this critical time. Men and women of Ohio, you who have furnished many of the Nation's great leaders and many of her immortal Presidents, I ask you to do everything within your power to preserve the Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence. I ask you to give of your time and effort to arm and defend the United States of America, not for aggressive foreign war but to uphold in shining glory before the suffering peoples of the world the living example of tolerance, peace, and charity in a great republic dedicated to liberty regulated by law. Valiant Members of Congress from both parties are fighting for your peace and prosperity, and I can assure you here tonight that the Congress of the United States shall never vote a declaration of war. We need your help so that this Nation shall live to complete the great tasks remaining before us, and that the vision of Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, Garfield, and McKinley shall not perish from the earth.

Papal Pronouncements and American Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS BY THE MOST REVEREND JOSEPH P. HURLEY

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Most Rev. Joseph P. Hurley, Bishop of St. Augustine, over the Columbia Broadcasting System network, July 6, 1941:

I have accepted the kind invitation of Columbia Broadcasting System to speak on the subject, Papal Pronouncements and American Foreign Policy, because I consider that an address on this topic might serve some useful purpose at the present time. People with short memories are apt to forget the heroic struggle of the Popes in our day for human liberty and for human dignity just because a few Catholic publicists in America have been giving expression to views which are comforting to the Axis Powers. Due to my past connection with the Papal Secretariate of State, I deem it well to say at the outset that this address is delivered without any mandate from the Holy See; that I use only documents of public record, and that I engage only my own authority.

Let me pass in brief review some recent pronouncements of the Popes touching the present world conflict and its antecedents. In his encyclical letter, Mit Brennender Sorge, addressed to Germany in 1937, Pope Pius, of blessed memory, stated that religious freedom in that country was beset on all sides; that Government officials were using their positions to induce Catholics to apostatize from the faith; that "intrigues had been laid bare which aim at nothing less than a war of extermination." Later, he referred to the hooked cross of national socialism, the swastika, as "the enemy of the Cross of Christ." On Christmas Eve, 1937 he declared textually: "We will call things by their real names. In Germany there is a real religious persecution. A persecution so terrible and so grave as has rarely been seen before. A persecution in which are lacking neither brutality nor violence nor the snares of falsehood and lies."

The war prepared by the Nazis in cold blood for over 6 years came closer and another Pope sat on the Throne of Peter. From the first hour of his Pontificate Pius XII sought to fling himself across the path of those who wanted war. On August 24, 1939, in an appeal for peace to the rulers of Europe, and their people, he said: "Nothing is lost by peace; but everything may be lost by war." Pronounced before the war broke out, and on the day following the Russo-German pact, this appeal was directed in the first instance to Germany; England and France were passionately desirous of peace and were leaving no stone unturned to preserve it. Indeed, then as now, the world knew who was the disturber of the peace. Their knowledge was to receive terrible confirmation a week later when Christian Poland was assaulted by the panzer legions of paganism. It is typical of the unscrupulous methods of American apologists for nazi-ism that this phrase of the Pope, uttered before the war began, is now being used by them to dissuade America from steps necessary to safeguard her national interests.

Pope Pius XII issued his first encyclical in October 1939. It condemned the makers of war; prayed that martyred Poland might have a resurrection in peace and justice; it laid severe strictures upon the German doctrine of race, the paganizing of youth and cynical infidelity to the plighted world. The reference to Germany was so unmistakable that only the most garbled accounts of the encyclical found their way into the controlled German press.

On Christmas Eve, 1939, in his annual allocution, Pius XII enunciated the following five points of a just and honorable peace: 1. The right to life and independence of all nations, great and small. The will of one nation to live must not mean the sentence of death passed upon another. 2. Cessation of the race for armaments. 3. A juridical institution to guarantee the fulfillment of treaties. 4. Respect for the rights of racial minorities. 5. Acceptance of the law of God, and of the spirit of justice and of universal charity as the basis of international relations.

On January 7, 1940, in his reply to President Roosevelt's letter announcing the mission of Mr. Myron Taylor, the Pope wrote: "This appointment is an exemplary act of fraternal and hearty solidarity between the New and the Old World in defense against the chilling breath of aggressive and deadly, godless and anti-Christian tendencies that threaten to dry up the fountainhead whence civilization has come and drawn its strength."

Spring came and the murderous hosts of Nazi Germany once again, contrary to solemn treaty, without provocation and without previous declaration of war, invaded Holland, Belgium, and Luxemburg. To King Leopold, of Belgium, heroic son of a hero father, went these words of a hero Pope: "When for the second time against their will and rights, the Belgian people see their territory exposed to the cruelties of war, profoundly moved. We send Your Majesty and all your beloved nation the assurance of our paternal affection. Praying Almighty God that this hard trial may result in the reestablishment of full liberty and the independence of Belgium. We accord with all our heart to Your Majesty and to your people our apostolic benediction." Similar telegrams were sent to the Queen of Holland and to the Grand Duchess of Luxemburg. When these messages were published in the Vatican newspaper, the Osservatore Romano, the paper was banned from circulation in Italy, and priests and laymen were beaten in the streets of Rome for reading or possessing it. It was one of the first attempts of the Axis to intimidate the Pope—and it failed as it was bound to fail. From that day to this, down to the preaching last Sunday of that beautiful, appealing homily of hope and encouragement, Pope Pius XII has not ceased to raise his voice against the evils of totalitarianism. He has condemned the wholesale murder of defectives and incurables in Germany; he has worked silently but effectively to alleviate the lot of war prisoners and of refugees; his radio station has continued to tell the world the awful truth about Poland.

This is a brief conspectus of the papal attitude toward the issue of this war. I shall leave it to you, my hearers, to judge if it gives any comfort to those who have loosed the flood of destruction and hatred upon the world; if it can, by any stretch of imagination, be construed as lending approval to those publicists who would deter us from defending our Christian civilization against the might of embattled paganism.

Let us turn now to the foreign policy of the United States Government.

I do not intend to imply that there is or has been any concerted action between our Government and the Holy See. As everybody knows, the Holy See is concerned primarily with the religious and with the supernatural, entering the field of secular affairs only where the primary interests of God and souls are involved. The Holy See and our Government have pursued independent policies, each in its own sphere. He who runs may read, nonetheless, a striking parallelism between their attitudes where moral questions were at issue.

Before the war American foreign policy was directed to the preservation of the peace, on the principle that "nothing is lost by peace; everything may be lost by war." We indulged in no falsely suave diplomacy of inaction and indifference; keenly alive to its duty as a great Christian power, our Government made intelligent, earnest, well-timed, and repeated endeavors to stave off war by finding a common ground upon which potential aggressor and potential victims could meet. After the war started, the same high-minded efforts were made to circumscribe it. I have already quoted the words in which Pope Pius XII bore public witness to the labors of President Roosevelt in favor of the peace. When the full story is known—and I venture to express the hope that our State Department may issue a white paper on the subject in the near future—we in America will have reason to feel proud of the role played by our Government, and to rest secure in the knowledge that no stone was left unturned, in parallel efforts with the Holy See, to safeguard the peace of the world.

It is history, of course, that we failed. We failed because one nation, confidently arrogant in its armored might, wanted war. This war is Germany's doing; it is a war of stark aggression; a war for European and world domination. And if you do not believe that the Nazi aims at our continent, then explain to me why his agents have spun their network all over Central and South America; why he has planted them here in this country by the thousands. It is therefore sheer ignorance mixed with folly to speak of this war, with a shrug of the shoulders, as if it were but another war of imperial conquest upon which Americans may look in philosophic indifference. Thank God, our Government never simulated a dishonoring neutrality which the American people did not and could not feel toward religious persecution and aggression. The war is rather an assault of one race against the world; in the words of a profound historian, the Hungarian Kolnai, it is a war against the west; it is a revolution of irreligion and paganism against the Christian ethic and the Christian civilization.

When we were compelled to face the realities of the war in Europe, which was also potentially a war against us and all the peoples of Christendom, we discussed and we agreed upon a national policy and upon a Government to enforce that policy. We did that last November when we chose a President and gave him the mandate to afford all possible aid short of war to the democracies. It now appears that there has developed a conflict between these two aims, aid to the democracies on the one hand and avoidance of war on the other. Indeed from the first, it was seen that we were taking sides in the war, and that it might be difficult to avoid being involved. We knew the risk and we took it. It was a superb policy, and statesmanlike genius presided at its conception. But as an enunciation of the American will in a war-torn world, it called for constant interpretation; it was of necessity subject to the condition which is implicit in all understandings rebus sic stantibus, that is to say, as long as matters remain as they are, and are not radically changed by contingency and vicissitude. If the conditions under which that policy was approved should change, then the policy must change; if those conditions change rapidly, then we must be prepared for a rapid change in the policy. What shall be our guide should such a necessity arise? I think it is abundantly clear to anyone who will give it a moment's reflection. Behind our dual policy, there stands a single, permanent, indefeasible principle—the will and the right of our Nation to live. The policy sprang from that principle, in the light of that principle it must be interpreted. Any conflict between the necessarily provisional terms of a policy must be resolved by the basic principle of national security. The question of peace or war in the last analysis is a question which can be decided only with reference to the safety of this Union.

Since then we are confronted with a conflict between aid to the Allies and avoidance of war, who shall decide? Certainly not the people, for they have neither the experience, nor access to the facts, nor in many cases the understanding which are required. Nor does the Constitution demand it. The form letters and the chain telegrams and the threatened demonstration on the White House lawn are, therefore, quite beside the point. I have an abiding faith in government by the people; but I do not believe that questions of national security, in an epoch of crisis, should be submitted directly to them. It would be a lumbering process involving fatal delay, and fatal leakage of plans to potential enemies. Nor is the record of democratic peoples in the pre-war period such as would inspire much confidence. In France the will of the nation to live was paralyzed by the interminable acrimonious debates in press and forum; by sabotage on the left; and confusion of counsels on the right. There were elements in France as there are here, which preferred civil war to a war against a foreign foe.

England: The case of the English people differed from that of the French in degree but not in kind. If they are today fighting for time, with their backs against the wall, it is to a great extent because ten millions of them who signed the round robin for peace almost at any price paralyzed the military preparations of the nation. And the boys at Oxford, not unlike some of our own university men, voted to fight only on their own terms. It is all well to say that they are now battling heroically for God and country. But it is opportune to recall that it was their stupidity which laid their island open to attack, and brought them to the brink of disaster. Let us admire the English people in their magnificent penance, but let us not emulate their sin and folly.

To the Congress, under the Constitution, belongs the weighty responsibility of declaring war. That is clear, but I am afraid that it is not a complete answer to the practical question. For it is manifestly impossible that the day-to-day decisions which must be taken often in the greatest secrecy should be submitted to the Congress for discussion. Such matters are lawfully the competence of the Executive. Furthermore in times of emergency the powers of the Executive are very properly enlarged by Congress. In the very nature of the case, therefore, and with the fullest legality, important decisions of far-reaching effect must be taken by the President both in his capacity as Chief Executive and in his capacity as Commander in Chief. To all practical intents, it is up to him to safeguard the interests of the Nation in times of great emergency. As the Commander in Chief of our armed forces and as the one charged with the conduct of foreign affairs, he must be ready to act fast and decisively should the need arise, and it is all to the good that he is equipped by the Constitution and by congressional enactment to do so.

In the present circumstances we must not lose sight of the fact that the declaration of war, the constitutional prerogative of the Congress, is no longer in style; the Nazi has seen to that. We must, too, face the fact that we have already left the political and diplomatic zone and have entered the zone of strategy. I believe this to be true not only of ourselves, but of almost every country in the world. Since the Nazi had from the first marked us as his enemy, it is well that we accept that fact, even though it has not yet pleased him to make war upon us. But his policy of limited objectives, that policy by which he betrayed and enslaved a continent, is fast approaching the point of showdown with us. It will be folly if we do not appraise our whole relationship with the Axis Powers from the standpoint of strategy. We may not, we must not, wait for the start of hostilities before we make our dispositions. Pre-war strategy is so all-important today that wars are won or lost before they enter the shooting phase. With the example of all the countries of Europe before us, let us pray for peace but prepare for war. Even though we hope to avoid war we must put this country, its economy, its finance, its very thinking, on a footing of preparedness for war in the shortest possible time. Any other course may be literally national suicide. Let me say immediately that I pray with all my soul that we shall never need to go to war; that our aid to our friends and our own military strength may be such as to bring about the discouragement and the defeat of the enemy of Christendom. It is not the business of a churchman to call for war. But neither may any churchman do anything other than encourage a government to protect by all prudent and necessary means its sacred national interests. A fortiori, when the interests of religion the world over are placed in jeopardy by a ruthless persecutor of the Church of Christ. The faith which I profess and love teaches that war is a legitimate, though extreme, instrument of a just national policy. From time to time we churchmen are obliged to quote the Scriptures to governments which would encroach upon our sphere—"Render unto God the things that are God's." I believe that our Government in this awful hour may with justice say to certain churchmen, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's."

My great fear is that we will not be permitted to have the choice between war and peace; that the Nazi will not let us have peace as he did not let the nations of Europe have peace. Many qualified observers think that our only choice is when we shall enter the war. In other words, that we shall sooner or later be forced into the war by the Nazi lust for world domination. That is why this country is honeycombed with Nazi operatives, both American and foreign; that is why Central and South America are covered by a network of Nazi agents. In this view, which has much to commend it, the questions which America has to answer are three: (1) Shall we enter the war now or later? (2) Shall we enter the war on our own terms or on terms dictated by Nazi strategy? (3) Shall we enter the war with allies or shall we bear the brunt of it alone?

If there is any merit to the foregoing considerations, born of experience and of study, it may be all boiled down to this: Since our problem is primarily a strategic one, it should be left to the Commander in Chief who alone, in constant, loyal communication with the Congress and in consultation with his military and naval advisers, is capable of bringing us safely through the dangers which encompass us.

Let me add a word about the latest development—the Russo-German war. On the subject of communism the Christian stand has been defined by Pius XI in his Encyclical on Atheistic Communism. On the subject of National Socialism it has been defined by the same pontiff in his Encyclical to Germany. I am convinced that these two documents give us the one safe guide to the ideological questions involved in this war, which has pitted Nazi against Communist. The Nazi and his sympathizers over here are trying to make out that it is a holy crusade against communism. Crusade forsooth: Not God, but the enemy of God, wills it; its standard is not the Cross, but the swastika which a great pontiff called the foe of the Cross of Christ; the rape of Poland is scarcely a recommendation for Christian knights; and the recluse of Berchtesgaden is badly cast for the role of Peter the Hermit. The bald facts of the "crusade" are these: On Sunday morning, June 22, the Nazis, in violation of a treaty, launched an unprovoked and undeclared war of aggression against the Communists, their former partners in crime. America's attitude toward this new war should not be swayed by Red or Nazi propaganda; it must be based on purely strategic considerations. In point of urgency the Nazi remains enemy No. 1 of America and of the world.

There is much talk these days of national unity. It is our imperative need. Unity of thought, unity of purpose, unity of action. May I add that we have, too, great need of the virtues of reverence and obedience. In a free people these things must come from an inner discipline based upon conscientious conviction. If we are to be united, there is only one center around which, as a Nation, we can rally. That center is Washington. If our union is to be real and effective, we must school ourselves to reverence and obey our lawful authorities, our President, in the first place, and our Congress. They personify the ideals and the will of this country. They have led us admirably in this crisis, not of their making. They are for peace—for peace as long as it is consistent with the highest interests of the Nation. In the anxious hours of deliberation and decision which they—especially our President—must pass they are deserving of our deepest sympathy, of the comfort of our prayers. Patriotic men, bent on the protection of our beloved land, I have confidence in them. I confess that I have no confidence in anyone who seeks in a time of crisis to undermine legitimate authority; who speaks disparagingly or distrustfully of our highest magistrates. I have no confidence in those who opposed the steps by which we achieved our present stage of defense; I have no confidence in those who reserve all their fault-finding for America and who praise the Nazi with faint condemnation. They may be good men, and some of them are, but be their station high or low, Americans, to whom they are giving bad example of division, should disregard their counsels.

Among them is a small but noisy group of Catholics. We have suffered long from their tantrums. We have blushed with shame when they acted up before company as tantrum children will do in every family. Years ago they established the crank school of economics: latterly they have founded the tirade school of journalism; they are now engaged in popularizing the ostrich school of strategy. The school may change its curriculum, but the same professors hold the chairs, for they are specialists in the universe of knowledge. Many Catholics are inclined to apologize for them; but I think that is unwise. They are embarrassing, but not significant, and quite harmless as long as their tantrums do not lead them to break the furniture. They will disappear in time like those other exhibitionists—the marathon dancers and the flagpole sitters—who amused America for a while and vanished.

The American people will be wise if they turn themselves as individuals to the task of moral rearmament. The years which lie ahead will probe us with relentless fingers to find and to exploit our moral weaknesses. A democracy, above all forms of government, must find its strength in the virtue of the people; its greatest danger is decadence from within. It is my most fervent prayer that we may set ourselves with a will to the task of sanctifying ourselves, our homes, and our public life to the end that in these days of trial and reckoning we may be and remain a Christian example among the nations, a people acceptable to Almighty God.

Sale of Alcoholic Liquors at Military Camps and Naval Establishments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

LETTER AND RESOLUTION BY THE LIQUOR AUTHORITY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and resolution:

STATE OF NEW YORK
LIQUOR AUTHORITY,
420 LEXINGTON AVENUE,
New York, July 1, 1941.

Hon. MARTIN J. KENNEDY,
1349 Lexington Avenue,
New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: On behalf of the members of the New York State Liquor Authority, I am enclosing a copy of a resolution expressing their views in connection with Senate bill 860.

Very truly yours,
HENRY E. BRUCKMAN,
Chairman.

Reslution adopted by New York State Liquor Authority relative to Senate bill 860

Whereas there has been introduced in the Senate of the United States, Seventy-seventh Congress, bill S. 860, in relation to the sale of alcoholic liquors to the members of the land and naval forces of the United States, and to provide for the suppression of vice in the vicinity of military camps and naval establishments; and

Whereas sections 1, 2, and 3 of this bill prohibit the sale or possession of alcoholic liquor, wine, or beer at or within or in the vicinity of any premises used for military or naval purposes; and

Whereas there are located in the State of New York premises used for military and naval purposes and other premises which are affected by such legislation; and

Whereas the alcoholic-beverage-control law of the State of New York declares as the policy of the State that it is necessary to regulate and control the manufacture, sale, and distribution within the State of alcoholic beverages for the purpose of fostering and promoting temperance in their consumption and respect for and obedience to law, and that the restrictions contained in the alcoholic-beverage-control law are enacted for the protection, health, welfare, and safety of the people of the State; and

Whereas the liquor authority has the power to issue or refuse to issue any license or permit to traffic in alcoholic beverages, and to revoke, cancel, or suspend for cause any license or permit issued by it; and

Whereas the liquor authority has stated that very careful consideration will be given to the issuance of a license to sell alcoholic beverages in the vicinity of a military training camp or reservation, that the type of establishment and applicant will be closely scrutinized, and the commanding officer of the camp will be consulted in each case as to the advisability of issuing a license; and

Whereas premises licensed to sell alcoholic beverages in the vicinity of military and naval reservations are receiving rigid supervision by the liquor authority and operate under a privilege of a license or permit, which can be revoked when a violation occurs:

Resolved, That the liquor authority of the State of New York is unalterably opposed to the enactment of S. 860, insofar as it relates to the sale or possession of alcoholic beverages, for the following reasons:

1. It will not foster and promote temperance in the consumption of alcoholic beverages and respect for and obedience to law.

2. There is no existing evil in the traffic in alcoholic beverages in the State of New York which this legislation seeks to correct.

3. The alcoholic beverage control law of the State of New York and the regulations of the liquor authority provide adequate and effective control over the sale of alcoholic beverages in the State of New York.

Efficiency at Fort Devens, Mass.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

LETTER FROM A CONSTITUENT

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter I received from Mr. Peter Redmond, 557 Palmer Road, Yonkers, N. Y., commending the commanding officer and his staff at Fort Devens, Mass., for their courtesy to him when his brother, a draftee assigned to Fort Devens, was suddenly stricken with a serious illness:

YONKERS, N. Y., June 26, 1941.

Hon. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: My brother, Pvt. John Redmond, Company K, Third Battalion, Sixteenth Infantry Regiment, First Division, stationed at Fort Devens, Mass., was stricken with spinal meningitis on Tuesday, June 17.

On Wednesday, June 18, my mother was notified of his illness and that midnight I took a train for the camp.

I arrived there at 8 a. m. on Thursday. Although I reported to the wrong hospital, the officers were quick to set me right, even to the extent of providing transportation to the other hospital.

I was greeted courteously, made comfortable by Lt. Col. Felch's office while I waited for him to return from the hospital and provided with a fine breakfast. Colonel Felch gave me all the information he had relative to my brother's ailment, including a report he got by telephone while I was with him concerning the spinal tap that had been made.

When I refused his kind and graciously extended offer to stay at the camp, he allowed me to see my brother before I returned to the town. He provided every precautionary measure, however, to eliminate any possible danger of infection.

I went back to the hospital on Friday and received the same considerate treatment from the colonel and his staff. Now that I have returned home, I have their promise of a weekly report on my brother's progress as well as immediate notification in case of emergency.

I know that people are quick to complain and criticize service camps and treatment; but when such people are as well treated as I was while I was there, and when they see how efficiently such a camp is run, I feel that they would be just as quick with words of praise and recommendation.

It is gratifying to a soldier's family to know that he is in such good hands, sick or well, and for that reason I am writing to ask you to see that credit is given where credit is certainly due—to the commanding officer and his staff.

Very truly yours,
PETER REDMOND.

M. Michael Edelstein

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. JAMES A. O'LEARY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. O'LEARY. Mr. Speaker, the Nation, the State, and the city of New York have lost a faithful public servant through the passing of M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN, who died in the glory of his mid career on the floor of this House, June 4, 1941.

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north-wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death!

But M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN was victorious over Death. Through death he passed to immortality while the House Chamber still resounded with the noblest American principles expressed by him in his final words.

I have never been more deeply impressed with evidence of the immortality of the soul than that manifested by the sudden calling of MICHAEL at the moment that his mission had been accomplished, according to Divine Providence.

If M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN had lived the allotted three score years and ten he could not have made a more glorious contribution to the American way of life.

We, however, his colleagues, have been deprived of an unselfish, loyal, and sympathetic friend; he shall remain in loving memory as one who has enriched our association and experience in this House.

The career of M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN was typically that provided in America as in no other place in the world. He was born in Poland in 1888 and came to this country when a small child. He resided in New York City where he attended our public schools, Cooper Union, and Brooklyn Law School. He was admitted to the practice of law in 1910. He had a lasting appreciation of the opportunities offered in America for advancement and therefore a burning desire to see that these privileges were perpetuated. He never forgot his origin, regardless of his material and official success, but maintained throughout his life a deep and sincere sympathy for the plain people of this country.

His family life was exemplary. His mother has lost a reverent son but will cherish the memory of his love and fidelity and the distinction that he brought to his family.

Production of Smokeless Powder

REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take 5 minutes of your time today to discuss a matter of crucial importance in the development of our national-defense program, and to call to the attention of the House of Representatives a shortage that threatens to disrupt and retard production of smokeless powder.

Unless this shortage is frankly recognized, the Nation may find itself without enough powder to furnish the ammunition for the planes and the tanks and the guns that are just beginning to roll off our assembly lines for the common defense. Unless this shortage is corrected, we may find ourselves engaged in a desperate struggle to maintain our rights, with our powder horns empty and our guns therefore silenced.

The shortage I refer to is fast developing in the supply of chemical linters, which is a necessary ingredient of smokeless powder. Linters are the source of nitrocellulose. I rise today to warn the House that next year we will run into an apparent annual linters shortage of about 200,000 tons. Original calculations indicated that the pinch would begin to be felt about the middle of the year—in the summer of 1942. But now it appears that it will come several months earlier. In fact, O. P. M. officials are informed that it may come as early as February of next year.

Aside from the immediacy of the shortage, let me give you a picture of its magnitude. The shortage is larger than the entire annual supply of purified chemical linters produced in the country today. The supply is only 176,000 tons per year, as against an impending shortage of 200,000 tons. In other words, to meet the growing requirements of our defense program it will be necessary to expand production of linters more than 100 percent in the span of less than a year. Within the last few months we have had to revise upward many previous estimates of defense requirements of vital materials. Our needs of aluminum, steel, power, and other commodities were badly underestimated—almost shockingly so. Yet in few critical items do we find a threatened shortage as large as in the case of chemical linters.

These figures are based on powder requirements under the national-defense program as presently set up. They do not take into account any future requirements under the defense program as it may be expanded. My estimate of a 200,000-ton shortage contemplates an Army of its present strength of 1,400,000 men, plus whatever the British may need in the way of lease-lend assistance. If the size of the Army should be increased to 3,000,000 men, as was reported in the press only the other day, then it is obvious that my appraisal of the linters situation no longer holds, and will have to be revised upward accordingly. And if additional billions are requested of Congress to supply this augmented military establishment, this will but serve to underscore the seriousness of a shortage that is serious enough already.

Chemical linters come from two sources—cotton and wood. In the manufacture of nitrocellulose and its subsequent conversion into smokeless powder, cotton is today the sole source. While the production of linters from wood is a thoroughly proven process, it has not been employed up to this time because the supply of linters from cotton has been adequate.

This material is ordinarily derived from the relatively short cotton hairs or fibers adhering to the seed after the cotton is ginned. These fibers, known as raw linters, are removed from the seed in two cuttings. The first yields the longer fibers, which go into surgical cotton, mattresses, felts, cotton batting and the like. The second yields the shorter fibers which alone are suitable, after refining, for the production of nitrocellulose and smokeless powder and other cellulose derivatives like cellulose acetate and viscose rayon.

I should like to digress here a moment to observe how the defense program has quickened our interest in certain industries and in certain critical items and materials for which a brisk demand has suddenly developed under the defense program. Why, we hardly knew some of them existed before. For instance, the machine-tool industry never loomed large in the mind of the average American until he awakened to its importance in making machinery to equip the factories to turn out planes, tanks, guns, ships, and all the thousand and one articles that go to equip a modern army. So it is with linters. Not even the cotton farmer was particularly conscious of them. Why should he be? He merely sells his cottonseed at the gin. From there they go to a few concentration points where the linters are removed before the seeds are crushed for cottonseed oil. Insofar as the cotton grower is concerned, he does not get more than a cent a pound for his seed. Since the linters make up only about one-tenth of the weight of the seed, he gets only a fraction of that cent for the linters. So you see, insofar as his individual income is affected, linters are a negligible byproduct from which he does not materially profit.

Aside from the economics of the situation, at this crucial juncture in the Nation's history, chemical linters loom larger and larger each day as our precious supply dwindles away. Regardless of price or profit, we simply will not have enough on hand. The accompanying table shows at a glance how the Nation's balance sheet of linters from cotton looks today:

Linters balance

[Tons raw liners annually]

Supply:
Total crop of all grades of linters (1,225,000 bales)	380,000
Chemical grades (comprising 52% of above)	235,000
Less purification loss (25% shrinkage)	58,750
Net supply of chemical linters	176,250
Demand:
2,000,000 pounds smokeless powder daily requires 750 tons linters daily or	262,500
Viscose rayon industry requires	45,000
Acetate industry requires	58,000
Other commercial uses require	10,000
Total demand	375,500
Less supply of chemical linters	176,250
Apparent shortage	199,250

In calling this serious situation to your attention, I should like to advise against any hasty conclusions as to how the shortage can be met. Someone may say: "Why, that's easy. All you have to do is to raise more cotton." It is not so simple as that, and let me tell you why. Let me point out first, that the size of the cotton crop would have to be doubled in order to meet the linters shortage. Linters constitute only 5½ percent of the total cotton crop and represent such a minor item, as compared with the value of the staple and the cottonseed oil, that it would not be economical to double the crop for that purpose alone.

Think for a moment what such a tremendous increase in the cotton crop would do to cotton prices. If it meant the return of 5-cent cotton, then obviously we could not ask the cotton farmer to make such a sacrifice. It would mean the end of all the carefully planned crop-control programs which the Department of Agriculture has launched successfully for the benefit of the grower. Such a course would not be advisable, especially when our chemists offer wood as an emergency source of supply.

In directing the attention of the Members of the House to this situation, I wish to say a few words for the benefit of those officials of the Government who are charged with discovering and correcting such shortages. A special responsibility rests upon them. We who sit in Congress are not technicians, in the main, and we have no way of knowing of the imminence of defense shortages except when called to our attention by those who are charged with planning and procuring for the common defense.

I measured my words when I made the statement, but it has been my observation that this responsibility has rested all too lightly upon the shoulders of a few of our technical officials within the last several months. I am not trying to fix any blame, nor single out any individual, groups of individuals, or agencies for criticism. But the fact remains that our needs of vital defense supplies have been woefully underestimated in some instances, and deficiencies have grown up, and, in some instances, have developed to a late stage before being discovered and remedied. We may be able to get away with these mistakes as long as we remain at peace. Then again, we may not.

This is not a warfare of minimum needs and we cannot afford to err on the minimum side. It is better to have too much than not enough. It is better to have too much than lack the stuff that modern war is made of. Hitler's armies today are proving again that the determining factor in battle is superiority in firing power. It seems obvious that you cannot talk about firing power without having the powder to fire. And you cannot make satisfactory smokeless powder without chemical linters.

When the impending shortage of linters was first brought to the attention of experts in the Office of Production Management it can be said to their credit that they immediately launched a study of the situation. I understand their studies are virtually complete, and their estimates of the shortage are greater than I have stated to the Members of the House today.

I only hope that the Army in the execution of its own responsibilities in guiding our defense preparations will be equally alert in meeting a potentially serious situation. As for myself, I wish to serve notice here and now that I shall not relent in my efforts to remedy the situation, until I can rest assured that our American boys will have everything it takes to defend themselves, their homeland and their rights, whenever and wherever it may be necessary.

Morris Sheppard

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. PAUL J. KILDAY

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, late a Senator from the State of Texas

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, in the death of the Honorable MORRIS SHEPPARD my State of Texas has lost an able representative in the Senate of the United States and has suffered an irreparable loss. As dean of the Congress and chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, he was a tower of strength in the very grave emergency which confronts this Nation now. As always, he devoted himself unsparingly to the arduous duties which were his because of his position. He was truly a casualty in the service of his Nation.

Senator SHEPPARD was a man of deep convictions. It mattered not to him that the position he took was unpopular or politically inexpedient. He looked only to the fact that his conscience told him that it was right. He espoused the most controversial of issues and continued his support whether his position was the popular one or not. Those who disagreed with him may not have been convinced and may not have changed their position, but they did respect the honesty and sincerity of his purpose.

Texas will long feel the loss it has sustained.

Upper Selective Service Age Limit Should Be Lowered

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, there is one part of this so-called May bill before us today of which I approve. Certainly I favor a change and a revision downward in the age limit for inducting men into the Army under our Selective Service Act. It has been suggested that the measure should not only be passed but be made retroactive. I may vote for such an amendment if and when it is offered. It is plainly evident that we have a sufficient number of younger men more suitable for training, and the sooner we pass some such measure the less will be the cost to those between 28 and 35 on account of the very uncertainty under which they are now living.

Let it be understood that those who have been inducted into the service for training—most of them without a murmur—are not the only young men who have been willing to pay the price of patriotic duty, but many others have paid a price with the same degree of patriotism. I know of young men between the ages of 28 and 35, wanted in private employment because they have graduated from highly technical training institutions, but who are not now considered for employment because they are within the draft age and might be called. Employers in many instances have hesitated to sign up for the coming year, those who might be inducted into the Army. That means that for the past few months some young men have not been inducted but have been unable to secure employment because of the possibility they might be taken. The passage of the proposed legislation will improve their situation by changing that uncertainty.

Sabotage in National-Defense Industries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I favor the passage of this bill as a reasonable measure for the curbing of sabotage in our national-defense industries. A democracy such as ours must prove itself capable of rising to the occasion when spies and saboteurs worm their way into the Nation's vital defense machinery. The only complaint I have with the bill is that it is too mild in its penalties. A spy found in the armed forces of the country should be dealt with far more drastically and summarily. And yet the production of defense weapons is just as important for the Nation's security as are the armed forces of the land. The Army and the Navy would be helpless without the instruments of defense. It follows that sabotage in the production of our arms is a direct attack upon our armed forces.

Every expert who has given his attention to the problem of sabotage is of the opinion that there are more saboteurs at work in the United States today than there were in 1917 and 1918. The Nazi and Communist dictators, far more than any warring nation in the first World War, employ the tactics of the Trojan Horse with all that is implied in the method. We must, therefore, deal effectively and promptly with the thousands of agents of Hitler and Stalin.

I am not unmindful of the fact that Stalin and Hitler are at war with each other today. This new conflict has not altered in the slightest the fact that communism is still just as great an enemy of American democracy as it was last week. In fact, the new situation creates a new peril for our institutions. That peril lies in the possibility that there may be a tendency to relax our vigilance against Communist saboteurs. The Communists will not hesitate to use the new situation as a means of entrenching themselves more securely than ever before in government and in labor unions. They will now begin to shout that they are full-fledged patriots of unquestionable loyalty to the United States. The truth is that their course today, just as their course yesterday, is dictated by the interests of their red boss Stalin. It has nothing to do with loyalty to the United States. It will be as false and hypocritical as their pretensions in the days of the People's Front when they penetrated unhindered into government and labor unions. We must, therefore, redouble our vigilance rather than relax it against Stalin's agents. The passage of this bill will serve notice on agents of Hitler and Stalin alike that the Congress of the United States intends to perform its duty with respect to the safety of this country.

Despite the fact that the Communists will not now be engaged in wholesale typing-up of our defense industries on the pretext of organizing for better working conditions, they will be just as active, or even more so, in building their cells in all of our industries. Those Communist cells used one day for one purpose will be ready to serve an opposite purpose tomorrow. The war between Stalin and Hitler will not last forever. But while it lasts and after it is over, Communists are first, last, and always the enemies of this country. This bill will serve as a necessary protective measure when the Communists have done another of their awkward somersaults.

Furthermore, the menace now arising from the agents of Hitler is increased. The Nazis in our defense industries must go it alone for a time. They will not now be able to count on the collaboration which they have recently had from Stalin's saboteurs. I say to this House that Nazi agents are spotted throughout our national-defense industries. The Dies committee has the names of several thousand Nazis and Nazi sympathizers who are employed in our defense plants. They should, of course, be immediately weeded out. Likewise, we should weed out all Communists from from our Government agencies and from our labor unions, for the failure to clean house of Communists, Nazis, and Fascists, subjects our whole defense program to the wrath of sabotage. And lastly, we should not find it necessary to wait for the commission of an overt act of sabotage before we get these disloyal foreign agents out of places where they can work their damage.

I favor the passage of this bill because it is an important piece of legislation to have permanently on our statute books. It is not needed solely as a piece of emergency legislation. Its passage will signalize the fact that one great democracy at least is at last coming to its senses.

Reciprocal Trade Agreements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 3, 1941

STATEMENT BY HON. WILLIAM S. CULBERTSON BEFORE COMMITTEE FOR RECIPROCITY INFORMATION

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by the Honorable William S. Culbertson, former Ambassador to Chile, before the Committee for Reciprocity Information in connection with negotiations for trade agreements with Argentina and Uruguay. The statement was made at a hearing held in Washington, D. C., on June 24, 1941.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, I appear in behalf of the Argentina Meat Producers Corporation, for which I have also filed a brief. This corporation is not Government subsidized or Government controlled or owned. It receives no help from the Government at all. It is organized under a general law of Argentina providing for cooperation in this field, and the cattle growers of Argentina are required to participate to a certain extent under that law in the organization and activities of the corporation.

The corporation has offices in the United States for the importing and the distributing of its products, principally byproducts, and its office is located at 9 Rockefeller Plaza.

Mr. Chairman, may I make one or two preliminary observations before I summarize some of the points which I have made in my briefs. I have no intention of detaining you with a restatement of what I have endeavored to present in writing.

In these tariff discussions, with which I have a little experience over the years, it is quite common to abuse and cast aspersions on the foreigner. The years that I have had the pleasure of sitting on this bench, I used to listen to those aspersions, and criticisms, and implications, which were usually not very flattering. I suppose you have learned as I soon learned in my experience not to give them too much weight. They are sort of stock-in-trade of arguments which are presented by certain producing groups in the United States.

There is one point that has been made from time to time in these hearings yesterday and today to which I think I should refer. Reference has been made to the so-called peon labor of Argentina. It might be sarcastic to say that that reference does not reveal any great knowledge of the facts, and incidentally does not reveal very much good manners, internationally speaking, as the Argentine nation is a great nation with which I have had a little personal experience, and I know its people, and I understand the standard of living which prevails there.

The phrase "peon labor" implies starvation wages, and implies a sort of serf condition in which people live. I venture to say that the cowboy—the "gaucho" on the plains of Argentina—comes and goes in those histancias through as high a standard of living from the standpoint of real wages and the things that he gets that keep his body and soul together and give him the pleasures of life as any of those who herd sheep and herd the cattle of our western plains.

I have lived in our own West, and I have seen the standard of living there, and I have also seen it in Argentina, and I think that the phrase "peon labor" does not properly apply.

The second observation that I would like to make is in response to Mr. Arner's question this morning with reference to corned beef. I really did not intend to say anything about that subject today because it has been discussed and rediscussed to a point where one would think that the fundamentals of it were understood by everybody, and I am sure they are understood by you gentlemen upon the bench. But we have heard a great deal of what might be called the economics of corned beef. Those economics have been discussed in Congress and by representatives of the livestock industry on former occasions. I remember not very long ago the Washington Post undertook to review some of those arguments in an editorial, and concluded its observation with reference to those arguments—"the economics of corned beef"—by saying that it seemed to be a case of "corned beef between the ears."

The question was asked this morning, "Who is it that wants this canned beef?" The answer, of course, is that it is the millions of people in the United States on a relatively low standard of living who cannot afford to buy at the present prices the steaks and the roast beefs that are available in our markets; and the great advantage of proposing, as the committee has done, to include canned meats in the program of the negotiation with Argentina is that the duties of that product and similar byproducts can be reduced without injuring in the slightest degree the cattle-growing industry of the United States.

Since 1921 the duty on canned corned beef has been increased three times in the hope that the American source of supply might be increased, but every time the result has been negative. There is today, as was stated this morning by one of the representatives of the industry, no commercially produced corned beef in the United States today. It was found that the cost of preserving the meat—because that is what it is—was much easier, much cheaper, much less expensive to preserve it in casings in the form of sausages and hot dogs than it was to preserve it in cans, and thus the sausage and the hot-dog manufacturer, who was able to pay more for the trimmings and the cuttings of our cattle industry, is really the source from which the corned-beef manufacturer has found his trouble.

The solution, of course, was to produce corned beef in South America, where there was abundance of canner cattle to be used entirely for canning purposes, in addition to an abundance of trimmings which were available from the export meats which they sent out in fresh form. So that the real villian who killed the canned corned-beef business in the United States was not the cheap Argentine cattle but the American hot dog.

Now, directly responsive to Mr. Arner's question this morning, I want to give you some very recent figures with reference to costs, or at least figures which reflect the cost of production. There have been a number of controversies over this subject before the committees of Congress, particularly in connection with the purchase of corned beef by the Navy. You will recall that only a year or so ago Admiral Leahy, before the House of Representatives committee, was asked why the Navy purchased Argentine corned beef, and he answered that the award was made to the Argentine product both because of the difference in price and the better quality of the product.

Directly on the question of cost—and, Mr. Arner, this is in response directly to your question—the Army bids for 6,000,000 pounds of corned beef were asked for yesterday in Chicago. They were asked for on June 23, 1941. And please note these figures.

The lowest South American bid was 15.92 cents. If you will add to that the 6 cents a pound duty, you have a total of 21.92. The lowest domestic bid was 34.50 cents. In other words, taking the domestic bid and subtracting from it the lowest South American bid, you have a difference of cost of production or a difference in cost of 18.58 cents.

Now, I used to have friends in the protectionist field who argued that if a 50-percent duty was good a 100-percent duty was twice as good. And I suppose that it might be argued here that if a 6-cent duty is good an 18-cent duty is three times as good. But the experience in the past has been that to increase the tariff duty does not restore or bring back the corned-beef industry for the reasons of fundamental economics which exist in the industry itself.

Those facts, of course, have been recognized by Secretary WALLACE, now the Vice President of the United States. Speaking before the Senate Finance Committee a year or two ago, he said:

"Before the World War a considerable amount of beef was canned in the United States from so-called canner cows and low-grade beef; and since that time there has been very little canning of beef in this country, mainly for the reason that a more profitable outlet for the low-grade beef has been found in sausage.

"It is not likely that the exclusion of the relatively small amount of imported canned beef would have any appreciable effect on the domestic price of sausage or of any other meat products. Consequently, if canned beef imported were excluded the result probably would be that there would be no canned beef consumed in the United States."

Perhaps one of the results would be, as suggested by one of the speakers, that we would eat canned pork instead of canned beef. Well, that is one of those interesting arguments for substitutes in the field of the tariff which suggests that we ought to have a duty on bananas because if a man doesn't eat a banana, why, he may eat an apple.

May I now say a word about the fundamental question of our trade relations with the Argentine Republic. Before the early thirties, or in the early thirties at least, there was no strict necessity for the United States, in order to maintain its export sales in Argentina, to maintain its imports from that country. Those of you who are familiar, as you gentlemen on the bench are, with the fundamental principles of trade know that the triangular trade which was developed at that time permitted us to send a great many more products to Argentina than we took from them, and our exporters received not dollars in return but pounds or francs or other counters in the international exchange, which gave them value in international trade; so that the normal trade between Argentina and the United States in that period was conducted on the basis of a large excess of imports from the United States into Argentina over the exports of Argentina to the United States.

Now, beginning in 1930, the great change began to take place. The canalization of trade began to come upon the world, and it was necessary for Argentina, being in a somewhat weak position economically, to yield to that tendency of bilateralism which was forced gradually upon her by European economics. So she made an agreement with Germany; she made an agreement with Great Britain, and with other countries, forced upon her by the exchange situation.

Now, the effect of that was to pull our export trade down to the level of our import trade with the Argentine, and we lost a great deal in the international field, and we lost nationally in that sense.

Now, the European war has intensified the already stringent exchange situation prevailing in Argentina and United States trade, but while on the one hand the war has made Argentina more heavily dependent upon the United States for products, it has cut down the exchange wherewith she can pay for her products which she must receive from us. Now, of course, if the policy of the United States is economic isolationism, why that sort of argument has no bearing, but you know I could not help but think as I listened to the arguments that were presented here, that if the cattle-growing industry of the United States wants to get rid of this competition from the Argentine, they should be an enthusiastic supporter of Mr. Hull's trade-agreement program which will tend to restore the triangular trade and thereby relieve this pressure which requires us, as the Pan American Union has said in one of its reports, to buy an increasing amount of products from the Argentine; but if the policy of the Government is as proclaimed in the preamble of the Trade Agreements Act, if it is to increase our normal and natural development of foreign market, then in view of the strenuous opposition which comes from producer interests in the United States whenever any one of their products is mentioned—in view of that, it becomes relevant to select products for importation into the United States which will produce the maximum of benefit with the minimum of injury.

Now, those are products, gentlemen, that I have discussed in the brief which I have submitted. They include the items on the list—prepared and preserved meat, hides and skins, tallow, animal food, meat extract, and certain of the others.

Now, the United States will never, never be self-sufficient in these byproducts of the cattle industry. All livestock producers regulate their production according to the demand for their product and not according to the demand for their byproducts, which has little effect upon production. That is in response to another of the questions that Mr. Arner asked.

Cattle, for instance, are produced according to the demand for beef, and not according to the demand for hides. I mean, if the arguments were relevant which have been made with reference to hides today—if they were relevant at all we would have to have a breed of cattle that shed its skin once a year, and thereby we could make a specialty of producing hides according to the demand of the industry. The principle should be carried further and applied to the different cuts of beef. If the American public should suddenly acquire, let us say, a fad for eating tongue at every meal, it is obvious that the meat producers of the United States could not supply the demand, since they cannot afford to grow steers merely for the production of their tongues. They can produce a greater number of carcasses, but they cannot change the proportion of cuts within those carcasses themselves. And the thing that really determines the income of the industry is the rounds and the ribs and the loins which are produced in the industry, and not the plates and the navels and the trimmings that come along and produce these byproducts. And so it was in former time that those byproducts were used for canned beef, and then they came, as I said, to be used primarily for hot dogs and for sausages.

Something was said this morning about oleo oil and fat. I shall not undertake before a board that knows much more about it than I do to discuss all the intricacies of animal and vegetable oils and fats, but there is a rather interesting point that can be quickly made with reference to these two products, because they illustrate how the tariff can hurt the same industry that it is trying to benefit.

This excise tax which was placed on these products is so high that it has destroyed all the natural relationships between oils in the international markets. Now, one of the very serious consequences—and this is only an illustration, because it can be paralleled with other cases—one of the serious consequences of this excise tax has been to make all the oils of the world much cheaper than American lard. Whale oil, for example, and other oils, shut out from our markets, have flowed into the international market, and by scientific processes some of them have been made more edible than they were before, and they have cut down the price. They have undersold American lard, and the United States has been losing the lard market, which was a very great and important source of income to the American farmer a generation ago.

The producers of oils and fats in the United States cannot have their cake and eat it too, and this is a very good example of that, and so that, just to recall to you some of the figures about the lard situation which has been created by this maladjustment in the question of animal and vegetable oils, of the Federal-inspected production in the United States in 1929, 47 percent was exported, and for a number of years all through there, almost a half of our lard went abroad. That has been followed in 1935, which was 15 percent; 1936, 11 percent; 1937, 18 percent; 1930, 22 percent; and 1940, 13 percent.

* * * * *

But I want to conclude simply by saying this, that while I have tried to amplify particularly in my brief the broad national significance of dealing with these relatively unimportant products in a favorable way with Argentina because of the broad national significance and the international problems which are involved, I believe that a general trade agreement satisfactory to Argentina can be concluded not only without detriment to American agriculture but with benefit to our producers of agricultural products, and the benefits are two—directly, from the expansion of our export trade to Argentina in those products; and there are products of that kind that go there from our agricultural community; and, indirectly—and this is very important—indirectly, through the consequent increase of the domestic demand for such products, that is, the products of our livestock industry, through the consequent increase of domestic demand for those products as a result of the greater employment and higher purchasing power in the centers where commodities are produced for export—the defense plants, the men who are working there, for their products; or, if the products of our manufacturing centers are flowing abroad we are getting a dollar exchange. Those men, those populations will have more with which to buy steaks and roast beef, which is the real basis for the standard of living of our farming community.

Constitutional Powers of the President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ADDRESS BY EDWARD H. FOLEY, JR.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, a few days ago I asked and obtained leave to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered before the New York Bar Association at Saranac in New York on June 27, 1941, by Edward H. Foley, Jr., General Counsel for the Treasury Department, on the subject Some Aspects of the Constitutional Powers of the President. I have since been advised that the address referred to exceeds by one-third of a page the limit provided by the rule of the Joint Committee on Printing. The estimate of the Government Printing Office indicates that the publication will cost $105. I now renew the request that the address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

One month ago today the President of the United States declared the existence of an unlimited national emergency. Since this proclamation vague fears have been expressed that the steps taken during the emergency will be at the expense of our system of popular government.

The expression of these fears comes from two sources: First, there are those who oppose the policies of the President. They cry "dictatorship" whenever he takes vigorous action. Obviously, so long as they disagree with the administration they will not yield to persuasion.

Second, there are those who, in good faith, declare their fear of future consequences to our democracy simply because they misunderstand the nature and scope of the Executive power. It is to this group that I am speaking.

My purpose today is to describe some aspects of the President's constitutional warrant for extraordinary action—action which is called extraordinary only because the circumstances which require the action are themselves extraordinary.

The framers of the Constitution were well aware of the need for concentrating powerful authority in a single executive. With a foresight which seems at times to have amounted almost to clairvoyance, they provided us with a strong and unified Executive with sufficient powers to preserve, protect, and defend the Union.

The Delegates to the Constitutional Convention represented an unusual array of talent and legal ability. Among them were two who were to be President and one who was to be Vice President, five who were to become judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and also such legal giants as Alexander Hamilton, the first Secretary of the Treasury, and Edmund Randolph, first Attorney General of the United States, and Luther Martin. These Delegates were just emerging from a bitter experience with weak executive authority under the Articles of Confederation. They had also seen the serious effects of usurpation of executive power by some State legislatures.

I shall consider only those powers of the President which spring full blown from the Constitution without statutory implementation. Furthermore, I shall limit my discussion to some aspects of (a) his powers as Commander in Chief, (b) his powers to control foreign affairs, and (c) his powers as President to protect the Union.

I. POWERS AS COMMANDER IN CHIEF

The Constitution designates the President as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the service of the United States. The various powers included in this grant are not stated in detail in the Constitution.

When the Constitution was being drafted and ratified the only objection made to this power seems to have been that it permitted the President to command in person.

This objection, however, made little headway. And today if President Roosevelt wished to command the north Atlantic patrol from the bridge of the Augusta, he could point to the precedent established by President Washington who left the Executive offices at Philadelphia and rode with his troops for a month during the Pennsylvania Insurrection.

When the Constitution was adopted, the power of commander in chief over the armed forces of a State was frequently vested in the Governor of the State. Hamilton commented in The Federalist on what the framers of the Constitution contemplated when they inserted this power. He said:

"The propriety of this provision is so evident in itself, and it is, at the same time, so consonant to the precedents of the State constitutions in general, that little need be said to explain or enforce it. Even those of them which have, in other respects, coupled the Chief Magistrate with a council, have for the most part concentrated the military authority in him alone. Of all the cares or concerns of government, the direction of war most peculiarly demands those qualities which distinguish the exercise of power by a single hand. The direction of war implies the direction of the common strength, and the power of directing and employing the common strength, forms a usual and essential part in the definition of the Executive authority."

"The direction of the common strength"—that is an important concept. It proves that, even in the eighteenth century, statesmen realized, first, that the waging of war not only involves the sending of armies into battle but also calls for the strength of the whole Nation, and, second, that it is of paramount importance that the powers of directing the common strength in the common defense be concentrated in the Chief Executive of the Nation.

Our war Presidents have never hesitated to use their powers as Commander in Chief for purposes other than for directing the movements of our military and naval forces.

During the Civil War, for example, Postmaster General Blair, at the direction of the President, closed the mails to matter that might instigate others to cooperate with the Confederate States. He specifically refused transmission through the mails to certain newspapers which publicly advocated that the Federal Government accede to the demands of the Confederacy.

The House of Representatives' Committee on the Judiciary investigated this activity by Blair and determined not only that he had authority to act as he did but that it was his duty to do so.

Again, during the first World War, President Wilson created the Committee on Public Information under his authority as Commander in Chief. Without any statutory authority he exercised a censorship over cables, telephones, and telegraph lines.

The powers of the President as Commander in Chief are not contingent upon a declaration of war by the Congress. Furthermore, as the late Chief Justice Taft pointed out, Congress "cannot provide an Army of which the President must be Commander in Chief, and then in the law of its creation limit him in the use of the Army to enforce any of the laws of the United States in accordance with his constitutional duty."

Instances where this power has been exercised are well known. For example, in 1854 during political upheavals in Nicaragua, the President and the Secretary of the Navy ordered an American warship to proceed to Greytown to defend the lives and property of American citizens.

Subsequently, in a lawsuit growing out of this incident, Mr. Justice Nelson, of the Supreme Court of the United States, sitting in circuit, declared:

"Now, as it respects the interposition of the Executive abroad, for the protection of the lives or property of the citizen, the duty must, of necessity, rest in the discretion of the President. Acts of lawless violence, or of threatened violence to the citizen or his property, cannot be anticipated and provided for; and the protection, to be effectual or of any avail, may, not unfrequently, require the most prompt and decided action. Under our system of government the citizen abroad is as much entitled to protection as the citizen at home. The great object and duty of government is the protection of the lives, liberty, and property of the people composing it, whether abroad or at home; and any government failing in the accomplishment of the object, or the performance of the duty, is not worth preserving."

The Santo Domingo expedition during Grant's administration, the use of Federal troops in the Pullman strike under Cleveland, the American expedition to China during the Boxer uprising, the bombardment of Veracruz in Wilson's time, the numerous landings of marines in Latin America in more recent years—all these indicate the broad limits of the President's discretionary power to use the armed forces of the United States.

In this day when there is so much discussion over convoys, I wonder if it is generally realized that without any authority from the Congress, and in time of peace, President Buchanan, who usually took a narrow view of the powers of his office, nevertheless ordered a naval force to Cuba "to protect all vessels of the United States on the high seas from search or detention by the vessels of war of any other nation."

As you all know, the most recent example of the use of this impressive power of the President is the Executive order in which President Roosevelt directed Secretary of War Stimson to take over and operate the North American Aviation Co. plant and produce the aircraft called for by its contracts with the United States.

Not far from here, on a hillside near the village of Lake Placid, John Brown is buried. His grave reminds us of the fight to free the slaves. It is well to remember that Abraham Lincoln justified his Emancipation Proclamation liberating slaves in the States in rebellion on the ground it was within his authority as Commander in Chief. When he was attacked for usurping a power he did not possess, Lincoln replied:

"You say it is unconstitutional. I think differently. I think the Constitution invests its Commander in Chief with the law of war in time of war. The most that can be said, if so much, is that slaves are property. Is there, has there ever been any question that by the law of war, property both of enemies and friends, may be taken when needed? And is it not needed whenever taking it helps us or hurts the enemy?"

A President possessed of determination to preserve democratic processes must employ all his powers with the boldness of a war executive in a period of national danger and unlimited emergency.

II. POWERS TO CONTROL FOREIGN AFFAIRS

The President's powers as Commander in Chief are, however, no more impressive than his powers to control foreign affairs.

In 1800 John Marshall, who was then a Member of the House of Representatives, said:

"The President is the sole organ of the Nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations."

The Constitution vests in the President the appointment of ambassadors, ministers, and consuls by and with the consent of the Senate. However, since Washington's time the President has designated special or private agents to carry on diplomatic functions without consulting the Senate. Thus, Washington employed Gouverneur Morris to confer with the British Government concerning its further performance of its obligations under the treaty of peace, and Andrew Jackson sent a special commission to Turkey. The activities of Colonel House on behalf of President Wilson and of Norman Davis on behalf of President Roosevelt are matters of common knowledge.

Although the Constitution also vests in the President power to make treaties, with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate, he alone negotiates them.

The Constitution is silent on the President's power to make international agreements, other than treaties, without the consent of the Senate. It does, however, distinguish between treaties and agreements. It prohibits the States from making any treaty with foreign governments, although it authorizes the States to make agreements with foreign governments with the consent of the Congress.

It is frequently difficult to distinguish in nature or importance between a treaty and an Executive agreement. But the power to enter into important international engagements without the consent of the Senate has been asserted by several Presidents and is now well established.

This power to make Executive agreements arises not only from the President's control over foreign affairs, but also from his military powers, and those great residual powers which inhere in the President as the Chief Executive of the Nation.

The Rush-Bagot Convention between the United States and Great Britain, which limited the naval armaments of both countries on the Great Lakes, was entered into by the mere exchange of notes in 1817 and was not submitted as a formal treaty to the Senate until a year later.

Similarly, between 1882 and 1896, Executive agreements were entered into whereby the United States and Mexico undertook to permit the regular troops of each country to cross the boundary line of the other when in pursuit of Indians.

The important Executive agreement providing for the open door in China and the Lansing-Ishii Agreement, recognizing special interests by Japan in China, were neither previously authorized by the Congress nor subsequently submitted to the Senate for ratification.

The so-called gentlemen's agreement relating to Japanese immigration into the United States provided a friendly and satisfactory solution of a most vexatious problem without formal action by the Senate or the Congress. In fact, it is now generally agreed that this happy solution was vitiated by the action of the Congress in passing the Japanese Exclusion Act.

Even the substance of an unratified treaty may be included in an Executive agreement and the agreement performed, regardless of ratification by the Senate. Thus, after the bloody disturbances in 1905 throughout the Dominican Republic, Theodore Roosevelt proposed that the United States should collect Dominican customs and allocate part of the receipts for payment of Dominican debts and the rest for the Dominican expenses. He submitted a treaty embodying this proposal to the Senate, but after a long debate the Senate adjourned without ratifying it.

The President then included the terms of the treaty in an Executive agreement, and for 28 months the program continued in operation under that agreement. Later this precedent was followed in Executive agreements with other Latin American countries and in Liberia.

A few years ago the Litvinoff Agreement, by which the Soviet Government assigned to the United States all its claims against American nationals was held by the Supreme Court of the United States to be fully warranted under the Constitution.

The recent acquisition by President Roosevelt of naval and air bases in the Western Hemisphere in exchange for 50 destroyers could be justified not only on the basis of power delegated to the President by statute, but also on the basis of his constitutional powers, either as Commander in Chief, or as the official charged with the control of foreign relations.

In fact, Attorney General Jackson in his opinion advising the President that the acquisition was authorized, rested its validity partly on the President's power over foreign relations and cited as authoritative the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Curtiss-Wright case. In that case Mr. Justice Sutherland said:

"It is important to bear in mind that we are here dealing not alone with an authority vested in the President by an exertion of legislative power but with such an authority plus the very delicate, plenary, and exclusive power of the President as the sole organ of the Federal Government in the field of international relations—a power which does not require as a basis for its exercise an act of Congress, but which, of course, like every other governmental power, must be exercised in subordination to the applicable provisions of the Constitution."

It is important in this connection to emphasize again what Justice Sutherland asserted earlier in this opinion, namely, that although the Federal Government has only enumerated powers in respect of domestic affairs, its powers of external sovereignty do not depend upon the affirmative grants of the Constitution. The powers of the Federal Government over foreign relations which are not otherwise defined or allocated in the Constitution are for the President to exercise.

Certainly, the Congress, the limits of whose authority are set forth in the Constitution, is not the proper body to exercise such powers. "The transaction of business with foreign nations," said Jefferson, "is Executive altogether."

This residual power over foreign relations vested in the President is closely related to his residual power to protect and preserve the Union.

III. RESIDUAL POWERS TO PROTECT THE UNION

Speaking before the American Bar Association at Saratoga Springs in the summer of 1917, Charles Evans Hughes pointed out that "the framers of the Constitution did not contrive an imposing spectacle of impotency. * * * Self-preservation is the first law of national life and the Constitution itself provides the necessary powers in order to defend and preserve the United States."

It is true that at the time of the drafting of the Constitution many persons were fearful of a strong Executive. This attitude grew mainly from the fear that such an establishment might develop into monarchy.

Notwithstanding this fear that the Presidential chair might be converted into a kingly throne, the framers recognized that a republic cannot long exist without great powers in a Chief Executive.

The idea that a vigorous Executive is inconsistent with the genius of representative government was emphatically repudiated by Hamilton. Urging the necessity of conferring adequate power upon the President, Hamilton wrote in the Federalist:

"Energy in the Executive is a leading character in the definition of good government. It is essential to the protection of the community against foreign attacks; it is not less essential to the steady administration of the laws; to the protection of property against those irregular and high-handed combinations which sometimes interrupt the ordinary course of justice; to the security of liberty against the enterprises and assaults of ambition, of faction, and of anarchy. * * *

"A feeble Executive implies feeble execution of the Government. A feeble execution is but another phrase for a bad execution; and a government ill-executed, whatever it may be in theory, must be, in practice, a bad government."

The power which has been delegated to the Federal Government is exercised through the three great coordinate branches—the President, the Congress, and the courts. Legislative powers are vested in the Congress by the first section of article I of the Constitution, and it is noteworthy that it has no powers other than those enumerated in that article. The exact language is: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress."

Similarly, article III of the Constitution carefully limits the grant of power to the Federal judiciary.

When, however, we turn to the grant of power to the Executive under article II of the Constitution we find that there is no similar restriction on the executive power vested in the President.

The exact language of the Constitution is: "The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."

Hence it is manifest that so much of the power of the United States not enumerated in the grant to the Congress or not included in the defined extent of the judicial power is vested in the President. In other words, the President is the repository of the residual Federal power.

This doctrine is not new. In the first of his Pacificus Papers, which appeared on June 29, 1793, Hamilton defended the right of the President to issue a neutrality proclamation with respect to the war between France and England. It may seem surprising in some quarters that the issuance of this first neutrality proclamation brought down on the head of George Washington untold abuse and bitter charges of usurpation and dictatorship.

Hamilton, however, found power to issue the proclamation in the President's residual authority. The right to remain neutral, being a recognized attribute of Federal sovereignty, there remained only the question: What branch of the Government should make the proclamation? It was obvious that such action did not fall within the province of the judiciary. Nor did the powers of Congress as enumerated in the Constitution cover the situation.

"A correct mind," said Hamilton, "will discern at once that it can belong neither to the legislative nor judicial department, and therefore, of course, must belong to the Executive."

This residual power is particularly important in times when the safety of the whole Nation is threatened.

Chief Justice Marshall recognized the existence of the power of national self-preservation in the early case of Cohens v. Virginia, and the Supreme Court later reiterated this position in the Second Legal Tender cases.

The very form of oath set forth in the Constitution under which the President swears that he will to the best of his ability preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States supports this view. The Constitution did not contemplate imposing on the President a duty and simultaneously withholding from him the means and the powers with which to perform that duty.

Our great Presidents have never hesitated to do whatever was necessary for the preservation of the Union. Abraham Lincoln, on taking office, was suddenly confronted with a rebellion that threatened to disrupt the whole Union. Congress was not in session. Immediate action was necessary.

Abraham Lincoln took that action. By Executive order of April 25, 1861, the President directed that, if the Maryland Legislature should take action to arm the people of that State against the United States, prompt and efficient steps to counteract such action would be taken, even to the bombardment of Maryland cities.

By proclamation of May 3, 1861, President Lincoln increased the Regular Army by adding 22,714 officers and men. He increased the Navy by directing the enlistment of 18,000 men.

He ordered $2,000,000 to be advanced out of the Treasury, without security, and paid to persons whom Congress had not authorized to receive it.

And he suspended the writ of habeas corpus. When what Lincoln had done was attacked as unauthorized, he made his classic reply:

"Are all the laws but one to go unexecuted, and the Government itself to go to pieces lest that one be violated? Even in such a case, would not the official oath be broken if the Government should be overthrown when it was believed that disregarding the single law would tend to preserve it?"

Lincoln, like the framers of the Constitution, was well aware of the dangers inherent in a weak Executive. The framers did not want to see the history of State governments during the critical years repeat itself in the new Federal Government. Governors had been reduced to legislative puppets; judges had been made dependent upon legislators for their subsistence in office; and civil rights, such as trial by jury, had been extensively violated.

"One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one," wrote Madison, gravely disturbed by developments. That great believer in democratic rule by the people spoke the thoughts of the framers when he wrote in The Federalist:

"In a government where numerous and extensive prerogatives are placed in the hands of a hereditary monarch, the Executive department is very justly regarded as the source of danger, and watched with all the jealousy which a zeal for liberty ought to inspire.

In a democracy, where a multitude of people exercise in person the legislative functions, and are continually exposed, by their incapacity for regular deliberation and concerted measures, to the ambitious intrigues of their executive magistrates, tyranny may well be apprehended on some favorable emergency, to start up in the same quarter. But in a representative republic, where the executive magistracy is carefully limited, both in the extent and the duration of its power; and where the legislative power is exercised by an assembly, which is inspired, by a supposed influence over the people, with an intrepid confidence in its own strength; which is sufficiently numerous to feel all the passions which actuate a multitude, yet not so numerous as to be incapable of pursuing the objects of its passions, by means which reason prescribes, it is against the enterprising ambition of this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy and exhaust all their precautions."

In countries like France the subjection of the executive to a legislature torn by faction and given to intrigue and petty political bickering made a mockery of democratic government. A government which cannot govern, which even in normal times cannot cope with the complex problems of modern industrial society, is a push-over for dictators in time of crisis.

It was not because the executive was too strong in Germany, Italy, France, and Spain that these countries succumbed to dictatorship.

On the contrary, it was because the executive was reduced to little more than a puppet of the legislature.

By way of contrast, the heroic resistance of the English people during the present war has been made possible in no small degree by the powers which have been conferred upon the Prime Minister and his cabinet.

In every time of great national emergency which calls for dynamic and courageous leadership there are always those who pretend to see in such leadership the threat of dictatorship. Fortunately for us these timid souls are in a minority now, as they were in the days of Washington and Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, and Wilson.

The "last frontier of democracy" is even now at the English Channel. We in the United States have constituted ourselves the arsenal for the defense of that frontier. Fancied fears of dictatorship at home should not blind us to the real threat arising from the upsurge of tyranny abroad.

We lawyers have a peculiar responsibility to avoid the kind of distortion which represents the exercise of the powers of national self-preservation by the President as a threat to our democracy. The framers of the Constitution were not unmindful of the dangers this Nation would encounter in the unfolding future. But they had the faith and vision to see that the power to govern in the hands of a responsible Executive was a necessary condition of survival. It is for us to show the same faith and the same vision today.

United States Marine Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

INDEPENDENCE DAY ADDRESS OF HON. DAVID I. WALSH, OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, on July 4 I had the privilege and honor in participating in an Independence Day program of the United States Marine Corps. On that occasion I paid tribute to the United States Marine Corps, and I should like to have the speech inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When I was a youth and stood along the line of march to view an occasional military parade, I noted that as the sailors of the Navy and the soldiers of the National Guard and Regular Army passed by, an expectant murmur among the spectators arose, "Where are the marines?" "Where are the marines?" Later came whispers of exultation—"Here they come." "Here they come."

To this very day I have observed this same attitude upon the part of our people who line the sidewalks along our public streets to witness parades in which our military organizations participate. At first I did not understand the full purport of these expressions of special interest in the marines. Now, I know that it was the people's admiration for their attractive well-fitted uniforms, their fine physique, and their impressive and snappy military bearing which represents the acme of perfection in military training and appearance.

I observed more than public admiration for the martial swing of our manly looking marines. I sensed a real affection on the part of the American people for them. The enlisted men of the Navy and of the Army are appreciated by all Americans and we are proud of them, but somehow the marines seem to catch the fancy of the American people and to command a special affection.

It is the history of the United States Marine Corps from the days of the Revolution to this very hour, outranking as it does, the thrills of fiction. That is the explanation. They—the marines—have typified in all our history the appropriateness of their motto, "Semper Fidelis"—"Always Faithful."

No structure is stronger than its foundations and in the foundation of the United States Marine Corps lies a cemented host of traditions deeply entrenched in the soil of the United States—traditions not developed by orators or propagandists, but earned in the past by the Corps on the blood-soaked fields of battle; and by faithful service to the Nation for more than 165 years.

Tradition demands a high physical standard for marines. They must be prepared to display the quality of physical endurance in the performance of their varied duties, as well as on the athletic field. They must exemplify neatness and cleanliness, together with military bearing and smartness on the quarter deck, parade ground, and in the field. I said their military bearing commands respect. So does their marksmanship. For they are ready to shoot straight should the occasion demand it. You must have often noted that when perfect marksmanship is illustrated, the gun is always placed in the hands of the marine.

Every marine is taught to respect high moral qualities and to emulate the examples of trustworthiness, courage, faithfulness, and self-sacrifice of those who have gone before them. From the achievements of his predecessors in the Marine Corps he is taught to gather strength of character and to be worthy always of being called a marine.

About a year ago I was invited to deliver a brief address at the erection of a simple tablet over the grave of a marine who was killed at Harpers Ferry in the historic John Brown's raid. Incidentally, it is not generally known that it was the marines that went out from the navy yard at Washington who captured John Brown. I became deeply interested in the idea that the little community at Harpers Ferry were to erect a small monument to a forgotten and unknown marine hero. I learned that the only one marine killed in that skirmish was a lonely immigrant boy who enlisted in the marines at 19 years of age, shortly before his death. For a long time his grave was unknown and unmarked. A local citizen interested himself, and after years of research finally discovered (by the preservation of the buttons on the uniform the marines then wore) the grave of Luke Quinn, the unknown marine hero of Harpers Ferry. He had no known relatives. He had come to America like millions of others who fled from Europe to America to enjoy the priceless opportunity of being free from poverty and oppression, and to enjoy the rights and privileges of citizenship in this free land.

This story illustrates the type and caliber of those who enlist in our marines. They are descendants of every race, representative of every creed, and from every section of our country. They are typical Americans.

The esprit de corps of the marines is superb, their loyalty adamant. Thousands and thousands of boys like Quinn at Harpers Ferry have come and gone, their services unsung, but they have imbedded into the hearts of all Americans a deep and lasting affection for our marines.

You will be interested to know something of the numerous duties performed by the marines. First of all, they are a component part of the United States Navy, their chief and outstanding duty is on board our naval vessels, accompanying them in their attacks at sea, and when the Navy has successfully bombarded an enemy shore the marines leave the naval vessels and go ashore to seize and protect advanced bases for our Navy and our Army.

Leaving the ships they have guarded at sea, they proceed directly into the difficult, hazardous, and extremely dangerous task of placing in subjection and under control a hostile population in a foreign land. They are the first to land bearing the flag of our country, inspired with the courage that has characterized the marines in all its undertakings. I like to believe also that they are strengthened in their purpose in the realization of what the unstained flag of our country represents to humanity. In these operations they are not only subjected to military opposition, but also to ambush attacks from civilians and unsympathetic forces who are not a part of the enemy military organization.

Tonight on every battleship, cruiser, and aircraft in the United States Navy, in Honolulu, the Philippines, and the waters of China, in every sea where our naval vessels are stationed there is a detachment of marines, who, in addition to performing regular guard duties aboard ship, furnish the gun crews of the secondary battery and antiaircraft guns, as well as providing a nucleus for the landing-force organizations. It is interesting to note that all antiaircraft firing from naval vessels is done by the marines at sea.

It will surprise many Americans to know that the Marine Corps has in it almost every feature of an army organization. It has airplane and parachute-jumping units, field artillery, chemical companies, tank companies, communication units, engineering detachments, and the regular infantry regiments. The present personnel of the Marine Corps is 50,908, about 1 marine for every 5 enlisted men in the Regular Navy, and the objective of our Government at the present time is to enlarge it to 75,000, with a corresponding increase in the Navy personnel.

Marines are popularly known as soldiers of the sea and also among themselves as "leathernecks." This word has come down from colonial days, when marines wore a leather stock about their necks as a brace to hold up the standing collar of the uniform, which served the purpose of correct military bearing by holding the chin up.

If all our people would read the history of this splendid corps, which time prevents me from detailing, there would be fewer Americans listening to soap-box agitators and subversive propagandists.

The Marine Corps is now being rapidly expanded in order to meet the requirements of our two-ocean Navy fleet. The age limit for first enlistment has been reduced to 17 years, but more important than age are the moral, mental, and physical requirements.

In conclusion, let me add that the United States Marine Corps is composed of American youths of whom the men who signed the Declaration of Independence, and whose memories we especially honor today, would have been proud, for they exemplify everything that is good, clean, healthy, and fearless in American youth.

Young men of the marines, wherever you are on duty tonight throughout the wide world, we salute you. We are grateful to you and proud of you. Americans know they are safe and secure even in this mad-war-ridden world as long as the marines live up—and, speaking from personal knowelge, none are exemplifying it more than the marines of today—to their noble traditions and their motto, "Semper fidelis"—always faithful.

Tribute to Private Luke Quinn, United States Marine Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ADDRESS OF LT. JOHN S. OLDFIELD, UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS, AT HARPERS FERRY, MAY 5, 1940

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in the address which I delivered in tribute to the United States Marine Corps on the Fourth of July, I referred to a monument which was dedicated at Harpers Ferry on May 5, 1940, in honor of a young marine, Private Luke Quinn, whose body was found after many years, the monument having been erected by the people of that locality. On that occasion, at my request, Lt. John Oldfield, of the United States Marines, represented the Marine Corps, and paid a tribute to the young marine, whose body had been found. I ask that the tribute be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tribute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am pleased to participate in these exercises as a junior officer in the Marine Corps assigned to this duty by the Commandant of the Marine Corps upon the request of United States Senator DAVID I. WALSH, who unfortunately, is unable to be present today.

In reviewing the life of Private Luke Quinn of the United States Marine Corps, one is instinctively impressed with the great contribution that foreign-born American citizens, and the men of all religious faiths, have rendered to the military service of our country. He was an immigrant, coming to this country from Ireland at the age of 9 and was only 20 years of age when he enlisted. Whether or not his parents were in America is unknown; his trials and loneliness as a poor immigrant boy will never be recorded, but we do know he possessed that American patriotic spirit that prompted him to desire to serve his adopted country by joining the Marine Corps.

The fact that we honor him is due to his having been a man of character and of discipline. Of these two, it is my privilege to speak before you today as an officer of the United States Marine Corps, speaking from the viewpoint of the necessity of discipline. I feel proud to mention the very word "discipline," for never in the history of the Marine Corps has there been a breach of discipline. Discipline is the very foundation of a well-ordered life. I do not mean mere physical discipline; the men of Sparta had that. Their historical failure attests the weakness that must result from eliminating the discipline of a mental and moral nature. I do not mean mental discipline alone. The untimely death of Lord Byron, the poet, forcefully illustrates the necessity for physical discipline. There must be a balance.

Discipline itself has been defined as the treatment suited to a disciple or learner; education, training, drill. It is developed by instruction and exercise. It is an intangible thing. It becomes tangible only when found in man, for only in man is there a proper evaluation of discipline both physical and spiritual—the latter including mental and moral discipline.

Private Quinn must have been such a man. His service record indicates such. Physically he had the strength to perform his duties. Mentally he had the intellect and memory for the proper execution of commands. Morally he had the strength of will power, as indicated by the fact that he was mortally wounded.

I am informed he was of the Catholic faith. The religious man is of special value from the viewpoint of a soldier, for such a man must be a man of discipline.

It is fitting that at this historic spot where he lost his life—his grave—a memorial should be erected. It is more than a memorial to Quinn—it is a memorial to every enlisted man in the Marine Corps and always will be a reminder to the American people of the spirit that continues to prompt young men, whether born in America of so-called American stock, or of foreign birth, to serve their country even to the point of being willing to lay down their lives for it.

The members of the Marine Corps are honored by your action and grateful for your remembrance of a forgotten marine hero.

Townsend National Convention at Buffalo, N. Y.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. ALEXANDER WILEY, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech I delivered in Buffalo on July 2 before the Sixth Townsend National Convention at the Buffalo Memorial Auditorium, Buffalo, N. Y.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHALLENGES OF THE PRESENT

Mr. Chairman, my friends, it is a pleasure to speak to this fine group of Americans and to your distinguished leader, Doctor Townsend. He, above all men, has brought to the attention of all America the problem of old age, and he has submitted through H. R. 1036 the only national plan to take care of that problem.

My colleague, FRANK KEEFE, from my own State, and others have given you the situation in Congress as far as it relates to the proposed legislation. I am speaking to you on the subject Challenges of the Present.

Unless and until these challenges which I speak about are met, it is my opinion that no solution of the old-age problem will be put into effect by the present administration. In other words, America must be kept safe and free in order that such legislation may be considered and enacted.

I am speaking today to Americans. We are a peculiar people—a people set apart. Our parents, or in some instances our remote forbears, came to America and became Americans. They anchored their roots deep in the soil of this great land.

They left the old lands, for many reasons. Some left for political reasons, some for religious reasons, others for economic reasons. All who came here looked upon this as the land of promise. They found here a new idea of life—of government. They found a new concept of freedom and liberty and equality of opportunity.

Many who are listening to me are, like myself, children of immigrants from Europe. Our parents were grateful for the political and economic freedom that they found here. Our parents felt that America had been good to them. They believed in our system of life. They believed that this country was entitled to 100-percent loyalty, from all of its sons and daughters, and they felt as we feel today, that most of the political thought of Europe has nothing of value for us.

THESE DAYS PRESENT GREAT CHALLENGES

These are anxious days—difficult days. They present a great challenge to each one of us. They call to each of us for sacrifice, balanced judgment, and common sense.

Before this war started in Europe we had the problem of balancing our Budget—of a more economic distribution so that agriculture would get a more equitable share of the Nation's income. There was the problem of unemployment. In some places there was a need for seeing that a living wage went to labor. There was the great problem of relief. There was the economic problem of men and women past 60 years of age, many of whom had made a great contribution to the economic and social life of the Nation and who were facing want. There were the problems which arose out of unfair trade practices; there was the problem of economic barriers rising between States; there was the problem of distribution of the products of our farms and factories. These problems haven't been solved, but they are now part of a great new problem.

This problem came with the war. With the war came an awakening to America of the dangers to our way of life. We saw other nations go down before the might of the totalitarian governments; we saw great peoples overrun and enslaved; we saw solemn international treaties thrown out the window; we witnessed the pledged word of nations broken; and we saw hunger and distress and pillage sweep over Europe.

We saw also courage reborn—we saw a new technique of war developed by the Nazi government. War became a thing of machines, flying air squadrons, submarine sharks. We saw cities destroyed and the whole economic and political life of a large portion of the globe disarranged.

Then we witnessed in our own land a gradual awakening to the fact that we, too, had been asleep to the pending dangers—we had become, under our leadership, smug and complacent. We had developed a great bureaucratic form of government. We had permitted leaders to create classes among us. We saw the rise of racketeers in and out of government.

REALISTIC LIVING DEMANDS FAITH, INDUSTRY, AND SACRIFICE

But, thank God, we are getting out of this condition of smugness and complacency—this rut that we were in. We are living more realistically. We are developing in America a rebirth of faith, industry, and spirit of sacrifice.

Faith is the thing. Faith in our own land, faith in our citizenry, faith in America's future and in America's destiny to lead, to grow, to solve her problems.

Yes; we are a peculiar breed—we stem from every land in Europe, but we are not British-Americans, Scandinavian-Americans, German-Americans, Italian-Americans, Polish-Americans, etc.—We are Americans without a hyphen.

Our fathers left the old country to get rid of the old hatreds, the old barriers, the old limitations, and we who were born here are called upon now to preserve the freedoms and the American way of life which obtain here—and only here.

These great freedoms did not just happen. They are the result of sacrifice for a thousand years, and as we witness Europe we know that those freedoms can disappear unless the people who enjoy them are awake and are willing to sacrifice to preserve them.

Yes, faith is the thing. Faith in the great source of life. The people of America are turning more and more to their God for direction and guidance. "Let us trust in the Lord with all our hearts. Let us cease leaning unto our own understanding," the way of bigotry, selfishness, and intolerance. "In all our ways let us acknowledge Him and He will direct our paths."

OUR FIRST CHALLENGE IS TO BUILD THE MORALE OF OUR PEOPLE

The first challenge which comes to us is to build ourselves strong. Let us build the morale of this people. Let us recognize that we are one people, and if there are those who in heart and soul are not loyal to this country, let us cast them out. This is no time for weak-kneed internal appeasement with the "fifth column" termites in our midst.

This America of ours is something more than geography—something more than lakes and streams, mountains, and countryside, villages and cities, and material wealth. This America of ours is a living thing. It is made up of 131,000,000 people—a living thing of freedom and democratic ways. It is a thing of great schools and churches. It is a land where men can talk freely and read a free press, where men can sell their own work and efforts and collect their own pay, where men can own property and transmit it to their children, where the courts are open and free to all, where freedom is a watchword and a reality.

WE MUST DESTROY CLASS DIVISIONS

So, we must build America strong. We must destroy the wall of division and dissension which has been built up between labor and capital in America. The wall of division was built by those who deal in distrust, in classism, hatred. They are false prophets. The racketeer and the saboteur of our faith and unity (and there are many kinds) must go. Are we not all in the same boat, labor and capital, farmer and businessman?

In fulfilling this challenge, we must dam up the backwash of European ideas. No matter in what guise they come to us—nazi-ism, fascism, communism—none of these has a place in our American scheme of things.

While we have a great program on our hands which will necessitate the sacrifice of much of our earnings, we must nevertheless put a premium on the man who produces. We must not take the fruit of his labor away from him. In other words, we must put a premium on industry and thrift and savings.

On this subject of maintaining the morale of our people, each of us must remember that it requires of all of us, a common sense approach to the immediate problems. We must keep our heads. We must not become stampeded by propaganda (the papers, and the radio and the forum are often dominated by men who do not discuss the issues but who do discuss personalities).

We must be considerate of the other fellow. We must be considerate of the businessman and the man who labors—of the statesman and the man who manages industry. We must be considerate of the aged and those who have little security against the economic jolts which are up ahead. We must not sabotage the morale of the unfortunate by "shelving" his problems. This is especially true in times of stress.

When we become advocates of any particular idea, we must get perspective and see where that idea fits into the general scheme of things. I am gratified in speaking to leaders of your group, to hear of their endeavors to fit their objectives into our general economy.

With a nation of thinkers, conscious of the interplay of all of our problems, we can be sure that there will be little or no chance for that nation going wrong. If, however, we were to develop the mob spirit, if we develop unreason, if we become unpoised mentally, then we can be led astray.

WE MUST PROCEED CALMLY

So, we meet the first challenge by saying that we will stand firm—we will proceed calmly—we will keep our heads in this difficult period. If we go forward, having in mind the fundamentals of the Constitution, the Declaration of Independence, and the Sermon on the Mount, we will be guided as a people to do what is right.

In spite of all the false prophets, we know there is no substitute for common honesty, for honest work, for cooperation, for faith, hope, loyalty, and charity. We know also that there is no substitute for the American way of life—for political liberty, for harmony between labor and capital, for security for every strata of society, and for justice between man and men.

We will preserve our liberty if we maintain the American system of checks and balances. It will be preserved by maintaining the courts free from Executive domination, by keeping the legislative branch of our Government free from domination and by the Executive's fulfillment of his Constitutional duties.

OUR SECOND CHALLENGE IS PREPAREDNESS

The second challenge is that which results from the words "national defense" or "preparedness."

The Nation's job today is defense. Does that mean defense in the narrow military interpretation of the word? No; it means defense in its broadest aspects. It means not only a military defense, but an economic defense, a social defense, and an individual defense. It means building not only the steel armor plate of mechanized defense, but also of building the bombproof barriers of mental and spiritual defense.

EACH INDIVIDUAL HAS A JOB WHICH IS A PART OF THE NATION'S JOB

You and I are part of 131,000,000 people. Each of us has a great job to perform. It may be a job that is unheralded and unsung. It may be a little job as the world evaluates success. Nevertheless, to the degree that we give it our best efforts and to the degree that it squares with our American concepts, it is a great job.

The tenement-house mother who has reared her sons in the love of America; the crossroads country doctor on his lonely circuit; the workman whose grimy hand guides a machine lathe, the farmer, the businessman, the small-town preacher—men and women in every walk of life—each contribute to the Nation's job.

THE FIRST JOB OF THE NATION TODAY IS PREPAREDNESS

The No. 1 job of the Nation today is preparedness—adequate defense of the Nation—and now a bulwark against war. This calls for the creation of national unity, strengthening our morale.

In my judgment, we have made great strides in our preparedness, but we still have a tremendous task ahead of us.

SECOND, WE NEED PRODUCTION

Once the governmental mechanism for our defense agencies has been clearly defined, once the machine has been oiled and put into running order, we must produce at top speed. Wars today are machine wars, and if America is to remain safe, we must increase our machine output.

We must further break down the unhealthy concentration of defense orders in the East.

There are idle machines and idle facilities in the small factories which must be employed. Defense must be decentralized still further so that the machines of the small factory are used and the idle workman of the small town is employed.

Government must do its part in keeping the wheels of industry turning. Industry must not be compelled to wade knee deep in red tape. There must be a decisive, businesslike policy in our defence agencies.

The coordination of our defense activities is definitely a vital part of the Nation's job.

THIRD, THERE IS NEED FOR INTELLIGENT COORDINATED PLAN

As a part of our coordinated effort, the great crying need for our defense activities today is a plan. The spectacular success of the totalitarian machine has not been purely accidental.

I believe we need a great defense laboratory, involving the Navy Department, the War Department, and the State Department, and embodying a first-class observation system.

OUR NEED IS FOR MODERN MECHANIZED EQUIPMENT

Part of America's job today then is for modern mechanized equipment rather than for a tremendous Army of infantry and cavalry and field artillery. We need more motorized divisions. We need more armored divisions. We need more highly trained men to mobilize these motor divisions.

Let us be equipped and trained accordingly.

I cannot accept the "ruttist" approach of the military brass hats.

Defense today must be written in the mechanized terms of invention and initiative. Defense today is written in the progressive terms of today and tomorrow, not in closed minds, antiquated caste systems, and red tape.

I believe the great majority of the American people want to remain at peace. I believe, however, that this great middle group recognizes a terrifying menace to our peace at the present time, and realizes that we cannot have peace merely for the asking—that some constructive steps must be taken to maintain peace.

People who fall in this classification are frequently subject to criticism from extremists on both sides—the extremists who believe that we can retain peace merely for the asking—and the extremists who believe that we must participate in the European war.

My own views on foreign policy have been criticized because I refused to condemn either side in this question. I believe that with a few obvious exceptions, men on both sides of this controversy are sincere.

I might add that I think the greatest single menace which could come to any nation is a condition of disunity among its people, reflected in hate and in intolerant name-calling.

INTERNAL DISSENSION CREATES BREAK-DOWN

That type of internal dissension is one of the greatest factors in the break-down of those countries which fell before the Hitler machine.

So, at the outset, let me repeat what I have already said, namely, that we must not create a great American schism on this question of foreign policy. Each of us must retain the right to our own convictions. Each of us must do everything we can to advance our own convictions in an intelligent manner. We must marshal the arguments we have on our beliefs and advance them to the best of our ability. We cannot advance those beliefs by condemning all views which do not coincide with our own.

With certain obvious exceptions, the great majority of the American people are facing the problems of this chaotic world sanely and in a high spirit of confidence.

This great majority cannot be classified as isolationists or interventionists. This group—the great majority—wants peace and is willing to make tremendous sacrifices to retain peace. This group also wants to retain our great American freedoms, and it is their fervent hope that they can retain these freedoms without sacrificing peace. I can agree wholeheartedly with these hopes.

Our question, however, is how we may best realize these hopes. I have opposed many of the present administration's measures in this crisis on foreign policy. At the same time I am perfectly willing to concede sincerity to the administration, and in several instances I have found myself in agreement with the administration.

I do not believe that this is an inconsistent stand. I believe it is thoroughly consistent. We cannot write a foreign policy based solely on the shifting bold-faced headlines in the daily newspapers. Decisions which you and I make, on foreign policy, and, in fact, on everything which affects government, must have some definite objective—some guiding pole star which does not vary from day to day. If we follow such a policy, we cannot honestly be accused of being inconsistent.

OUR FOREIGN POLICY MUST BE DECIDED ON BASIS OF WHAT IS BEST FOR AMERICA

If we are to reduce our present objective in a foreign policy to its simplest possible terms, I would say that our foreign policy must be directed solely and only toward what is best for America—thinking in terms of self-interests—self-preservation.

It is true that we are concerned with international moral values. It is inevitable that, as individuals, we should hate pillage and conquests. It is inevitable that, as individuals, we should favor those who resist oppression and tyranny, but our hates and our affections cannot be the determining factor in arriving at our foreign policy.

Because we are trustees of great values, which we hope to hand on unimpaired to generations who will follow, we have an obligation beyond our hates and our affections. The trustee of an estate cannot take the same financial risks, cannot follow the same inclinations and judgment for his trusteeship which he might employ in making his own personal investments.

As trustees, our primary obligation must be solely and only what is best for America—and that does not always mean that what is best for America cannot coincide with our individual preferences as to foreign policy.

It is true that we are concerned, gravely concerned, with international morality, but apparently our views on international morality are subject to a great many changing factors.

A few years ago we were unanimous in our fervent opposition to everything which Russia represented. And today, as a government, on the basis of governmental morality and ideological integrity, we still condemn everything Russia represents.

Yet today, this Government is committed to a policy of assistance for Russia. This policy certainly could not have been determined on the basis of any ideological bond between this country and Russia. It was determined solely and only on the basis of a realistic appraisal of the situation, and a careful weighing of which force in this conflict constituted the greater menace to the peace of the United States.

On the basis of what is best for the United States, I cannot favor any acts by the United States Government which are an immediate invitation to involvement.

Aside from the terrible consequences of such an involvement—aside from the tremendous costs, not only to our economy, but to our way of life, to our manpower, to our homes, but because in any event, I do not believe that we are ready for such a conflict. I do not believe that we are ready for such a conflict, either psychologically or from a military standpoint.

Consequently, I have opposed anything which I believed would bring immediate involvement. I want to be realistic, I want to see this country remain in peace.

I think that one of the best guarantees that America can have for peace, is an efficient highly mobile army with a coordinating air arm, and an unparalleled navy with a coordinating air arm.

I believe another insurance against involvement is the removal of strategic air and naval bases which are located in zones where they constitute a temptation to Hitler to use them as convenient posts, from which he might some day launch an attack on this country.

I feel keenly, that we must be aware of the menaces in this present world situation and that we must be realistic. In other words, we must continue to do everything in our power to create unity in this country, to give assistance to those forces which constitute a bulwark against the ravages of the totalitarian plague and to take whatever realistic steps may be necessary to insure our freedoms.

It is my fervent hope that we can do these things without involvement. It is my fervent hope that we are evolving a foreign policy which will be an insurance against a destruction of American values.

FOURTH CHALLENGE IS IN POST-ARMAMENT PERIOD

The fourth challenge is found in the post-armament picture—the post-war period. You and I can have a lot to say about what that picture will be. During this great emergency, if we use the brains we are endowed with we will antidote a lot of the problems which might come into being. If we are realistic we will take steps which will benefit America. What are some of these steps?

First, we will insist that Government pass a realistic tax bill—one that will require sacrifice by its citizens, but one that will do the job.

In the last 8 years Government, under this leadership, has run into the red on an average of three and a half billion dollars a year. We are going to spend $25,000,000,000 this year. If we are good citizens and statesmen we will insist that we will pay as much as we can of that load now and not pass it on to our children. If we do this thing we will preserve our financial structure intact. If we fail to do it we will have termited the foundation.

I believe the American people want to do the job now and not postpone it for another generation when such a postponement might be disastrous.

We are ready to pay the taxes if—

(1) We cut out a lot of unnecessary Government overhead.

(2) If we will reduce expenditures on non-defense items.

(3) If we will insist that we get value received for every dollar of the taxpayers' money.

(4) If in the program under the Lease-Lend Act the President will be practical and get collateral whenever it is possible. Many months ago I called attention to the fact that Britain had $4,000,000,000 in South American securities. If Hitler ever got possession of that collateral he would win this war in South America without firing a shot in this hemisphere. Or, if that war were a stalemate and he got possession of this $4,000,000,000 in stocks and bonds, he would own South America.

(5) The farmers are ready to do their share in relation to the tax bill, but they have a right to demand that Government approach their problems sensibly. Under the terms of the Lease Lend Act there are $500,000,000 available for the purchase of farm products to be sent to Britain. It seems reasonable that the farmers can expect that this Government will see to it that they get at least the cost of production for the products which the Government gives away—products purchased by the Treasury of the United States with the people's money.

PEOPLE ENTITLED TO COMMON-SENSE GOVERNMENT MANAGEMENT

All America is defense conscious. The folks who are paying the bills have a right to demand that the managers of Government become realistic in their approach to our problems. That realism is merely a synonym for common sense or horse sense.

We have heard the saying so often that the day of reckoning is coming. If so, it is about time that we realistically considered what the phrase "day of reckoning" means.

In the last 8 years, under the present managers of Government, we have run behind on the average of three and one-half billion dollars a year. This year we may spend as much as $25,000,000,000.

At the present time we are spending about a billion dollars a month.

By early fall we will be spending anywhere from $1,400,000,000 to $1,600,000,000 each month.

By the first of next year it is possible that we may be spending between $2,000,000,000 to $2,500,000,000 monthly, and it is possible that this figure may be raised to $3,000,000,000 a month.

In other words, every minute that your clock ticks off 60 seconds we spend $23,000 for defense and Britain.

By fall we will be spending $32,000 to $37,000 a minute for defense and Britain.

By early next year it is possible that we may be spending between $46,000 and $58,000 a minute, and it may rise to $69,000 a minute before the year is out.

How long these vast expenditures will continue no one can tell. Our first necessity, however, is to pay as much as we can out of earnings.

WE MUST STOP SPIRAL OF INFLATION

Our second necessity is to proceed reasonably and sensibly to stop the spiral of inflation. We can, whenever it is possible, buy defense bonds instead of spending our earnings. We must make saving a virtue once again. We can never insure a permanent security and independence for our aged and our unfortunates if we do not reestablish a sound American economy.

There must be no excessive inflation. During the last war we had a dollar worth 50 cents. That must not happen again. If it happens, the problems of the aged and the unfortunates would be intensified a thousandfold.

WE MUST ACCUMULATE A RESERVOIR OF NONDEFENSE PROJECTS

Our third requirement is to accumulate in every city, county, and State a reservoir of nondefense projects, and along with these, if it is possible, whatever money we can save to pay for these projects when the present emergency is over. The purpose of accumulating such projects is that when our boys come back from the Army and the Navy and the defense industries there will be something for them to do. We will be able to absorb part of the shock of a post-armament economy geared to nondefense needs.

WE MUST PRODUCE MORE AT LOWER COSTS

Fourth. There will be powerful forces after the European war which will tend to drive us into a depression even worse than the past depression. If we are to escape that kind of depression all of industry and government must be geared, after the close of our defense effort, toward a policy of producing more goods at lower costs and lower prices. There must be no restriction of output.

WE MUST EMPHASIZE COOPERATIVE TECHNIQUE IN BUSINESS

Fifth. After the impetus of defense financing is over, we must emphasize the cooperative technique in business; to shift the emphasis from a purely profit-seeking motive to the motive of rendering services at costs which are in proportion to the contribution made by each individual.

WE MUST CREATE NEW INDUSTRIES THROUGH RESEARCH

Sixth. In any post-armament period we must endeavor through research to create new industries, new products, and new jobs. The history of the plastics industry in recent years is an illustration of what I mean.

In my own State of Wisconsin, for example, we can accomplish a great deal if by research we can create new industrial uses for casein, one of the byproducts of milk production.

One of the ways in which we can bring the farm economy into balance with urban economy is by an increased utilization of the products of the farm in the city.

WE MUST BE ALERT TO POSSIBILITIES FOR FOREIGN TRADE

Seventh. In any post-armament period we must immediately seize whatever opportunity may be offered to us for foreign-trade expansion. In all probability our European markets may be curtailed, but we must look to South America wherever it is possible to satisfactorily integrate our economies.

WE MUST REESTABLISH A SOUND MONETARY SYSTEM

Eighth. It will be necessary in any post-defense period for government to reestablish a respectable monetary system with a balanced budget and with business free from unwarranted government competition.

GOVERNMENT MUST BE READY TO AID INDUSTRY IN SHIFTING TO PEACETIME OPERATIONS

Ninth. It may be necessary in the post-defense period for government to aid private industry in financing its shift back to normal operation.

POST-ARMAMENT PERIOD MAY PRESENT OPPORTUNITY

Tenth. In general our post-armament problems can be anticipated if we do not permit prices to run away. In the world post-armament era we will have idle capital, idle labor. We will have tremendous accumulated human needs, and we will have a willingness to work together. Those are all the bases we need for a recovery.

If government is able to reduce taxes in the post-armament period, and if government is able to lighten its controls, it may be that we can accomplish a real recovery.

We know that the last World War brought inflation. We know that after the inflation there came depression and deflation. We know that there were terrifying periods of economic readjustment.

The unstable world economy makes it very probable that there may be a fierce economic war in the international markets. Whether we will be able to meet that economic war will be determined by the course we adopt at the present time. It stands to reason that we will be in a better position to wage that economic war if we maintain our financial equilibrium today; if we do not permit a tremendous, unwarranted increase in the public debt; if we shun the easy way of borrowing more and more funds; if we defer satisfaction of some of the wants which we are now able to gratify; if we follow a policy of less credit and more cash purchasing.

NEED FOR SELF-SUFFICIENCY IN POST-ARMAMENT PERIOD

Let us also bear in mind that while we cannot disassociate ourselves from the world, we are, nevertheless, to a degree, a world in ourselves.

In the fiercest economic wars up ahead, in the international cutthroat competition of the future, when this war is over, it may be necessary for us to develop an ever-increasing degree of self-sufficiency to develop production in this hemisphere of products for which we have been dependent on sources which may be closed to us for years.

Security demands that we cannot be dependent now and in the future on sources in the Eastern Hemisphere for vital commodities.

In this drive for self-sufficiency it will be necessary for us, with certain exceptions, to retain the American market for America, to build in the post-armament era self-sufficient economic ramparts against any foe.

We must do that thing that will build purchasing power in our people, and they will expend their money for American products produced by American workmen.

AMERICA CAN MEET THE CHALLENGES OF THE PRESENT

These, then, are some of the challenges of the present which confront our people today. I am confident that we can meet them.

While in other lands there is a blitzkrieg on freedom and a black-out on democracy, I feel that the people of the United States will continue to reaffirm their faith in America and her ways.

Democracy is dynamic. The ideals of our Republic must live and grow. Our way of life cannot stand still. We must go on building. We must go back to first principles. We must restore the health of our social organism through faith in God and faith in the great destiny of this Nation.

The road up ahead will be a hard one. The task confronting our citizens will not be easy.

The challenges which confront us are challenges which will require sacrifice and a toughened moral fiber. I believe that we will meet the challenges. Great challenges in critical times produce great men.

These challenges are not met only by men in uniform. They are met by folks such as those who are gathered here today. They are challenges which confront the average citizen. I believe it is our obligation to become informed on affairs of government so that we may intelligently participate in the affairs of government and use wisely the sovereignty of the people.

Probably history will record these days as the story of the quick and the dead among nations. Our Nation must continue dynamic and growing.

The challenges of the present are our opportunities for growth, our opportunities for leadership.

As Holland said:

"God, give us men! The time demands strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and willing hands."

Soon we will celebrate the anniversary of the birth of our Nation. May we possess the faith that God will guard and guide this people, through the turbulent waters of today and tomorrow, and that this Nation will in peace and helpfulness lighten the burdens of the other nations of earth.

Occupation of Iceland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Mr. Walter Lippmann, entitled "Iceland and the Atlantic."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TODAY AND TOMORROW—ICELAND AND THE ATLANTIC

(By Walter Lippmann)

Those who dislike the American occupation of Iceland should imagine how they would have felt if they had learned instead that the Nazis had landed in Iceland. This is the acid test of the Government's action: Is it better that the Americans or the Nazis should be established in Iceland?

Before Denmark and Norway and France were invaded, the United States did not have to worry about Iceland or about Greenland or about Newfoundland or about Ireland or about the British Isles or about the Azores, the Cape Verdes, or Dakar. These stepping stones from Europe to America were held by friendly nations. The Axis was locked up in central Europe by the power of the British Fleet and the French Army.

The occupation of Scandinavia, the collapse of France, and the turnabout of the Vichy government radically altered the whole situation. In the last 12 months the paramount American question has been whether American public opinion would sanction the measures that are necessary in order to counteract the dangers created by Hitler's victories in France and in Scandinavia. Experience has shown that the people have been reluctant to approve the necessary measures while they were beeng discussed theoretically but that they have approved overwhelmingly the specific measures when actually undertaken.

Thus, a year ago there were fierce outcries at the first of the series of measures to redress the balance after Hitler's continental victories; it was necessary 12 months ago to transfer destroyers to Britain to make up for the desertion of the French Navy, and it was necessary to establish American bases in the Atlantic, from Newfoundland to Trinidad. This transaction which was denounced by some as outrageous warmongering is now almost universally approved as wise and prudent statesmanship.

The second series of measures was proposed a few months later—the lease-lend program and the opening of American navy yards for the repair of British warships. Again there was strong theoretical objection; in the end there were not, according to Senator VANDENBERG, more than five or six Members of the Senate who did not vote for some form of aid to Britain. The American people had realized that the survival of Britain was an American interest and the courage of the British people had convinced them that, with help, the British would survive.

The next measure consisted in the American occupation of Greenland. There was no substantial objection from any quarter; the American people looked at the map and saw that if we did not hold Greenland, a victorious Hitler would.

Greenland was followed by the Presidential declaration of May 27 which served notice on the Axis and upon the satellite governments, particularly Vichy, that not only Newfoundland and Trinidad and Greenland but all islands in the Atlantic and all jumping-off places for raiding and for conquest were within the sphere of the vital interests of the United States. The isolationists have said many harsh things about the President but they have never ventured openly and directly to challenge this momentous declaration of American policy. For few if any among them would wish to take the only alternative position, which is to say that they would not object to seeing Hitler's air force and submarines established in Iceland, Greenland, Ireland, Britain, the Azores, the Cape Verdes, and Dakar.

The occupation of Iceland is, therefore, no sudden departure. It is rather a stage, to be sure a very important stage, in the development of a policy which became the inevitable and necessary American policy after Hitler's victories last year. That policy is to exclude Hitler from the Atlantic Ocean by the combined action of Britain and the United States.

For the Atlantic Ocean is one ocean, not two oceans divided by an imaginary line between the Western and Eastern Hemispheres. There can never be peace in the Atlantic nor genuine security in the Western Hemisphere unless all the strategic positions on the shores of this ocean are strongly held by friendly powers. If one shore were held by the United States and the opposite shore by a hostile coalition, there could be no peace. The Atlantic is too narrow from east to west and it is also too long from north to south to be a peaceful sea unless it is dominated entirely by friendly and trustworthy nations. A dubious navy on the other side of the immense Pacific is bad enough; a hostile navy across the narrow Atlantic would be intolerable.

Iceland, it is obvious, is one of the points that must be held if the Atlantic Ocean is to be made secure. It commands the route from North America to the British Isles and to Scandinavia and Germany. But we must be under no illusions about Iceland as an outpost of North America. Iceland is an outpost only if the British Isles are invincibly held. So while it is true that the control of Iceland is vital to the defense of North America and of Britain, it is equally true that the power of Britain is indispensable to the defense of Iceland. If Hitler took Iceland, he would gravely threaten Britain and the whole North Atlantic; if Hitler took Britain, it would be impossible for us to defend Iceland.

What this goes to prove is what almost every serious student of American defense has always known: that the defense of the Western Hemisphere requires the survival of a powerful and friendly Britain, and that what we call with unjustifiable condescension "aid to Britain" is literally and exactly the defense of the Americas. These are not two separate and different things: They are, as Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe knew more than a century ago, the same thing, and some fine day in Washington and London there may yet be performed an act of statesmanship in which there is defined and proclaimed the fundamental truth that the security of the Americas and the security of Britain are reciprocal, each being indispensable to the other.

On that day the foundations of law and order in the Atlantic world will have been laid down.

Nondefense Spending

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

EDITORIALS FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES AND THE NEW YORK JOURNAL

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, there has lately been a great deal of talk about the possibility of cutting nondefense expenditures. From time to time I have made remarks on this subject in the Senate, apparently to no great avail. In that connection I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD two editorial, one from the New York Times of July 9 entitled "Nondefense spending," and one from the New York Journal of July 9 entitled "Fiscal Disaster."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of July 9, 1941]

NONDEFENSE SPENDING

The failure of the administration to demand, or of Congress to provide, any net economies in nondefense expenditures for the current fiscal year is the greatest single weakness in the Nation's effort to maintain economic stability in the rearmament period. Employment is increasing, prices are rising; we are planning this year to spend the record total of $22,269,000,000. Yet nondefense expenditures are scheduled to be larger than in the fiscal year just ended.

This is a condition which fully justifies the formation of the new Citizens Emergency Committee on Nondefense Expenditures. The composition of the committee, comprising chiefly college presidents, economists, and tax experts, assures a public-spirited viewpoint. The college presidents, no doubt, are mindful that continued deficits and mounting debt menace the safety of their endowments, but they cannot be accused of being actuated by a selfish desire to escape taxes, as would probably be the case if the committee were made up of wealthy men and representatives of big business.

The greatest danger of our present budgetary situation is that long-continued deficits and the great defense spending program have dulled the sensibilities of Congress and the administration to the need for restraint in nondefense spending. The task the committee has set itself is to make recommendations for economies as a partial offset to the huge defense spending, and to inform the citizens of the need for restraint in nonessential spending. In tackling this job the committee is undoubtedly aware of the need for specific recommendations, based on research and not on slogans. But in a period of rearmament spending and rising employment the committee should not find it difficult to point out how both relief and public works may be curtailed. In a period of sharply rising prices there is no justification for record-breaking Government subsidies to jack up farm prices and the costs of living.

[From the New York Journal of July 9, 1941]

FISCAL DISASTER—THE NEW DEAL'S NONDEFENSE SPENDING FOLLY

"It is hard for an empty sack to stand upright," said wise old Benjamin Franklin.

The United States Treasury today is that sack.

It is quite empty—and therefore it is, to use Franklin's figure, a flat sack.

That, at least, is what Harold D. Smith, Director of the Bureau of the Budget, tells the American people in the form of figures.

The next fiscal year, according to the Director, will see a deficit of $12,767,000,000.

That will be a jump of $3,557,000,000 over the current deficit.

What is a deficit that steadily increases?

It is this, Mr. Plain American Citizen:

A steady decrease of national revenue in relation to national outgo.

It means that this gap has got to be stuffed up—or an attempt will be made to stuff it up—with more taxes.

Taxes are slices off of your wage roll.

They are bits taken out of your very life.

When the National Budget becomes a flat sack so will you, eventually.

The deficit 8 years ago was a symptom.

Solemn promises were made by the administration that the Budget would be balanced.

But what was then a mere symptom has now become a chronic disease that threatens the very life of our country.

It is all nonsense to put the blame for this growing colossal deficit, as some administration leaders do, on defense speed-up.

Long before we went in for intensive defense spending, the gap in the National Treasury between outgo and intake was daily widening.

This was due not to the quite necessary defense of the Nation but to socialistic experiments on which billions were squandered by moonbeam "economists" and Congresses that seemed to think their only mission was to take care of the boys back home by handing them vast sums in subventions—for the farm and otherwise.

Nothing threatens the Nation's welfare so menacingly as this growing deficit—for a growing deficit is nothing but progressive bankruptcy.

The only possible way now to keep the deficit in bounds, and eventually eliminate it, is to eliminate at once every item of nonessential, nondefense spending.

Another quotation from Benjamin Franklin also fits the doings of our wrong-way financial wizards at Washington today:

"He that goes a borrowing goes a sorrowing."

And that applies to your Uncle Sam as well as to your Uncle Zeke.

Military Record of Americans of Jewish Faith

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. WARREN BARBOUR
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE JERSEY JOURNAL

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Jersey Journal of Thursday, June 26, with reference to the military record of Americans of Jewish faith.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Jersey Journal of June 26, 1941]

THE JEW—RECORD PROVES—AS BRAVE AS ANY MAN

With the advent of another national emergency, the story is again revived in some quarters that Jews "duck" Army service and are cowards. Many statistics could be cited against this canard. But to nail the lie—a vicious form of Hitler "fifth column" propaganda, because it abuses a whole race and strives to create disunity within the Nation—it is only necessary to cite comprehensive and conclusive figures gathered by the Jewish War Veterans of the United States, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York. These figures, which pertain to the greatest martial effort in which Uncle Sam ever took part—World War No. 1—show that Jews took at least their fair numerical part in the actual conflict.

First of all may be cited the acolade pinned on the Hebrew soldiers by the commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Force, Gen. John J. "Black Jack" Pershing:

"When the time came to serve their country under arms, no class of people served with more patriotism or with higher motives than the young Jews who volunteered or were drafted and who went overseas with our other young Americans. I well remember in my inspections of New York divisions seeing so many patriotic, well-disciplined, well-behaved young Jewish soldiers, whose commanders spoke of them in the highest terms."

Lt. Col. Douglas Campbell declared that "the Jewish boys of the Seventy-seventh Division (A. E. F.) were the best soldiers on earth. They participated in the greatest battles and emerged sound. The Seventy-seventh, of which 40 percent were Jewish young men, was the only American division to reach the Aisne, after having penetrated farther into the German lines than any other division."

Six Jews won the rare Congressional Medal of Honor, highest United States decoration.

Now for some figures which tell the story in a nutshell: The 16 nations engaged in the war had 65,000,000 men under arms. Of these 1,500,000 were Jews, or 2 percent of the total mobilized, which is twice the normal proportion, since the Jews were 1 percent of the total population of all the countries at war.

Jews formed 2½ percent of the total under arms in the Allied forces; Jews in the population were 1 percent. Jews formed 2 percent of the armed forces in the Central Powers; Jewish population slightly over 1 percent. (Do Propaganda Liar Goebbles and his United States stooges deny this? Ask the Jewish War Veterans).

Now for the United States armed forces in 1917–18: The United States mobilized 4,355,000 men, or 4.3 percent of the total mobilized by the Allies. The Jews mobilized numbered 250,000, or 4.5 percent. "By proportion of population," assert the J. W. V., "the Jews should have numbered about 3 percent of America's total armed forces. Actually they contributed between 4 and 5 percent, or a third above their normal share."

Of the Jews under the red, white, and blue, 190,000 were in the Army, 25,000 in the Navy, 14,000 in the Marine Corps, and 21,000 in other branches. One of the most interesting statistics shows that men of this ancient race, whose warrior exploits are recorded in the Bible, served in almost twice their ratio in the ranks of the foot-sloggers, the Infantry. These are the hombres who use the rifle and come to grips man-to-man with the foe, using the cold steel of the baycnet and the trench knife. They are fellows who traditionally have to take it as well as dish it out. The percent of the Infantry to the total mobilization was 26.6 percent; the percent of Jewish doughboys to the total Jews mobilized was 48. Every other Jew was an infantryman.

The exploit of one of the Congressional Medal winners, Gunnery Sgt. Charles F. Hoffman of the United States Marines, is a sample of Jewish heroism and a refutation of the Hitler chant that Jews are yellow:

"Hoffman, during the battle of Chateau Thierry, though warned of the advance of the enemy with five light machine guns, rushed the detachment (one might vision, like Benny Friedman or Sid Luckman rushing a football line), bayoneted the two leaders, forced the others to flee and abandon their guns, and thus forced the enemy from a position by which they could have swept the field with machine-gun fire and forced the withdrawal of the American troops."

When this war is done, and its lies and crimes and vicious, un-Christian hatreds have been swept into the aftermath before the new reconstruction of the world, and when, in the inexorable rise of due justice, the bloodthirsty guttersnipe of the Wilhelmstrasse is brought to book and receives by legal means what he has so freely and illegally handed out to others, how appropriate it would be if it were a Jew who sprang the trap on the archmonster of the modern age.

What Are You Defending?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELMER THOMAS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ADDRESS BY CHARLES M. THOMAS TO COLORED AMERICAN DRAFTEES

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD copy of an address delivered by Charles M. Thomas, public relations counsel, to the colored American draftees on July 4, 1941. The subject of the address is, What Are You Defending?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It must be prideful knowledge that you are walking in the paths and practices of your forefathers since colonial days, when they served in the militia in the New England region against the hostile Indians. In the War of 1812 again color was no bar to American patriotism on land or sea or the Great Lakes. When Mexico vainly tried to prevent a natural spread of a vigorous land-hungry population into the sparsely settled Southwest, again the valor of men and women of your blood and tradition played no small part in the outcome, and many of their descendants live in Texas today. The record of the conflict of ideas as to the sovereignty of the Federal Government, which took the arbitrament of war from 1861–65 to arrive in a clarifying addition to the Constitution in the fourteenth amendment, is too well known to you to need a reminder of your racial services, sacrifices, and loyalties to both sides in the dispute.

With your own eyes you have seen the returned heroes, and with your own ears you have heard the echoes from across the seas, where all the world saw your fathers and uncles and friends pay the last full devotion to the cause of democracy.

This last was in 1918; but 20 years earlier your older brothers were across the other sea to the west and across the Gulf to the south rescuing oppressed peoples from tyranny. Here again, on land and on water, valor, loyalty, heroism, and sacrifice were not thought too great a price for the advancement of liberty among fellow human souls—Cubans and Filipinos and Puerto Ricans.

HUMANITY'S GREAT STRUGGLE NOT ENDED

It was more than a thousand years before Christ when Moses proclaimed liberty throughout the land to the Hebrews who had fled Egyptian bondage (Leviticus XXV:10). It was not until the first century after Christ that Paul sought the protection of a law of Rome which is a counterpart of our fourteenth amendment (Acts XXV:16). It was not until A. D. 1863 that Lincoln proclaimed freedom for slaves in States in rebellion, and until 1865 that the Congress of the United States announced the end of slavery in this Nation following it by citizenship, due process of law, and equal protection of the laws in the fourteenth amendment in 1868.

The invention of gunpowder, with the printing press and the translation of the Bible into English, advanced liberty by recruiting to it the strength of the masses with moral consciousness. Recently the President of the United States, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, proclaimed against every form of discrimination based upon race, creed, or color in employment in defense industries, because today lovers of liberty must struggle in unity against intolerance, prejudice, vulgarity, and false pride of race supericrity. Today witnesses white men enslaved by conquerors under dictatorships, placing democracy on a double defensive both against loss of its accumulated gains and its way of life.

Your conduct is not only physically defensive but is based upon moral convictions of individual responsibility and inherited intelligence. He being greatest who serves most, you who serve the whole people, humanity, in the greatest of struggles, need not ask favor of any man, but know that you are aiding liberty to enlighten the world.

TAKE STOCK OF YOUR POSITION

The President's proclamation not only contrasts democracy with dictatorships, but it is implemented by recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which declares "equal protection of the laws" as well as "due process of law" for the humblest American citizen. In the short span of 80 years, the attitude of the self-governing American people has shifted from the Dred Scott decision in which a man with African blood had no rights bound to be respected, to equality before the law for all men.

SELF-GOVERNMENT IS A DUAL RELATION

Another parallel with human history lies in the history of the Hebrews, where Moses announced with the sanction of Jehovah (God), the Ten Commandments, operating against man's animal nature.

Self-government likewise imposes an obligation with the sanction of centuries of struggle and sacrifice by our forebears, to know, obey, and respect the laws enacted by the representatives of the people, and subject to review by the courts as guardians of the Ark of the Covenant, the Constitution.

This is all the more incumbent, since the Court has decided that exclusion from primary elections where men are nominated for public office, shall not be allowed. Every qualified citizen may now be represented in his choice for those who shall govern him, and an incentive to become qualified in mind and in behavior is supplied in the guaranty.

Being 21 years of age and in uniform, you are thus generally qualified, but as the provisions for electors are matters for the several States, excepting such as depend upon "race, color, or previous condition of servitude," it is incumbent upon each and every one to familiarize himself with the bases of full citizenship in his State. Citizenship in a democracy demands that all be schooled to know the law and the freedoms won at such pains, struggles, and sacrifices that every man is willing to defend them.

Those freedoms which we cherish and which so distinctly mark the American way of life—freedom of speech, of the press, of worship, and the right to habeas corpus—call for eternal vigilance to protect them against both loss and abuses. To aid in that work, schools are maintained, and where the burden is too heavy for the wealth of a community of the people, the Federal Government is aiding; while that family that finds itself unable to forward the march of its own children, finds the whole people with a helping hand. Much has come to each of us in America, and much may be demanded of us. Every privilege carries its responsibility, as every right, its duty. Only that man is truly free who knows and vows and labors to live up to this mutual relation.

He who would have his life, liberty, and property safe under the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution must stand not only ready to defend them, and to have due regard for the rights of others, but he must be against every invader of those rights, here by law and abroad by force. Until minority groups or backward individuals learn and practice that mutuality, they have not been initiated into the full stature of citizenship.

WHAT ARE THE PROBLEMS OF LIFE?

You are defending the right of every American to accept the responsibilities of that mutuality and to cooperate in its priceless benefits. You are defending the almost boundless resources of a land extending from sea to sea and lakes to gulf; now, by a common threat, including all lands and waters lying between the North and the South Poles on this hemisphere, and elsewhere millions of people struggling to realize liberty's proven benefits.

Today you are defending not only the institutions developed here, but a culture felt to be superior to any on the earth. "A culture comes into being when the manifold activities of a people and their interests can be made to derive their deepest significance from a common understanding of the meaning and value of human life." It is a cooperative answer that civilized men give to the riddle of their existence; without it civilization is but a conglomerate of unrelated activities.

Your experiences in the armed forces of the Nation has shown you how the mind of man may organize millions of men. From the enlisted private to the commander in chief, every grade has its rights and its duties, all directed to the main purpose, defense, by the application of scientific research, by accumulated material resources without stint, by forethought covering your own and your possible enemies' plans and movements, and, above all, by the preservation of your own best interests and highest health, happiness, and morale. In a short century and a half has this organized people reached this height, only to be faced by the barbarian who would destroy it all and reduce you to worse than slavery of body, mind, and free spirit.

Man's problems are broadly three: (1) To live, (2) to make a living, and (3) to realize himself in his life. Here in America, the wisdom and resources of all the people are aiding each man in solving those problems. Beyond any other people, human life is here protected before birth and throughout its length by numerous guaranties and facilities. So true and general has this protection become, that the taking of a life by deliberate murder is our most heinous crime. Lynching and mob violence have almost disappeared from among us, and criminals have their mental condition tested by experts to discover why they depart so widely from the national pattern of mutuality. The safety of man, woman, and child is here the serious concern of every community, and even the occasional fiend is given due process of law including a fair trial before a jury of his peers.

In the competition for food, clothing, and shelter, labor is honorable and protected as nowhere else on earth; not only in the right to work, but in security when not working and in old age. The avenues to preferment by assuming responsibilities too heavy for the ordinary man, are opened to merit, and, by the recent proclamation by the President going beyond that of Lincoln; for then men of your color and tradition could find employment only with difficulty and intense opposition. Politically free, they were mentally and economically still slaves. But in the past 80 years, the democratic system has provided opportunities never before grasped by any former slaves in so short a time.

Should a man by his energy, thrift, or mind amass more than another, he pays more than that other in taxes to the general welfare, again proving mutuality and advancing the whole people.

This system you are defending. Its base is liberty. Its apex is service, thus realizing life to its fullest extent.

Let no one tell you that July 4, 1776, and its annual commemoration mean nothing to you. Men of your blood were with Rogers' Rangers heroically holding the Northeast for the English against the Indians and French to secure the colonies; freemen defended at Lexington and Concord as well as on Boston Common, and the official records prove them to have been at Bunker Hill, Rhode Island, Valley Forge, and in the South where they received the highest commendation from General Greene to General Washington. Hundreds attained freedom through service in arms and heroism. "Act well your part; there all the honor lies."

Giddy Minds and Foreign Quarrels

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. D. WORTH CLARK

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ARTICLE BY CHARLES A. BEARD

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Charles Austin Beard, entitled "Giddy Minds and Foreign Quarrels." I have obtained an estimate from the Government Printing Office as to the cost of printing the article and am informed that it will cost $225.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GIDDY MINDS AND FOREIGN QUARRELS—AN ESTIMATE OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

(By Charles A. Beard)

In the fourth act of Henry IV, the King, on his deathbed, gives his son and heir the ancient advice dear to the hearts of rulers in dire straits at home:

"I . . . had a purpose now
To lead out many to the Holy Land,
Lest rest and lying still might make them look Too near unto my state. Therefore, my Harry,
Be it thy course, to busy giddy minds
With foreign quarrels; that action, hence borne out,
May waste the memory of the former days."

Since the foundation of the American Republic there has been an endless procession of foreign quarrels with which giddy minds could have been busied. The following brief citations from the record hint at the thousands of possibilities scattered through the days and years from George Washington's administration to the advent of Theodore Roosevelt:

1793–1815. Revolutionary and Napoleonic wars.
1815. Alliance of England, Russia, Prussia, and Austria to hold down republican and democratic agitations.
1817. Popular outburst at Wartburg.
1819. Carlsbad decrees establish despotism in German confederation.
1820. Revolutions in Spain and Italy.
1821. War for Greek independence opens.
1822. "Triumph" of Holy Alliance over democratic movements.
1827. English, Russian, and French fleets crush the Sutlans' fleet at Navarino.
1828–29. Russian war on Turkey.
1830. Revolutions in France and Belgium; uprising in Poland.
1831. Insurrections in central Italy.
1838–42. British war on Afghanistan.
1840. British opium war in China.
1845. British war in the Punjab.
1847. France finishes conquest of Algeria.
1848. Revolution in France; spreads to Hungary, Germany, and Austria.
1849. Violent reaction, Austrian war on Hungary.
1851. Louis Napoleon makes a coup d'état in France.
1852. Napoleon III establishes an 18-year dictatorship in France.
1853. T'ai-p'ing rebellion starts in China; millions killed; great cities destroyed.
1854–56. England, France, Sardinia, and Turkey wage war on Russia.
1856–60. France and England wage war on China.
1857. Sepoy mutiny in India; vigorous suppression.
1859–60. France and Sardinia wage war on Austria.
1861. England, France, and Spain act against Mexico.
1863. Insurrection in Poland.
1864. Prussia attacks Denmark and seizes Schleswig-Holstein.
1865. Insurrection in Spain.
1866. German-Italian axis treaty; Germany wages war on Austria.
1867. Insurrection in Spain; Fenian uprisings in Ireland.
1868. Overthrow of Spanish monarchy.
1870–71. Franco-Prussian war.
1873–75. Establishment and subsequent overthrow of the Spanish republic.
1875. Insurrection against Turkey in Herzegovina.
1876. Palace revolution in Turkey and Bulgarian atrocities.
1877. Russia wages war on Turkey.
1881. France finishes conquest of Tunis.
1882. Italy makes an axis with Austria and Germany; British seize Cairo.
1883. France finishes conquest of Annam.
1885. France takes Tonkin from China by war; Serbo-Bulgarian war.
1889. Boulangism flares up and bursts in France.
1891. Franco-Russian alliance.
1894. Persecution of Dreyfus begins.

1895. Japan finishes war on China; Jameson raid in the Transvaal.
1896. Italian war on Abyssinia.
1897. Germany seizes Kiao-chau in China; missionary troubles.
1898. Bloody uprising in Milan; British reconquer the Sudan.
1899. Britain opens war on Boer republics.
1900. Boxer rebellion.
1901. Peaceful era of Queen Victoria closes.

Until near the end of that wonderful century of peace, religion, and international good faith the Government of the United States kept aloof from the aggressions, wars, and quarrels of Europe. It proposed no world conferences for correcting the wicked, settling conflicts, and curing unrest in the four corners of the earth. From time to time, it is true, groups of American people held meetings in favor of one country or party or another, but even they did not try to force their Government to play the role of universal preceptor and manufacturer of rules for settling everybody and everything under threats of armed intervention. Only in relatively recent times has wholesale interference with foreign quarrels and disturbances become a major concern of the intelligentsia, the press, and professional politicians in the United States.

But phrenetic preoccupation with foreign quarrels has now reached the proportion of a heavy industry in this country. All our universities have funds and endowments for teaching what is called international relations, and since about 1918 a large part of this instruction has been stripped of all scientific pretensions and has been little more than propaganda for the League of Nations, collective security, collaboration with Great Britain and France, or some kind of regularized intervention by the United States Government in foreign controversies everywhere, except perhaps at Amritsar or in Syria. Hundreds of professors, instructors, and assistants, sustained by endowments, lecture to students, forums, women's clubs, academies, and dinner parties on their favorite theme—the duty of the United States to set the world aright. Peace societies, associations for the study of foreign affairs, councils, leagues, and committees for this and that, with millions of dollars at their disposal, are engaged in the same kind of propaganda, openly or under the guise of contemporary scholarship.

In fact, advocacy of American interventionism and adventurism abroad has become a huge vested interest. The daily press and the radio, thriving on hourly sensations, do their best to inflame readers, listeners, and lookers with a passion for putting down the wicked abroad. Foreign propagandists, often well paid by American audiences, play the same game. And brash young tom-tom beaters in journalism, who know no history beyond a few days ago, write books on the "inside" of this or that, all directed profitably to the same end. How did we get this way? This is the fundamental question for all of us who are trying to take bearings.

II

The era of universal American jitters over foreign affairs of no vital interest to the United States was opened in full blast about 1890 by four of the most powerful agitators that ever afflicted any nation: Alfred Thayer Mahan, Theodore Roosevelt, Henry Cabot Lodge, and Albert J. Beveridge. These were the chief manufacturers of the new doctrine correctly characterized as "imperialism for America," and all of them were primarily phrase-makers, not men of hard economic experience.

The ideology for this adventure was cooked up by the bookish Mahan and was promulgated by politicians. It was "sold" to the country amid the great fright induced by the specter of Bryanism, and amid the din of the wars on Spain and the Filipinos. As the British agent who framed a portion of the new gospel for John Hay, Secretary of State presumably for the United States, shrewdly observed, this was one way of smashing the populist uprising and getting the country in hand. It was not Woodrow Wilson, the schoolmaster, who first invented the policy of running out and telling the whole world just the right thing to do. It was the new men of imperialism.

The heady ideology put forth to sustain the imperialist policy may be summarized as follows: America has grown up, has acquired man's stature, and put on long pants; the frontier has passed; the continent has been rounded out; America must put aside childish things, become a great big world power, follow the example of Great Britain, France, and Germany, build a monster navy, grab colonies, sea bases, and trading posts throughout the world, plunge into every big dispute among European powers, and carry "civilization" to "backward" races.

For this creed of lunging and plunging Alfred Thayer Mahan caught the clew from Mommsen's history of Rome and furnished the sea-power slogans. An army of literary artists supplied sentimental prose and poetry. Clergymen did their bit by citing the rich opportunity to "Christianize" the heathen. Steel makers and other naval merchants put sinews of war into the propaganda chest of the Navy League and pronounced it good for business—their business, at least. Shipyard constituencies whipped up political support. The middle classes, terrorized by populism, applauded.

Albert J. Beveridge provided the eloquence: "American factories are making more than the American people can use; American soil is producing more than they can consume. Fate has written our policy for us; the trade of the world must and shall be ours. And we shall get it as our mother [England] has told us how. We will establish trading posts throughout the world. * * * We will cover the ocean with our merchant marine. We will build a navy to the measure of our greatness. Great colonies governing themselves, flying our flag and trading with us will grow about our posts of trade. Our institutions will follow our flag on the wings of our commerce. And American law, American order, American civilization, and the American flag will plant themselves on shores hitherto bloody and benighted, but by those agencies of God henceforth to be made beautiful and bright." Cheers, cheers, cheers. And mighty men among the intelligentsia joined the Mahan-Lodge-Roosevelt-Beveridge storm troops in full cry, shouting for the new gospel, while damning Bryan as a fool, Altgeld as an anarchist, and opponents of imperialism as "white-livered cowards" and "little Americans." What a Roman holiday!

Taking advantage of the national furor over the war against Spain and the unrest created by the populist upheaval at home, the imperialist agitators "put their creed over on the country" for a brief season. As an accident of politics, Theodore Roosevelt became President of the United States and started his big parade. The water-cure torture was administered to recalcitrant Filipinos. Endless notes were written to Kaiser Wilhelm II. The Navy was sent around the world. The big stick was brandished furiously. The United States participated in the conference of the great powers at Algeciras and helped to dish Germany in a quarrel that had no relation whatever to any vital interests of this country. But from the point of view of finding outlets for "our surpluses" and bolstering up national security, the show was a farce. In an economic sense it brought an enormous expense to the Nation, not the promised profit. In respect of national defense, it gave us the Achilles heel of the Philippines.

For a time the monster demonstration entertained the intelligentsia and the mobs, like a Roman circus. But underneath it all there was a revolt. The sober second sense of the country gradually came to estimate it at its true worth—that is, as a frenzy. Despite the big carousal, "pusillanimous, cowardly, contemptible, mollycoddles" at home continued to insist on devoting attention to the state of the American Union.

By one of the ironies of history it fell to the lot of Wilson, whom Theodore Roosevelt hated like poison, to mount the world stage and outdo Roosevelt in using the power of the United States to set the whole world aright. Roosevelt had lunged and plunged here and there—at Pekin, Algeciras, Morocco, and other troubled spots. Wilson's ambitions were without limit. He proposed to make the wide world safe for the American brand of democracy and transform backward places into mandated trusts for civilization.

The lines of the Wilsonian creed of world interventionism and adventurism are in substance: Imperialism is bad (well, partly); every nation must have a nice constitutional government, more or less like ours; if any government dislikes the settlement made at Versailles it must put up its guns and sit down with its well-armed neighbors for a "friendly" conference; trade barriers are to be lowered and that will make everybody round the globe prosperous (almost, if not entirely); backward peoples are to be kept in order but otherwise treated nicely as wards; the old history, full of troubles, is to be closed; brethren, and presumably sisters, are to dwell together in unity; everything in the world is to be managed as decorously as a Baptist convention presided over by the Honorable Cordell Hull; if not, we propose to fight disturbers everywhere (well, nearly everywhere). The American people did not vote for exactly this in 1916. At the very first chance, the congressional election of 1918, they expressed decided distrust and in 1920 they seemed to express more than distrust. But the intelligentsia of world affairs continued unshaken in their faith, agitation, and propaganda.

Although the Republican Party was dubbed "isolationist" after 1920, its politicians in power were really nothing of the sort. On the contrary, they tried to combine the two kinds of jitters over foreign affairs that had recently been sponsored by Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson. They sought to make the most of both kinds. They played the old Roosevelt-Lodge-Beveridge game of imperialism wherever they could and whenever they had a chance in the Far East and in the Near East. They turned the Government of the United States into a big drumming agency for pushing the sale of goods and the lending of money abroad, and they talked vociferously about the open doors everywhere except at home. On the other hand, they lectured Soviet Russia and discoursed sagely on peace for worried mankind in the best Wilsonian style. It was near the high noon of normalcy, while the American marines were waging peace in the Caribbean, that the State Department proudly arranged for the Kellogg Pact and the powers of the earth solemnly renounced war forever as an instrument of national policy.

But this experiment in combining two kinds of jitters did not fare any better than the experiment in taking on each kind separately. The big drumming game blew up. Foreign bonds to the tune of billions went into default. The Kellogg Pact became a gibbering ghost. The industrial boom, fed by pump priming abroad at the expense of American investors, burst with a terrific explosion, which produced the ruins amid which we now sit in sackcloth and ashes.

III

For a brief season the American people had enough jitters at home to keep their giddy minds away from foreign affairs, and in a quest for relief they swept into office Franklin D. Roosevelt, who promised to get them out of the slough of economic despond. At first President Roosevelt concentrated his energies on those domestic measures of reform and salvation known as the New Deal. He scouted the idea that world economic conferences, tariff tinkering, and diplomatic notes could contribute materially to relieving the frightful distress at home. Slowly, however, he veered in the direction of world lecturing and interventionism, and now he displays a firm resolve to interfere with the affairs of Europe and Asia as if he were arbiter of international relations and commissioned to set the world aright. The causes of this reversal are obscure, but the fact remains. Internal and external changes may partly account for it. The state of jitters in domestic economy has not been cured by the New Deal, despite the best of intentions. And Great Britain, after playing Germany off against France and treating Russia with studied contempt, has once more got what Henry Adams called "the grizzly German terror" on her doorstep, and needs American help again.

The veering tendencies of the Roosevelt administration are to be observed in every phase of our foreign affairs. At the outset, Latin American countries were informed that the good old imperialism of earlier times was to be renounced. In 1934 the provision of the Platt amendment, which gave the United States the "legal" right to military intervention in Cuba, was abrogated. American Marines were withdrawn from various places in the Caribbean region. Latin American governments were allowed to default on their bonds held in the United States, and to seize property owned by American citizens, without evoking anything stronger than diplomatic notes from Washington. Instead of thundering and drawing the sword after the style of Theodore Roosevelt and Albert Fall, the administration has resorted to negotiation. Instead of sending Marines to collect on defaulted bonds, it is arranging to use public money to revive the trade which collapsed after private lending had ended in disaster for American investors. Thus, Latin American politicians have been given smaller excuses for straining their lungs over "Yankee imperialism" and seeking counterweights in Europe.

Yet through the Latin American negotiations, especially since 1936, the Roosevelt administration has evidently been seeking to line up Latin American governments in defense of democracy, shrewdly with an eye to developing a united front against Hitler and Mussolini. These two disturbers of the order in Europe are not making any demands on the United States, but their efforts to get trade and win supporters in countries to the south of the Rio Grande furnish points for the Roosevelt administration's agitation against them in Europe and at home. Things have been brought to such a pass that American citizens given to alarms are imagining German planes from Bolivia dropping bombs on peaceful people in Keokuk or Kankakee.

Schemes for promoting democracy in Latin America have been less successful. The people of the United States have only vague ideas about the countries below the Rio Grande, but they know enough to know that most governments in that vast region are not and never have been democracies. At the close of the year 1938, according to J. Fred Rippy, at least 12 of the 20 Latin American countries were governed by dictators of their own and if the term is interpreted broadly, "perhaps 2 or 3 more should be added to the list." These 12 dictators "were ruling 75,000,000 people in Latin America—three-fifths of its population—and dominating a land area almost twice the size of the United States." It would seem, therefore, that the rhetoric of democratic solidarity in this hemisphere does not get very far below the surface of things.

In respect of Far Eastern affairs, the Roosevelt administration, early in its career, made a brave gesture in the direction of anti-imperialism by accepting the act of Congress granting conditional independence to the Philippines. At the moment this maneuver was widely interpreted to mean that the United States intended to withdraw its armed forces from the Orient and fix its front upon the Hawaiian line. Organized agriculture was dead set against competitive imports from the Philippines. Organized labor was firm in its opposition to the immigration of "our little brown brothers" and to the importation of cheap goods made by them in their island home. Against these two forces organized business could make no headway. From an economic point of view the whole experiment in the Philippines had been a costly fiasco, as more than one copious balance sheet demonstrated. Imperialism certainly did not provide the outlets for American "surpluses" which Senator Beveridge had promised. Besides, even amateur strategists discovered, as Theodore Roosevelt had done after the first uprush of his berserk enthusiasm, that the Philippines were the Achilles heel of American defense.

Nevertheless, the question of naval bases in the Philippines has been left hanging in the air under the terms of the independence act, and the outburst in Washington last winter over the preliminaries to the fortification of Guam indicates that someone in the Capital is toying with the idea of transforming our obvious liability in the western Pacific into what is euphoniously called an asset of naval power—for exerting pressure in Asiatic affairs. That the Philippines, with Singapore not far away, could be used as a lever in world politics is obvious.

While Philippine independence was being promised with a great flourish and the American people were busy with their jitters at home, the Roosevelt administration put aside the old delusion that booming the China trade would help in getting the country out of a depression through the sale of our surpluses. In fact, that balloon has completely burst. For years western merchants and their intellectual retainers, including consular agents, filled the air with a great noise about how much money could be made in China as soon as 400,000,000 customers got round to buying automobiles, bath tubs, typewriters, radios, refrigerators, and sewing machines. Probably a few of these myth makers were honest. But many among them must have realized that this swarm of customers had neither the money nor the goods with which to pay for western gadgets. However that may be, and despite tons of diplomatic notes, despite gunboats, marines, soldiers, open doors, and all the rest, the trade of the United States with China has been and remains relatively insignificant; in an absolute sense it is of no vital importance to the United States.

Notwithstanding this well-known fact the Roosevelt administration, from the very outset, in dealing with China has followed rather closely the old Hay-Knox-Hughes imperialist line, laid down in the open-door fiction supplied to the United States by British negotiators—that curious form of direct interventionism that was sold to the country as "a fair deal." Even before he was inaugurated in 1933 Franklin D. Roosevelt apparently committed himself to that amazing fantasy known as the Hoover, o. Stimson, doctrine. We were "never" going to recognize any conquest of territory made contrary to treaties, especially the Kellogg Pact. So efforts were made to induce other cosigners of open-door and peace treaties, especially Britain and France, to join in putting the screws on Japan. But those two democracies wriggled out of the net.

Later, when Japan again started to make war on China, the President managed to instigate another European conference, composed of governments solemnly committed to the open door. Our peripatetic ambassador extraordinary, Norman Davis, was sent over the sea to take part in the feast of reason and flow of soul. When Mr Davis returned home a reporter asked him point blank, "Was it a bust?" He could not quite admit that, but the reporter was right. It was a bust. Yet the Roosevelt administration still labors hard at taking the open-door delusion seriously, and still seems to regard it as a tangible asset, at least in the manipulations of world politics.

After the Japanese invasion of China flamed up in a major war the Roosevelt administration blew hot and cold, but ended by using the affair to strengthen its general campaign for setting the world aright. At one time it declared that it did not intend to keep American forces in China for the purpose of protecting American citizens who refused to withdraw from the war zones. American merchants in Shanghai emitted a vigorous protest. Then Secretary Hull put the soft pedal on the notion that the Government of the United States was not duty bound to uphold American rights to do business even on Chinese battlefields, and the administration tried to make a national sensation out of the Panay incident.

Yet, curiously enough, this same administration refused to find a state of war existing in China and to apply the munitions embargo to the belligerents. Voices were heard saying that an embargo would hurt China more than Japan. Perhaps that was so. Perhaps not. Anyway, Americans made hay while the sun shone by selling Japan enormous quantities of munitions and raw materials of war. The Roosevelt administration had run into a violent economic slump and that trade was good for American business. Every little bit of profit helped in the gray days of 1937 and 1938. Even so, Japan was included among the enemies of the United States in the Chicago speech of October 5, 1937.

The sharp shift from focusing attention on the disturbing plight of domestic economy to the concentration of attention on foreign affairs is most clearly evident in respect of European relations. Shortly after the Roosevelt administration opened in 1933 it took part in the London World Economic Conference, for which President Hoover and Congress had made preparations. True to his economic style, Secretary Hull, at this mondial assembly, derided isolationism, ridiculed the efforts of nations "by bootstrap methods" to lift themselves out of the economic crisis, declared that each nation by domestic action could improve its condition only "to a moderate extent," and offered a plan of salvation in lower trade barriers. But President Roosevelt took the onus of putting a stop to the palaver in London. The affair was another failure from the outset. If the President had waited a few months, the conference would doubtless have worn itself out and adjourned. He did not wait. By a sharp message to the august assembly he exploded the works. In so doing he declared that "the sound internal economic system of a nation is a greater factor in its well-being than the price of its currency in changing terms of the currencies of other nations." After proclaiming this policy he turned to the business of trying to stimulate domestic agriculture and industry by domestic action.

For a considerable time after the explosion in London, President Roosevelt gave his special attention to domestic affairs. It is true that he signed the reciprocal-trade bill, so dear to Secretary Hull's heart, and allowed the State Department to set out on its crusade to "lower trade barriers," but at the same time he tried to keep on good terms with George N. Peek, who believed that Secretary Hull was employing sentiment—not hard-headedness—in driving trade bargains. When the plan for taking the United States into the World Court was before the Senate, the President endorsed it, but lukewarmly, and put no heavy pressure on his party's Senators to force ratification. The defeat of the project gave him no sleepless nights. By recognizing Soviet Russia he yanked the State Department out of the high dudgeon stirred up in Wilson's administration, and kept going by Hughes, Kellogg, and Stimson, and simply restored the old policy, consecrated by usage, of maintaining diplomatic relations with saints and villains abroad. This looked like attending to our own business.

The real reversal of American policy and return to constant jitters over European affairs came after the election of 1936. In the campaign of that year, President Roosevelt gave no hint that he intended to take a strong hand in European quarrels. The Democratic platform, made in his own office, declared positively: "We shall continue to observe a true neutrality in the disputes of others; to be prepared resolutely to resist aggression against ourselves; to work for peace and to take the profits out of war; to guard against being drawn, by political commitments, international banking, or private trading, into any war which may develop anywhere." This looked like a pledge to keep out of foreign conflicts and wars. The pledge President Roosevelt confirmed in his Chautauqua address of August 14, 1936: "We can keep out of war if those who watch and decide have a sufficiently detailed understanding of international affairs to make certain that the small decisions of each day do not lead toward war and if, at the same time, they possess the courage to say "no" to those who selfishly or unwisely would let us go to war." If words meant anything in 1936, those words confirmed an evident desire to avoid meddling with the incessant quarrels of Europe and Asia.

Although his platform declared that "we shall continue to observe a true neutrality in the disputes of others," President Roosevelt, in December 1936, a little more than a month after his victory in the election, moved to violate neutrality in connection with the civil war in Spain. On his initiative a bill was drafted and jammed through Congress putting an embargo on munitions to the loyalist government at Madrid. Whether he took this action at the suggestion of Great Britain, or to parallel British action in the nonintervention committee, so farcical in its operations, the upshot pointed in one direction—intervention in European affairs. The embargo was a violation of international law. It was a violation of a specific treaty with Spain. It was an insult to the government of Madrid, which the Government of the United States recognized as de facto and de jure. It smoothed the way for those noninterveners, Hitler and Mussolini, to destroy that government. Whatever may have been President Roosevelt's intentions, he violated neutrality and entered into collaboration with Great Britain and France in a fateful policy which was responsible for the triumph of depotism, Hitler and Mussolini, in Spain—the very kind of depotism and two of the biggest despots that he now denounces to the world.

The pledge of the Democratic platform stood written in the record. The Chautauqua speech of 1936 stood there also. But on October 5, 1937, President Roosevelt went to Chicago and called, in effect, for collective action by all the "democracies" against Germany, Italy, and Japan. He declared that if a holocaust came the United States could not avoid it and appealed to "the peace-loving nations" to put a quarantine on aggressors. The significance of this address was grasped immediately. Advocates of collective security and collaboration with Britain and France hailed it as a sharp change of front on the part of the President. But the counterblast of criticism from all parts of the country was startling, and for a few weeks President Roosevelt lapsed into silence. Nevertheless he had evidently made up his mind that he was going to take a big hand in European and Asiatic affairs anyway and that the country would have to bend to his will or break.

Additional proof of his resolve soon came. On January 28, 1938, President Roosevelt sent a resounding message to Congress on the subject of armaments. He demanded an enormous increase in naval outlays, with special emphasis on battleships, and called for a mobilization bill which had no meaning unless he wanted a huge army that could be used in Europe. This increase in armaments, he said, was made necessary by the growth of land and sea forces in other countries which "involve a threat to world peace and security." One week before this bombshell message landed in Congress, the House of Representatives had passed the regular naval appropriation bill granting the Navy substantially all that it had called for in the largest peacetime naval appropriation in the history of the country. Why had the Navy Department suddenly discovered that it needed another billion or more? This question was put to Admiral Leahy by a member of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, and the honest old sailor blurted out: "I am not accurately informed in regard to that."

This was the cold truth. The sudden demand for an immense increase in the Navy had not come from the Navy Department. It had come from the White House. It was not related to defending the American zone of interest in the Western Hemisphere. Admiral Leahy testified that the Navy was then ready to defend this zone. The new bill took on significance and utility only in relation to the President's resolve to act as a kind of arbiter in world affairs. It is true that the Democratic managers in Congress, while pushing the bill through the House and Senate, repudiated all "quarantine" doctrines and rested their case on grounds of continental security, but by citations from the testimony of naval experts the opposition demonstrated the hollowness of all such pretensions.

Victorious in securing his extraordinary naval authorization, President Roosevelt renewed his battle in 1939. His message to Congress in January vibrated with emotions connected with foreign tumults and asserted that the United States is directly menaced by storms from abroad. These storms, the President said, challenge three institutions indispensable to Americans. The first is religion. It is the source of the other two—democracy and international good faith. Evidently he was clearing a way to make the next war a real holy war. This clarion call President Roosevelt followed by another demand for an increase in armaments on a scale more vast.

As if undaunted by all that had happened in the previous autumn when he had, metaphorically and yet truly speaking, gone to Munich with Chamberlain and Daladier, President Roosevelt, on April 14, 1939, issued to the world a peace appeal to Hitler and offered in exchange another round table on disarmament and another economic conference. All the while the Tory Government in Great Britain and the reaction government in France were playing with Hitler and Mussolini and aiding in the destruction of the Spanish Republic.

Apparently indifferent to the real nature of British and French tactics, President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull grew bolder in their determination to help Britain and France in whatever they were doing. In the summer of 1939 they opened a public campaign to break down the provision of the Neutrality Act which imposed an embargo on munitions in case of a foreign war "found" by the President. They had all along covertly fought this provision, without taking the risk of officially and openly denouncing it in the name of the administration. The will of the country to stay out of foreign wars had been too strong. That will would have to be crushed. The President and the Secretary of State were well aware that Congress was not likely to give them the coveted power to name "aggressors" and throw the country into a conflict on the side of "peace lovers"; but they were nonetheless resolved if possible to erase every line of the Neutrality Act that stood in the way of their running the foreign affairs of the United States on the basis of constant participation in the quarrels of Europe and Asia, with war as their ultima ratio.

Now President Roosevelt's foreign policy is clear as daylight. He proposes to collaborate actively with Great Britain and France in their everlasting wrangle with Germany, Italy, and Japan. He wants to wring from Congress the power to throw the whole weight of the United States on the side of Great Britain and France in negotiations, and in war if they manage to bungle the game. That using measures short of war would, it is highly probable, lead the United States into full war must be evident to all who take thought about such tactics.

IV

From the point of view of the interest of the United States as a continental nation in this hemisphere, the Roosevelt policy is, in my opinion, quixotic and dangerous. It is quixotic for the reason that it is not based upon a realistic comprehension of the long-time history of Europe and Asia and of the limited power which the United States has over the underlying economies and interests of those two continents. It assumes that the United States can in fact bring those continents into a kind of stable equilibrium, assure them the materials of a peaceful economic life, and close their history in a grand conference of the powers—perhaps as successfully as Locarno. It assumes that somebody in the White House or State Department can calculate the consequences likely to come out of the explosive forces which are hidden in the civilizations of those immense areas.

Does anyone in this country really know what is going on in Europe, behind the headlines, underneath the diplomatic documents? Is it true, as French publicists contend, that the Pope, having blessed the triumph of Franco in Spain, is striving for a union of Fascist and other powers for the secret purpose of liquidating Soviet Russia? Has Russia just grounds for distrusting the governments of Chamberlain and Daladier? If Hitler and Mussolini are liquidated either by pressure or by war, will the outcome be a Victorian democracy, a communistic revolution, or a general disintegration? Are not the powers immediately and directly entangled in all this strife in a better position to adjust their disputes than President Roosevelt and his assistants in the State Department?

Even assuming that the United States ought to do its best to help the democracies in Europe and Asia, the Roosevelt policy is quixotic in that it does not look far beyond a temporary pacification—a pacification that might be affected by a mere show of force or by another war. It does not propose any fundamental adjustment in the economies of nations which would provide any guarantee of peace after the temporary pacification, either by pressure or by war. And if the United States really had the knowledge, good will, and intention necessary to construct a formula for such a permanent economic peace, it does not and cannot have the power to force it upon other nations. In my opinion it does not have the knowledge, the will, or the intention.

Hence, in my judgment, it is folly for the people of the United States to embark on a vast and risky program of world pacification.

We can enjoy the luxury of hating certain nations. We can indulge in the satisfaction that comes from contemplating a war to destroy them. We can rush into a combination that might temporarily check them. But, it seems to me, it would be wiser to suggest that those countries of Europe which are immediately menaced by Germany and Italy put aside their jealousies, quarrels, and enmities, and join in a combination of their own to effect control over the aggressors. If countries whose very existence seems at stake will not unite for self-protection, how can the United States hope to effect a union among them? After temporary pacification what? After war what? After peace what? To these questions the Roosevelt foreign policy makes no answer. And they are the fundamental questions.

The Roosevelt foreign policy is also quixotic because it is based on the assumption that the economy and democracy of the United States are secure, that our industry, agriculture, farmers, workers, sharecroppers, tenants, and millions of unemployed are safe, that the state of our public finances is impregnable, and that the future of our democracy is scatheless; so that we have the power to force pacification, self-government, and economic prosperity upon recalcitrant nations beyond two oceans. Is the management of our own affairs so efficient and so evidently successful that we may take up the role of showing other countries just how to manage their internal economies? Have we the economic and military power required to set their systems in an order to suit our predilections, even assuming that we could get wholehearted collaboration from the Tory Government of Great Britain, the reactionary Government of France, and the Communist Government of Russia? If the very idea of world economic pacification in such circumstances is not a dream of Sancho Panza, then I am unacquainted with Cervantes.

V

On what, then, should the foreign policy of the United States be based? Here is one answer and it is not exaggerated in any professor's study or supplied by political agitators. It is the doctrine formulated by George Washington, supplemented by James Monroe, and followed by the Government of the United States until near the end of the nineteenth century, when the frenzy for foreign adventurism burst upon the country. This doctrine is simple. Europe has a set of primary interests which have little or no relation to us, and is constantly vexed by ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice. The United States is a continental power separated from Europe by a wide ocean which, despite all changes in warfare, is still a powerful asset of defense. In the ordinary or regular vicissitudes of European politics the United States should not become implicated by any permanent ties. We should promote commerce, but force nothing. We should steer clear of hates and loves. We should maintain correct and formal relations with all established governments without respect to their forms or their religions, whether Christian, Mohammedan, or Shinto, or what have you. Efforts of any European powers to seize more colonies, or to oppress independent states in this hemisphere, or to extend their system of despotism to the New World will be regarded as a matter of concern to the United States as soon as they are immediately threatened and begin to assume tangible shape.

This policy was stated positively in the early days of our Republic. It was clear. It was definite. It gave the powers of the earth something they could understand and count upon in adjusting their policies and conflicts. It was not only stated. It was acted upon with a high degree of consistency until the great frenzy overtook us. It enabled the American people to go ahead under the principles of 1776, conquering a continent and building here a civilization which, with all its faults, has precious merits for us and is, at all events, our own. Under the shelter of this doctrine, human beings were set free to see what they could do on this continent, when emancipated from the privilege-encrusted institutions of Europe and from entanglement in the endless revolutions and wars of that continent.

Grounded in strong common sense, based on deep and bitter experience, Washington's doctrine has remained a tenacious heritage, despite the hectic interludes of the past 50 years. Owing to the growth of our Nation, the development of our own industries, the expulsion of Spain from this hemisphere, and the limitations now imposed upon British ambition by European pressures, the United States can pursue this policy more securely and more effectively today than at any time in our history. In an economic sense the United States is far more independent than it was in 1783, when the Republic was launched and, what is more, is better able to defend itself against all comers. Why, as Washington asked, quit our own to stand on foreign ground?

This is a policy founded upon our geographical position and our practical interests. It can be maintained by appropriate military and naval establishments. Beyond its continental zone and adjacent waters, in Latin America, the United States should have a care; but it is sheer folly to go into hysterics and double military and naval expenditures on the rumor that Hitler or Mussolini is about to seize Brazil, or that the Japanese are building gun emplacements in Costa Rica. Beyond this hemisphere, the United States should leave disputes over territory, over the ambitions of warriors, over the intrigues of hierarchies, over forms of government, over passing myths known as ideologies—all to the nations and peoples immediately and directly affected. They have more knowledge and power in the premises than have the people and Government of the United States.

This foreign policy for the United States is based upon a recognition of the fact that no kind of international drum beating, conferring, and trading can do anything material to set our industries in full motion, raise the country from the deeps of the depression. Foreign trade is important, no doubt, but the main support for our American life is production and distribution in the United States and the way out of the present economic morass lies in the acceleration of this production and distribution at home, by domestic measures. Nothing that the United States can do in foreign negotiations can raise domestic production to the hundred billions a year that we need to put our national life, our democracy, on a foundation of internal security which will relax the present tensions and hatreds.

It is a fact, stubborn and inescapable, that since the year 1900 the annual value of American goods exported has never risen above 10 percent of the total value of exportable or movable goods produced in the United States, except during the abnormal conditions of the war years. The exact percentage was 9.7 in 1914, 9.8 in 1929, and 7.3 in 1931. If experience is any guide, we may expect the amount of exportable goods actually exported to be about 10 percent of the total, and the amount consumed at home to be about 90 percent. High tariff or low tariff, little Navy or big, good-neighbor policy or saber-rattling policy, hot air or cold air, this proportion seems to be in the nature of a fixed law, certainly more fixed than most of the so-called laws of political economy.

Since this is so, then why all the furor about attaining full prosperity by increasing our foreign trade? Why not apply stimulants to domestic production on which we can act directly? I can conceive of no reason for all this palaver except to divert the attention of the American people from things they can do at home to things they cannot do abroad.

In the rest of the world, outside this hemisphere, our interests are remote and our power to enforce our will is relatively slight. Nothing we can do for Europeans will substantially increase our trade or add to our, or their, well-being. Nothing we can do for Asiatics will materially increase our trade or add to our, or their, well-being. With all countries in Europe and Asia, our relations should be formal and correct. As individuals we may indulge in hate and love, but the Government of the United States embarks on stormy seas when it begins to love one power and hate another officially. Great Britain has never done it. She has paid Prussians to beat Frenchmen and helped Frenchmen to beat Prussians, without official love or hatred, save in wartime, and always in the interest of her security. The charge of perfidy hurled against Britain has been the charge of hypocrites living in glass houses while throwing bricks.

Not until some formidable European power comes into the western Atlantic, breathing the fire of aggression and conquest, need the United States become alarmed about the ups and downs of European conflicts, intrigues, aggressions, and wars. And this peril is slight at worst. To take on worries is to add useless burdens, to breed distempers at home, and to discover, in the course of time, how foolish and vain it all has been. The destiny of Europe and Asia has not been committed, under God, to the keeping of the United States; and only conceit, dreams of grandeur, vain imaginings, lust for power, or a desire to escape from our domestic perils and obligations could possibly make us suppose that Providence has appointed us his chosen people for the pacification of the earth.

And what should those who hold to such a continental policy for the United States say to the powers of Europe?. They ought not to say, "Let Europe stew in its own juice; European statesmen are mere cunning intriguers; and we will have nothing to do with Europe." A wiser and juster course would be to say: "We cannot and will not underwrite in advance any power or combination of powers; let them make as best they can the adjustments required by their immediate interests in Europe, Africa, and Asia, about which they know more and over which they have great force; no European power or combination of powers can count upon material aid from the United States while pursuing a course of power politics designed to bolster up its economic interests and its military dominance; in the nature of things American sympathy will be on the side of nations that practice self-government, liberty of opinion and person, and toleration and freedom of thought and inquiry—but the United States has had one war for democracy; the United States will not guarantee the present distribution of imperial domains in Africa and Asia; it will tolerate no attempt to conquer independent states in this hemisphere and make them imperial possessions; in all sincere undertakings to make economic adjustments, reduce armaments, and cooperate in specific cases of international utility and welfare that comport with our national interest, the United States will participate within the framework of its fundamental policy respecting this hemisphere; this much, nations of Europe, and may good fortune attend you."

VI

Some of our fellow citizens, of course, do not believe that America can deny or refuse to accept the obligation of directing world destiny. Mr. Walter Lippmann is among them. "Our foreign policy," he has recently said in a tone of contempt, "is regulated finally by an attempt to neutralize the fact that America has preponderant power and decisive influence in the affairs of the world. * * * What Rome was to the ancient world, what Great Britain has been to the modern world, America is to be to the world of tomorrow. * * * We cling to the mentality of a little nation on the frontiers of the civilized world, though we have the opportunity, the power, and the responsibilities of a very great nation at the center of the civilized world." These are ornate, glistening, masculine words, but are they true words, and what do they mean in terms of action?

America has "preponderant power." According to the most encyclopedic dictionary of the English language, "preponderant" means "surpassing in weight, outweighing, heavier; surpassing in influence, power, or importance." It is a word of comparison. If Mr. Lippmann's statement has a meaning that corresponds to exact usage, it means that America outweighs the rest of the world, surpasses it in influence and power. This, I submit, is false. Mr. Lippmann's "fact" is not a "fact." It is an illusion. America has power in the world, but it is not preponderant anywhere outside of this hemisphere. A lust for unattainable preponderance and a lack of sense for the limitations of power have probably done more damage to nations and the world than any other psychological force in history.

The same may be said of Mr. Lippmann's "decisive influence." Decisive means having the quality that determines a contest. There are some conceivable contests in which America could presumably exercise a determining power. Given the status of things in 1917, America probably did determine the combat outcome of the World War. But in fact America did not determine the larger outcome of the World War, either the little phase at Versailles or the multitudinous results that flowed from it. America certainly has influence in the world. Within its competence it may exercise a decisive influence in particular contests. But America does not have a decisive influence on the larger course of European and Asiatic history.

Mr. Lippmann says that America is to be "what Rome was to the ancient world." That sounds big, but the test of facts bursts the bubble. Rome conquered, ruled, and robbed other peoples from the frontier in Scotland to the sands of Arabia, from the Rhine to the Sahara, and then crumbled to ruins. Does anybody in his right mind really believe that the United States can or ought to play that role in the future, or anything akin to it? America is to be "what Great Britain has been to the modern world." Well, what has Great Britain been to the modern world? Many fine and good things, no doubt. But in terms of foreign policy, Britain swept the Spanish, the Dutch, the French, and the Germans from the surface of the seven seas. During the past 300 years Britain has waged numerous wars on the Continent to maintain, among other things, the balance of power. Britain has wrested colonies from the Spanish, the Dutch, the French, and the Germans; has conquered, ruled, and dictated to a large part of the globe. Does anyone really believe that the United States can or ought to do all these things, or anything akin to them?

Mr. Lippmann's new brew of Roman grandeur and British philanthropy is of the same vat now used by British propagandists in appealing to Americans who have a frontier mentality. These propagandists have at last learned that, between the submarine and airplane on the one side and events in Russia, Germany, and Italy on the other, the jig is up for British imperial dictatorship in the old style. So they welcome the rise of the United States as a sea power to help maintain security and order, that is, the British Empire. With this, for obvious reasons, French propagandists agree. But Americans who are bent on making a civilization in the United States and defending it here will beware of all such Greeks bearing gifts and set about their own work on this continent.

Is this retreat or cowardice? Walter Lippmann says that Americans are suffering from "a national neurosis," defeatism, and "wishing to escape from their opportunities and responsibilities." In my opinion the exact opposite is the truth. American people are resolutely taking stock of their past follies. Forty years ago bright young men of tongue and pen told them they had an opportunity and responsibility to go forth and, after the manner of Rome and Britain, conquer, rule, and civilize backward peoples. And the same bright boys told them that all of this would "pay," that it would find outlets for their surpluses of manufactures and farm produce. It did not. Twenty-two years ago American people were told that they were to make the world safe for democracy. They nobly responded. Before they got through they heard about the secret treaties by which the Allies divided the loot. They saw the Treaty of Versailles which distributed the spoils and made an impossible peace. What did they get out of the adventure? Wounds and deaths. The contempt of former associates—until the Americans were needed again in another war for democracy. A repudiation of debts. A huge bill of expenses. A false boom. A terrific crisis.

Those Americans who refuse to plunge blindly into the maelstrom of European and Asiatic politics are not defeatist or neurotic. They are giving evidence of sanity, not cowardice; of adult thinking as distinguished from infantilism. Experience has educated them and made them all the more determined to concentrate their energies on the making of a civilization within the circle of their continental domain. They do not propose to withdraw from the world, but they propose to deal with the world as it is and not as romantic propagandists picture it. They propose to deal with it in American terms, that is, in terms of national interest and security on this continent. Like their ancestors who made a revolution, built the Republic, and made it stick, they intend to preserve and defend the Republic, and under its shelter carry forward the work of employing their talents and resources in enriching American life. They know that this task will call for all the enlightened statesmanship, the constructive energy, and imaginative intelligence that the Nation can command. America is not to be Rome or Britain. It is to be America.

America's Stake in the Pacific

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ADDRESS OF GOV. CHARLES A. SPRAGUE, OF OREGON

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, the Governors' Conference met recently at Boston, Mass., and Oregon's Governor, the Honorable Charles A. Sprague, delivered an address at that conference on July 2 entitled "America's Stake in the Pacific." I ask leave to extend my remarks and to include therein the address of Governor Sprague. It follows:

It was just a little over a year ago that the second world war, which had been referred to with a degree of taunt as a phony war in its first winter, exploded with unexpected fury in the north and west of Europe. The 1940 conference of governors, meeting at the height of the smiting blitzkrieg and on the eve of the capitulation of France, registered the degree of shock affecting this country when it adopted a statement pledging for each State its agricultural, industrial, and military resources for the adequate and effective defense of the United States. Dunkerque and the exposure of Great Britain to invasion produced a measure of panic here. There was a hasty muster of men and might, a swift appraisal of our military hazards.

While immediate apprehension of possible British collapse subsided as the R. A. F. fended off the Nazi bombing fleets and blasted enemy debarkation points, our fears have risen again with the reverses in the Mediterranean theater, with the threat of the Axis to pull the drawstrings at Gibraltar and Suez, and with the terrible toll of shipping in the battle of the Atlantic. Our Government has secured bases outside its territory from Greenland to Trinidad, and the President has made it plain that on any provocation our armed forces will move to prevent such potential outposts as the Azores, Cape Verde, and Canary Islands from falling into the hands of the Axis. Time and again attention is called to the fact that it is but 1,800 miles from Dakar to Natal, the clear meaning being that from the former as a base enemy operations might be extended to South America and a foothold gained in this hemisphere.

The declared military policy of this Government has been hemisphere defense. While if necessary that policy would be enforced unilaterally, on the basis of the Monroe Doctrine, our diplomacy has moved with marked success toward consolidating hemispheric unity. This is the fruit of effort of our national administrations since the World War, and particularly of the present administration. We are carrying out elaborate plans, at very considerable cost in money, to solidify all American nations in opposition to the axis.

Coming as I do from the Pacific coast, and representing a State fronting on the Pacific Ocean, I wish to report that we of the West understand your exposures on the east and south. My own sentiment, which I believe reflects that of the majority of the people along the western coast, is one of approval of the administration's policy of assistance to Great Britain, of unqualified opposition to the Nazi-Fascist-Communist ideologies, of protection of American shipping on the high seas, and of securing South American cooperation. I desire, however, to direct your attention to our national interest in the Pacific. This is not to distract you from the Atlantic theater, for we recognize that the preservation of Great Britain is the major political and military objective. Nor is it to promote a provincial viewpoint, that of the Pacific coast. Rather my purpose is to inform you of the magnitude of our national stake in the resolution of the present struggle for power in the Far East.

In that theater Japan is endeavoring to impose by force "a new order in Asia." Japan, in fact, is the original aggressor following the establishment of the League of Nations, the signing of the Nine Power Treaty (1922), and the Kellogg-Briand pact (1929). The first appeasement was Sir John Simon's refusal to go along with our Secretary of State, Henry L. Stimson, in denouncing Japan's seizure of Manchuria (1931–32). Italy, in its conquest of Ethiopia, merely imitated Japan; and Germany is now repeating on a vaster scale what its Axis colleagues once got away with. And Japan itself has steadily followed its own example. North China was seized in 1933, Shanghai and Nanking in 1937, Canton and the island of Hainan in 1938. The success of its Axis partner, Germany, over Holland and France, and the impairment of British strength now tempt Japan to launch a southward thrust to secure what is one of the richest natural areas on the globe, the lands rimming the bowl of the South China Sea. Japanese influence predominates in Thailand, French Indo-China is now well in the orbit of Tokyo. But Singapore bristles with British naval and military power; the Netherlands East Indies, loyal to Queen Wilhelmina, courteously declines to supply more oil to Nippon. The real brakes on the "southward thrust" are the presence of American naval power in mass at Pearl Harbor and of American fighting planes in the Philippines, and fear of Russia on the north. The expansion of Japan, which began with Formosa in 1895 and continued with Liaotung (Kwantung) in 1905 and Korea (Chosen) in 1910, has moved with swifter pace the past 10 years. If it can conclude successfully the "China incident" and gain control of southeastern Asia and its adjacent islands, then indeed Asia will be in the grip of a "new order."

Let me review the recent history of China. In brief, it is that of a nation, the oldest and most populous on earth, undergoing the travail of political, economic, and social revolution. Chinese insularity, which culminated in the Boxer Rebellion of 1900, at last yielded following the overthrow of the Manchu dynasty and the establishment of a republic under the enlightened Sun Yat-sen in 1911. The effort of Yuan Shi-kai to establish a military dictatorship in 1911 proved abortive; but the central government was weak; war lords ruled in the provinces; banditry was rampant; the infection of communism from neighboring Russia spread into China. The civil war of 1927 saw the Kuomintang Party emerge with Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek and his brilliant wife Madame Chiang (Mei-ling Soong) as leaders. They have commanded respect and established remarkable unity among the vast majority of the people of China.

In spite of the years of revolution and civil disorder the social revolution of China under the impact of western ideas has progressed with rapid strides. At its base was education of the masses inspired and directed by the graduates of colleges of this country and Europe and of schools established in China under western auspices. The present war has not retarded, rather it has accelerated the modernization of China, for it has driven industries, science, technology, medicine, and modern literature far into the interior.

But what, one may ask, has all this to do with the United States? Why, when our eyes are riveted on developments in Europe, should we pause to attend to what is happening on the other side of the globe? Here, fellow Americans, is the answer.

The swift ascent of the Axis Powers has given us alarm, not only that we might face a strong and hostile military alliance, but that we might be subjected to economic isolation in the event of Axis victory. We see the impossibility of maintaining an American standard of living where our free labor system, with high wages, is forced to compete with a barter economy and a compulsory labor system. That is one reason why we thrust our neighborliness upon South America, to save one continent which we may trade with. I would not discourage that effort, but I want to point out an alternate area where we may, if our affairs are properly ordered, preserve zones for friendly interchange. That area lies across the Pacific. To acquaint you with its importance let me give you some facts comparing the trans-Pacific region with South America which I am sure will surprise most of you. In the matter of distances, do you realize that the Panama Canal and the entire west coast of South America are closer to New York than they are to San Francisco and Portland, Oreg.? Yokohama is closer to Portland and San Francisco than Rio de Janeiro is to New York; and Shanghai is closer to our Pacific ports than Buenos Aires is to New York.

Compare the populations of the Pacific countries with those of South America. Exclusive of Siberia there are 952,719,000 people living in the former, east of 70 degrees east longitude, while there are only 92,997,000 persons living in South America.

In the matter of commerce our trade with the Far East greatly exceeds that with South America. I do not want to bore you with statistics, but here is the comparison of our total foreign trade with these regions for specific years:

	South America	Trans-Pacific
1913	$359,967,000	$482,699,000
1920	1,361,902,000	2,443,933,000
1930	764,957,000	1,850,570,000
1940	806,125,000	1,585,631,000

But America's stake in the Pacific is not measured alone by the volume of commerce. The commodities themselves are vital. Coffee, bauxite, nitrates, are the principal South American products which are essential and not easily obtainable elsewhere. The Pacific countries furnish us such strategic or necessary products as rubber, tin, tung oil, chromite, tungsten, silk, copra, jute and hemp, bristles. I quote from Robert Aura Smith's recent book, Our Future in Asia:

"Economically, southeastern Asia possesses world control of rubber and of tin; one-fourth of the world's oil; all of the world's manila hemp; all of the world's quinine; the major producers of the world's tungsten and antimony; the greatest exporters of rice; the world's control of copra and coconut oil; the largest chromite deposit and the sixth gold producer in the world. Those products of the southeastern Asiatic market comprise with its purchases a foreign trade of a billion and a half dollars annually."

Quoting again:

"When we thought of defending our trade relationships against outside invasion, we thought naturally of trade with South America. When we thought of penetration and aggression, we thought of Nazi deals with Brazil and Nazi plots in Uruguay. But while this was going on we were being faced with the equally dynamic threat to a political and economic position vastly more important than mere hemisphere defense.

"Our connection with southeastern Asia makes our ties to South America look like child's play. We buy more from three colonies on the South China Sea than we do from all of South America combined. While we contemplate lightly throwing away our Philippine position, our trade with the Philippines has systematically outranked our trade with Brazil, or Argentina, or any other South American country, for the last 15 years."

But there is more to exchange than copra and kettles, tea and petroleum. The culture of the Orient, Japan and China in particular, has long been a worthy import of occidental nations. Beside the mellow culture of China our own is almost an improvisation. We have much to give the Far East in modern technology; we can learn much from its peoples in art and philosophy.

If we make a realistic appraisal we must recognize certain factors of weakness in our policy of hemispheric defense. The military burden would fall almost wholly on this country; our Navy, Army, and air force would have to defend South America, a not inconsiderable task. With a lifeline to the Orient, however, we could under pressure retreat to the bulge of South America or to the Panama Canal. Even the loss of the Canal would not be fatal to this country when we have a two-ocean navy and an adequate air force and transcontinental motor highways to supplement the rails.

We must recognize that the present pan-American harmony is not of long duration. Fear and perhaps jealousy have made some of our western cousins refer to this country as the Colossus of the North. For most of the time since their colonization the South American countries have had as their cultural capitals Madrid and Paris and Rome, and London for a financial capital. In some respects the economics of North and South America are parallel rather than complementary. Europe should remain a leading market for the wheat, meat, and fruits of both hemispheres, and a supplier of manufactured goods to the Southern Hemisphere. With the Orient, on the other hand, products exchange more readily and with less competition. Japan, which is a real competitor, has long ranked first among Pacific countries in our foreign trade. Very important in this time of fears of isolation is the fact that most of the peoples of the Orient are friendly to the United States. Between this country and Japan there is still on both sides a popular friendliness even if relations are strained. With China there is a firm and long-standing attachment, which, if effectively served by us now, will give us an anchor in the Orient which the gales of Europe will not loosen.

The Monroe Doctrine, which has been the principal basis of our foreign policy since 1823, was adopted when our territory did not stretch to the Pacific, when the 24 States of the Union clustered east of the Mississippi except for Missouri and Louisiana. I propose no desertion of the Monroe Doctrine, now fortunately expanded into one of hemispheric cooperation; but I urge that our people recognize our outlook, our opportunity, and our hazard on the Pacific.

The Philippine Islands call for attention at this point. While under the terms of the Tydings-McDuffie law the Philippines are due to receive independence in 1946, it seems incredible that in the present state of upheaval they will be turned adrift without some protection from the United States. Certainly some arrangement should be made to protect our economic interests there. Besides being an important supplier of sugar and hemp and copra, the Philippines are extremely rich in vital minerals—gold, iron, chromite, manganese. We shudder over the scrap iron we have shipped Japan lest the stove lids and old mower wheels come back at us in bullets and bombs. If we let Japan get hold of the Philippine Islands we have given it a mineral storehouse of untold richness.

In part, our decision to retreat from the Orient was based on the difficulty foreseen of properly defending the Philippines against a strong foe with nearby bases. That may have been a correct appraisal up to a few years ago; but the scene has changed rapidly of late. European dislocations have forced British and Dutch outposts of empire into ready alliance with us for their self-defense. In event of trouble undoubtedly Singapore would be put at the disposal of our fleet, giving us with Pearl Harbor two of the strongest bases in the world.

The events of the present war demonstrate the potency of the air arm. Surely the Philippine Islands would afford adequate air bases to make our position there vis-a-vis Japan reasonably secure. Air power not only supplements, it extends the range of naval force. It is therefore proper to revise our military policy in the Far East by giving proper weight to the factor of aviation both for offense and defense.

The United States is forced by the current of events to consider its national security. We are spending billions on billions for the national defense, but it is of the utmost importance that we use brains in charting our policies. The mad race for power based on military might has gripped the world. Unless we are alert we may find ourselves if not defeated then isolated by Axis domination. We must at all hazards protect our line of communication with the Orient for the supply of such essentials as rubber, chromite, tin, tungsten, and hemp. If we permit Japan to consummate its "southward thrust," our line of supply is severed.

Our Pacific coast feels no immediate fear of invasion. Hawaii and Alaska with the Aleutian Islands will soon be bastions making a sustained trans-Pacific attack virtually impossible. But an enemy power controlling the vast resources of materials and manpower of the Orient and making military utilization of those resources would threaten this continent; yes, and this hemisphere for the indefinite future.

Fortunately this country has a Pacific policy whose abstract is clear from the famous note of John Hay in 1899, demanding an open door in China, to the decision of the Hoover administration not to recognize Manchukuo, the fruit of Japan's aggression in Manchuria. All that is needed is the determination to implement our Pacific diplomacy to make it effective.

I do not mean for this statement to be provocative as against Japan. We of the Pacific coast would hate to see an interruption of the long friendly commercial and cultural relations we have enjoyed with Japan. But in the present imbroglio our sympathies lie strongly with China, which has been ruthlessly set upon by Japan as aggressor. We should be ready in Asia, as in Europe, to make history record that the way of the aggressor is hard.

It is easy to work out a satisfying formula of appeasement for the Orient if we so desire. We might make a deal with Japan, and that has been proposed, in which we would bless with recognition and capital loans Japan's "new order in Asia." That might bring immediate gains. But I believe that in the end we will profit more and have greater security if China and Japan remain free and independent, and the balance of power in southeast Asia is not disturbed. Japan itself is bleeding economically. The "incident," expected to last 3 months, has lengthened into 4 years, with Chinese resistance growing. It is true that the Nipponese Navy blockades the coast, that armies of the invader hold the seaports and rail centers. But that control does not spread over the country even in occupied territory. Taxes are collected there which are remitted into Chinese treasuries. Cooperatives deep in the interior are new sources of supply for arms, munitions, and manufactures. Guerilla bands make life miserable for Japanese garrisons. In truth, Japan has bogged down in China, with no important advances, save in the southeast, in the past 2 years. Give China time and supplies and it should ultimately regain much of its lost territory. Unless Japan soon can consummate its ambitions in China or the southeast, it would be better off to liquidate the "incident" and seek through peaceful means to rebuild its economy and reestablish its prestige. We of the west hope sincerely that this undeclared war will terminate without sacrifice of the integrity of Chinese territory and yet without undue humiliation to Japan.

The imminent danger is that Japan in desperation may gamble for the high stake of power in the Far East. It may see in the involvement of Germany and Russia an opportunity either to displace Russia in eastern Siberia or Mongolia and thus make its northern flank secure. Or it may make the long-threatened thrust toward the Dutch East Indies and Singapore. If the latter is attempted then American naval action is clearly warranted in protection of our national interests and in support of British and Dutch interests in that area. Germany or Japan or both standing at Bering Strait in northeastern Siberia would jeopardize our Pacific security.

I offer no criticism of our Government's policy in the Pacific. It is informed, definite, and I believe will be vigorous. There should be no appeasement with Japan; there should be continued and expanded aid to China; there should be no precipitate action on our part to provoke warfare with Japan. We should work out a better solution of the status of the Philippine Islands than the hazardous independence now scheduled for 1946, a solution which will give Filipinos the substance of free government under American protection; and will give us an advance base by which, in cooperation with other free powers, we may preserve economic freedom in the Far East.

The working out of the details of this policy must be left to our Government, which alone knows the factors of relative strength and weakness and best can weigh the effects of affirmative action. Decisions on such matters as embargoes should be left to competent governmental authority. The prime need is for popular understanding of the problems of the Pacific; so there may be, on the part of our Government, neither lethargy nor hesitancy through fear if a time for action arrives.

Europe may be destroying herself. The Battle of the Atlantic may end in the dawning of the era of the Pacific. The United States, its territory astride the North American continent, faces both oceans. Its policies must face the realities in both basins; and so must its armies and its navies.

The Problem of Steel Supply

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES I. FADDIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ADDRESS OF WALTER S. TOWER, PRESIDENT, AMERICAN IRON AND STEEL INSTITUTE

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Walter S. Tower, president, American Iron and Steel Institute, before the annual meeting of the purchases and stores division of the Association of American Railroads, at Chicago, Thursday, July 10, 1941:

When your eminent chairman invited me to speak here today, he did not prescribe any topic. I carefully avoided the question, for fear that I might not get the right answer.

You will all agree, I believe, that making speeches, especially in these days, is risky business. If one sticks to history, no one is interested. It is all out of date. If one tries to probe the future, the swift turn of events tomorrow may discredit every diagnosis.

And yet, as I told your chairman, you are too important to the steel industry for me to refuse to run that risk.

It seems to me safe to assume that you have more than a passing interest in steel. In fact, I have often heard it said that you do not hesitate to remind steelmakers of the attractive size of your annual purchases. I suspect that steel men may, in turn, call your attention to the desirable volume of their shipments.

Thus is created a basis for perfect understanding.

For that reason, I want to cover some aspects of the steel industry in which I hope you may be interested. I refer to such matters as supply, delivery, price, which normally concern purchasing agents of all important industries.

Let me take the question of supply first, because, in theory at least, the adequacy of supply is supposed to affect both delivery and price. Much publicity has been given in recent weeks to three items concerning steel supply. First, there was much commotion over the tonnages which would be needed for prospective expansion of shipbuilding and car-building programs. Next came the report to the President by Gano Dunn suggesting possible shortages in total steel supply both this year and next, if one accepts unmodified the estimates of requirements that were the basis of his calculations. And then we read of "a 10,000,000-ton steel expansion program," as if all the details were in blueprints, ready for placing contracts.

A few basic facts may help in appraising these items.

Rated steel-making capacity today is more than 85,000,000 net tons of ingots in a year. Next year it will be substantially more. If pushed by stern necessity for the last available ton, the industry as it now stands probably could make at least 87,000,000 tons in 12 months, provided there were no interruptions in flow of materials and supply of labor. So far this year, and it its half gone, actual output has been at the rate of about 82,000,000 tons, with no record of important lack of steel for any essential industry. Some users for civilian purposes have taken record-breaking quantities. Competent outside observers come to the conclusion that production has been consistently ahead of actual consumption. Inventories are reported to be still on the increase, and probably at the highest level ever known.

The first charge against the present potential supply is for enough tonnage to meet all domestic military uses, including Army, Navy, and Maritime Commission programs. Close beside that comes the tonnage which we are committed to furnish for Britain and Canada. For this calendar year, 1941, according to current official estimates and reports, those two items, defense program and British-Canadian tonnages, represent an ingot equivalent of not more than 18,000,000 tons. For the calendar year 1942, the current estimate for our own program is a little larger. The British need next year is still uncertain, but is hardly likely to expand very much, when the limiting factor of shipping space is considered.

Available facts, therefore, justify the belief that both in this year and in 1942 there will be fully 67,000,000 tons of steel-making capacity which can be used for domestic civilian consumption and for whatever exports may seem desirable to countries other than Britain and Canada.

Such other exports are not likely to call for more than 3,000,000 tons of ingots, leaving a minimum of 64,000,000 tons for domestic civilian uses. This country has never in any year been able to use any such quantity of steel. Even in 1940 total domestic consumption including defense and civilian uses was only 55,000,000 tons.

But, say the prophets of scarcity, national income will rise to unheard of levels, and the resulting demand for steel will be terrific. The broad answer to them is that the theory of intimate connection between national income and demand for steel is not sound, and it is particularly unsound under the distorted conditions of wartime economy.

So far there have been no figures offered by anyone to show that maximum defense requirements will amount to more than a minor fraction of total ability of the industry to produce steel. Nor is there any basis in facts for expecting that civilian consumption of steel products will take more than will be available, after the needs of the defense program have been satisfied.

A careful reading of the recent report to the President by Gano Dunn reveals the conclusion that in his considered opinion, after studying the subject intensively for several months, expansion of steel-making capacity is not now justified beyond the normal and natural increase which is always going on in the industry, plus certain special additions, like electric furnaces, to meet specific defense requirements.

Any other conclusion, I think, is untenable because it must be based on the theoretical assumption that requirements for nonmilitary uses will soar to fantastic levels. Instead of an orgy of consumption, some sacrifice by everyone is the likely price of the job that this country faces.

Dunn's report itself, I believe, is more than liberal in respect to the assumed figure of steel likely to be needed for civilian uses. In arriving at his final estimate Dunn took a compromise figure halfway between a higher estimate and a lower one, both from outside sources. Even the lower of the two estimates which he quotes does not take fully into account the restrictive influences on steel consumption which are bound to operate before the end of 1942.

Under that head I would include scant supply of various materials, like zinc, nickel, tin, used in making important types of finished steel; diversion of skilled labor and plant facilities to production for defense; higher prices for many consumer goods; the burden of greatly increased taxes; disorganized world markets for all kinds of products; curtailed shipping facilities; and the like.

It is quite true that some additional equipment for finishing and for specially treating steel products may be required in order to meet all the needs of the defense program. In fact, members of the industry are installing such facilities as rapidly as they get the necessary information as to what is needed. That, however, is a problem quite separate from a wholesale increase of basic steel-making capacity.

But in the face of all these facts, and having in mind the ship-building and car-building programs, you may say, "Yes; plenty of ingots, but how about plates?" the chief form of steel needed both for ships and for cars.

I believe that the present program is to build about 170,000 cars over the next 18 months. With a liberal allowance of plates per car, the car program to the end of 1942 is likely to call for a maximum of about 1,500,000 tons of plates.

The shipbuilding program, naval and merchant, totals considerably less than 1,000 vessels on which any work is likely to be done before the end of next year. The principal cargo type, which is the largest single item in the program, takes about 2,100 tons of plates per vessel. Few of the craft, chiefly in the naval type, take more than 3,000 tons of plates per vessel. If the entire lot were completed by the end of next year, which now appears unlikely, even impossible, the tonnage of ship plates needed would not reach 2,500,000 tons.

For cars and ships the combined figures are not over 4,000,000 tons, over a period of 18 months. Existing plate capacity can turn out at least 7,500,000 tons in that time. Some changes in other mills, to adapt them for rolling car plates and ship plates, can, within 6 months, add a further yearly plate capacity of 1,500,000 to 2,000,000 tons. With those additions, plate capacity will be much more than double the prospective needs of the two programs for cars and ships.

In tying these figures back to ingot supply, it is important to remember that all of the tonnage of ship steel was included in the estimate for military requirements, taken as the first charge against capacity. The car tonnage comes out of the 64,000,000 pot for civilian uses, and in terms of ingot equivalent, plates for the car program are equal to only a little more than 2 percent of that pot.

It should be evident from these facts that anxiety about supply of plates for vital needs is exaggerated. The real problem is to get all essential needs translated from broad generalities into specific details as to descriptions, delivery dates, and orders. When the mills know precisely what the job is, they will find the answer of how to do it.

The case of plates, in which you happen to have a special interest, is basically typical of other kinds of steel products. I do not claim, nor do I think anyone in the industry would claim, that the industry can make all the steel which everyone might like to buy for early delivery. But I do say, and I think everyone in the industry will agree, that the industry can make all the steel which anyone may need to use, provided buying is orderly and in proportion to what is currently going into actual consumption.

As you all know, an appearance of shortage can quickly be created by a sudden general clamor for immediate deliveries. It is perhaps a natural trait to try to protect one's own position as far ahead as possible. But unless actual and continuing physical shortages are in prospect, the only sound reasons for extensive anticipation of remote future needs must be either price or delivery.

In respect to the future price of steel products, I think you know as much as anyone. If official policy is to be taken at face value as stated, a continued relative stability of steel prices can be confidently expected. In fact, insofar as may be consistent with the need for maximum output and the costs of production, such stability of prices is highly desirable. We all know that the menace of fatal inflation hovers over this country. If it is to be avoided, costs and prices, Siamese twins of the industrial world, cannot be allowed to run away.

As men carrying responsibility for buying many millions of dollars' worth of steel, you are for the moment, I suspect, more than ordinarily free from any pressing concern about possible adverse price movement for steel products. However, I think it is fair to raise the question whether higher prices in general can be avoided, if wage increases are encouraged and basic prices for farm products are uncontrolled.

Like most buyers, I suppose your first motto is, "We must have the stuff now." But it is not in the nature of human affairs that the element of time can be ignored. Satisfactory deliveries are the joint product of good planning on the part of both buyer and seller. If a steelmaker asked one of your lines for a hundred of the extra long gondolas on less than a day's notice, he probably would be answered with a fishy stare. By the same token a buyer who wants steel must be willing to look far enough ahead, so that his suppliers may fit the desired tonnages into orderly and efficient production schedules.

The real answer to the problem of delivery is good scheduling. In the case of steel the first obligation is on the buyer. Until the buyer's wants have been made known, in all essential detail, the steelmaker has little notion about what he may have to furnish. When those wants are known in time to be combined in efficient mill schedules, satisfactory deliveries are the rule.

Right now, with demands on the mills being maintained at a level higher than ever experienced before, it is probably true that many more than a million transactions are being completed every month. The very small percentage of those transactions not completed on time is no more than the inevitable allowance for lack of perfection from which all heavy industry must suffer.

But some of you will ask, "How can we feel sure about deliveries, if there is to be a general shortage of steel, as suggested in the Gano Dunn report?" There are two possible answers to that question. The first is that the Office of Price Administration and Civilian Supply has issued an order giving preference to materials for car building and car repairs, over all other civilian uses.

We have already noted the generous size of the pot of steel for civilian uses. With that order from the Office of Price Administration and Civilian Supply, and such a pot, there is no shadow of doubt whatever that you will get yours in the amounts and the deliveries desired. Extended deliveries are not new to any of you who recall the years prior to 1930.

The second answer is that the alleged shortage is only on paper. No one can know in advance what the precise demand for steel will total in this calendar year. Much less clear is the prospect for 1942, although for both years the broad estimates of our military and the British needs are fairly specific and the totals are less than one-fourth of the steel industry's ability to produce.

With three-fourths of steel capacity available for nonmilitary needs, the question of whether it will be enough or too little has led to a lot of discussion. The best basis for a wise guess is past experience. The outstanding fact on that side is the failure to find any year of record when civilian uses of steel rose even close to the figure represented by three-fourths of present capacity.

As already noted, there are reasons for believing that production this year is outrunning actual consumption. Hence, unless the balance of the year holds something which we cannot now see, the figures that produce a shortage on paper are already proved misleading.

There is no sound factual basis for expecting a shortage of steel supply for any essential use. Deliveries of individual products may temporarily get congested, because of common striving for immediate shipment. But one fundamental fact must be remembered. Steel for civilian uses goes largely into durable and semidurable goods. In the nature of things the market for such goods presently tends to become saturated.

The automobile industry offers a good illustration. Leaders in that industry some time ago agreed to cut production in the model year beginning August 1. It is common knowledge, however, that the record-breaking volume of output during recent months could not be kept up indefinitely. With the average life of autos about 8 to 9 years, it is obvious that annual output at the rate of 6,000,000 cars could not continue forever. Auto makers themselves have been credited with the statement that letting nature take its course would lead to fewer units made next year. And the automobile industry is the greatest single user of steel. Its product is typical of the semidurable goods for civilian consumption.

If any acute condition in respect to steel supply is to be experienced, it is already close at hand because of the coincidence of various pressing demands for early delivery. Like a river in flood, that sort of demand rises rapidly to the crest, but it does not rise forever. Any shortage of steel for military uses can arise only from lack of materials like nickel or tungsten, or from lack of special processing facilities, for which there was no peacetime need. It cannot arise from lack of basic steelmaking capacity.

Any real shortage of steel for nonmilitary uses seems both unlikely and unnecessary. Should the unlikely happen, it will come early, it will be brief, and it can be dealt with only in one way; that way is temporarily to ration or to curtail the more dispensable uses. The machinery for such action already exists. It could be applied promptly. It should not be necessary to use it generally, or for very long in any case.

Any such condition, if it should happen, could not be dealt with by a program of wholesale expansion. Here and there, as I have pointed out, additions to steel-making facilities are under way all the time. Some important ones are due to become productive before the end of this year or in the course of 1942. But any large scale expansion must be a matter of many months to create. Probably very little of "the 10,000,000-ton program," which is referred to so blithely by the unknowing, could be realized within 2 years. In fact, the limiting item might prove to be the problem of getting the necessary ore shipped down the Lakes.

It has been estimated for example, that such a program of expansion would involve 30 new ore boats. If they were laid down as soon as ways were available, with none now vacant, they would not be ready for use before the opening of the Lake season in April 1943.

Is it strange then that members of the industry, before they accede to any such request for large additions to capacity, would like to know the answers to expansion where and for what? I do not know of any steel man who can answer the questions satisfactorily for himself. Members of the steel industry, as in every other industry, of course, will cooperate in doing everything possible to further the defense effort. But enthusiasm in cooperation is always stimulated by the feeling that the effort is worth-while.

Let me make one more point about this matter. From various quarters there is sharp criticism of the steel man's hesitation about plunging blindly into expansion of capacity. It is referred to as "temporizing with critical situations" and ascribed to fear of "post-war dislocations of our economy." I have read that in some places the opinion in respect to expansion of capacity borrows from the buyers' motto, "we must have it now," and adds "to hell with post-war consequences."

But I do not believe that the steel man's hesitation rises from purely selfish interests or concern about the future. No one knows better than he does that the steel industry is the very foundation of defense, as it is of peacetime economic progress. I believe the steel man is sincere and justified in his feeling that if he could be told what is expected of the industry, the industry could show how it can handle the job with what it now has. But, so far as I know, he has not been so told.

Let's forget the more distant future. Ignore the question of post-war consequences. Who knows when the war will end, or how any part of the world will then stand? Unless we are to be saved from world totalitarianism, it is idle for any industry now to worry about post-war problems. They would then all be answered for us. Let's deal only with the present problem.

That problem may be simply stated. The primary need is for enough steel for our own defense and for Great Britain. No one can question our ability to fill that need three or four times over. Beyond that comes the miscellany of nonmilitary demands. To satisfy them there will be available more steel than such demands have ever before taken in a single year. Only those who hold to purely theoretical expectations of a civilian spending spree can question the adequacy of that supply.

With a general practice of orderly buying there should be plenty of steel for all civilian needs, for as high a standard of living as this country has ever enjoyed. In the unlikely event that concentrated civilian demands should for a time outrun supply, the only effective solution would be in temporary rationing rather than in undertaking forced expansion. Such expansion would, in effect, amount to using the defense emergency for further penetration of the Federal Government into private industry.

All of the talk about alleged steel shortages and the need for more steel-making capacity has tended to blind the American people to the real proportions of the industry.

If it is true that the power of a nation to defend itself is measured by its capacity to make steel, then the people of this country are fortunate in the possession of an unequalled bulwark of security. The industry is turning out more steel than has ever been produced before in this or any other nation, and its total capacity today is nearly equal to the capacity of all the rest of the world combined.

I think one can say with every assurance that the railroads will be able to get all the steel they may need for the building of cars and for other essential uses. All that the steel industry asks is that it have your cooperation in orderly purchasing.

National Youth Administration in Southwest Washington

REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the National Youth Administration enjoys the confidence and respect of the people of my district in the State of Washington. Its services have been extended to every county to the benefit of both the youth, the agency or school served, and the entire community.

Since the agency has directed its efforts toward being of assistance in the national-defense program, hundreds of youths have received work experience which will be of benefit to them not only in this emergency, but after the emergency ceases to exist. The flexibility of the National Youth Administration program has permitted it to exist in every type of community in the Third Washington District.

In Thurston County the youth have been offered the opportunity to gain clerical experience by doing practical work in Federal, State, county, city, and public governmental offices. The work experience consists of all phases of office work, including typing, shorthand dictation, transcription, filing, reception and switchboard work, and social-service work. Some of the youth have gained experience in assisting school nurses in health examinations.

In one community I have in mind, high-school youngsters assisted in building a farm shop where the district lacked sufficient funds otherwise to secure these facilities, and in the evenings the youth attended classes in repair and upkeep of farm machinery as well as practical maintenance experience in plumbing, heating, and electricity. One group of young folks gained experience in the State patrol machine shop in the maintenance of radio apparatus in patrol cars.

A traveling N. Y. A. crew exists within Mason County. This group consists of 30 boys who travel to job locations at various rural schools and perform improvements on city and Federal property. Recently the crew completely remodeled a recreation hall on the Skokomish Indian Reservation.

In Grays Harbor County the National Youth Administration has 30 boys employed in the carpenter shop which is completely equipped with all hand tools and power machinery necessary to produce woodworking, cabinet work, and carpentry of all types. The girls have a project on which they gain work experience in the making of clothing, house linens, rugs, and so forth. A great deal of work has been accomplished for the American Red Cross, all of which is for domestic consumption. Also, a traveling crew is maintained in this country to serve the rural areas.

Blacksmithing, welding, and sheet-metal experience is gained in the shop in Lewis County. At the present time the youth are engaged in producing metal signs of all shapes and sizes for the cities of Chehalis and Centralia.

In Clark County the metal shop has been producing such items as iron park benches, reflectorized signs, chisels, punches, welding tables, nail and rivet sets, and warning signs for school crossings. The mayor of Vancouver, city council, and other city officials have all expressed their amazement at the work that can be turned out by inexperienced youth. For the parks the N. Y. A. youth are producing picnic tables, benches, and open-air kitchens. Nearly all the materials used are found in the parks. The material includes peeled logs for buildings, stone for fireplaces and decorative work, and cedar shakes for the roofs.

The activities of the National Youth Administration are too numerous throughout my district to mention individually. In addition to all the work experience given, the opportunity for related training is offered to the youth whereby they receive special instruction.

I am extremely proud of the results obtained by the youth workers in my district and the administration of George P. Sheridan in charge of the N. Y. A. in the State of Washington has won the complete confidence of my constituents. I am happy to report that the turn-over in the number employed is approximately 25 percent each month, with most of these obtaining private employment as a result of the work experience gained with the N. Y. A.

Amendment of Selective Training and Service Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration, entitled "An act to authorize the deferment of men by age group or groups under the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940," embraces more than one subject.

By section 1 it provides that "men who, on the 1st day of July 1941, or on the 1st day of July of any subsequent year," are liable for training and service under the Selective Service Act of 1940, (2) and who have not been inducted into the land or naval forces for such training or service, and (3) are 28 years of age, shall be deferred from training and service under the Selective Service and Training Act in the land and naval forces of the United States until Congress shall declare otherwise. To the enactment of this provision of the proposed law there is virtually no opposition. I shall vote for it and I urge every Member of the House to support it.

But the proposed act goes further than this. It proposes to enact into law, under the deceptive and misleading caption of the act, drastic provisions for the seizure of private property and for the use of the armed forces of the United States in labor disputes.

Section 2 of the bill reads as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 9 of the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940 is hereby amended by adding thereto the following new paragraph:

"Refusal in any labor dispute to utilize existing Government conciliation and mediation facilities in an effort to settle such dispute on the part of any individual, firm, association, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry or the responsible head or heads thereof owning or operating any such plant or industry with which an order has been placed for defense materials shall be construed as a refusal under the foregoing provisions of this section."

This section of the bill, under the provisions of section 9 of the original Selective Service and Training Act, authorizes the President, through the War or Navy Departments, to seize possession of any plant in the Nation with which an order has been placed for defense materials. If this amendment to the original act becomes law, the President, through the Army and Navy, can seize the property of any citizen to whom has been awarded a contract for the production of defense materials, on the ground that such citizen, in the event of a labor dispute, has refused to submit such dispute to existing Government conciliation and mediation facilities in an effort to settle such dispute. This is an arbitrary power which the act proposes to delegate to the Chief Executive. It is violative of the letter and the spirit of the Constitution of the United States and of the Constitution of Tennessee, and, I believe, of the constitutional safeguards thrown around the property rights of their citizens by the Constitution of every State in the Union.

It overrides and nullifies the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the pertinent parts of which read as follows:

No person shall * * * be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

In keeping with the letter and spirit of this provision of the fifth amendment to the Federal Constitution, the Constitution of Tennessee provides:

That no man shall be taken or imprisoned, or disseized of his freehold, liberties or privileges, or outlawed, or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, or deprived of life, liberty, or property, but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land.

And—

That martial law, in the sense of the unrestricted power of military officers, or others, to dispose of the persons, liberties, or property of the citizen, is inconsistent with the principles of free government, and is not confided to any department of the government of this State.

And that—

The Declaration of Rights, heretofore prefixed, is declared to be a part of the constitution of this State, and shall never be violated on any pretense whatever. And to guard against transgression of the high powers we have delegated, we declare that everything in the Bill of Rights contained is excepted out of the general powers of the Government, and shall forever remain inviolate.

The committee reporting this provision of the act has publicly declared, and the evidence introduced before it on the hearing has warranted such declaration, that the citizens of this Nation owning and operating our industrial plants have whole-heartedly and loyally cooperated in the production of defense materials. The exact words of the committee are these:

From the evidence, it is apparent to your committee that private industry has, without exception, cooperated to the fullest degree with both the War and Navy Departments and all other agencies of the Government.

Section 3 of the proposed act adds a new section to the original act, which reads as follows:

SEC. 9 (a). That in the event of the stoppage of production through subversive influences or otherwise, not constituting a refusal under the foregoing provisions of section 9 hereof, of any article or material which may be required for national defense, or which may be useful in connection therewith, in any plant or industry, the President, if he finds that the exercise of such power and authority is necessary or desirable in the public interest, shall order such plant or industry to resume production immediately. The President shall have the power, through the heads of the War and Navy Departments, to enforce such order, and to afford protection to all persons engaged in the operation of such plant or industry who voluntarily desire to work in such plant or industry. Such power and authority as is hereby vested in the President may be exercised with respect to any such plant or industry only during the existence of a national emergency, or in time of war.

Nothing contained in section 9a hereof shall be construed to authorize the President or any Government agency to seize or operate any plant or industry or to give to any persons affected thereby, in any respect whatsoever, the status of Government employees.

No person who is separated from or refused employment in any such plant by reason of any such order or action by the President shall be entitled under any other existing law to any claim against his employer for time lost.

Under the language of this proposed section the President is authorized to seize the property of any citizen, even though the stoppage of production in such citizen's plant is brought about through no fault of his own. The loose language employed, "in the event of the stoppage of production through subversive influences or otherwise," makes it possible for the property of the citizen to be seized by the Government, through its armed forces, as the result of the illegal interference with the operation of such property by anyone, or on any pretense on the part of the Government whatever.

And the Government is empowered to order the owner of a seized plant to resume immediate operation of the plant, and to enforce such order against the owner through the armed forces of the Nation. The President, through the Army or Navy, can force a seized plant to resume operations, even though such operations may result in the plant's bankruptcy, and despite the fact that the employees refuse to work and render its successful operation impracticable or impossible.

Section 9 (b) of the proposed amendments provides:

SEC. 9 (b). (1) It shall be unlawful to prevent or to attempt to prevent, by force of violence or by threats thereof, any person from accepting or continuing in employment in any defense plant, or from entering or leaving any defense plant in the course of such employment. Nothing in this section shall limit the right of any person or organizaton to strike, or to engage in peaceful picketing.

This provision of the proposed act is unnecessary, for the following reasons:

In the report on this proposed measure made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, it is stated, with reference to the President's seizure of the California airplane plant, and its operation under the protection of the armed forces of the United States—

The President of the United States was required to exercise his constitutional power as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, but due to the fact that there is some question as to the power of the President under the Constitution to deal with such questions, it was thought wise by the administration and the War and Navy Departments that legislation make clear and unmistakable the right of the President to intervene in such cases, and therefore your committee, after hearings and careful consideration, has reported this bill.

Here is an admission by the committee reporting the bill that the President already has the power sought to be conferred upon him by this measure. In addition to this fact, section 51 of chapter 3 of title 18 of the United States Code Annotated (Criminal Code, sec. 19), provides:

It two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same * * * with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured, they shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than 10 years, and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to any office or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

Under this provision of the Federal law, which is now in full force and effect, it was held by the circuit court of appeals (229 Fed., p. 65), and which holding was approved by the Supreme Court of the United States (255 U. S., p. 568, 65 Law Ed., p. 794), that—

An indictment under this section, charging defendants with conspiracy to intimidate and oppress citizens in the exercise of their rights, and that in pursuance of such conspiracy they threatened and intimidated persons to prevent them from furnishing munitions, ships, and supplies to the Government for war purposes under sales, orders, and contracts, was held sufficient.

It is known to all of us that illegal interference with workers, through violence, threats, or intimidation in a defense industry is never the work of one individual. Such activities are the result of concerted action on the part of large numbers of individuals, and such concerted action on their part constitutes a conspiracy, and such a conspiracy to interfere with the right of a citizen to work is denounced as a crime by the above provisions of the law, and all those engaged therein, upon indictment and conviction, are subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 and imprisonment for a period of not more than 10 years, and such persons, when convicted, are rendered infamous and ineligible to hold any office or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

In addition to this, the laws of every State in the Union denounce such acts of violence against the person, rights, and liberties of the citizen as a crime, and those guilty of such a crime are punishable both by fine and imprisonment under the laws of the several States.

And, furthermore, this proposed seizure of the property of the citizen, and this attempted military coercion of the working people of the Nation, is uncalled for, unnecessary, and unwise at this time. I believe that these drastic provisions of the proposed measure are contrary to the sober, considered reason, judgment, and feelings of the great majority of the businessmen and laboring people of the Nation. Mediation and conciliation boards have been set up by the Government for the adjustment and settlement of industrial disputes. They are supported by the law and by the overwhelming weight of the enlightened public opinion of the country.

The Nation is not legally at war. Congress has not declared a state of war, and, under the Constitution, only Congress can declare war. If war is being waged, it is an undeclared war by Executive decree and by the ill-considered, intemperate, and violent declarations on the part of certain high officials of the Government and by a small minority in private life who are bent on dragging this Nation into this war. The great majority of the people do not favor the entrance of the Nation into this war.

It was Edmund Burke who said:

You cannot indict a state.

And we may well say that you cannot indict the American businessmen as a whole, nor can you indict labor as a whole. This legislation is provocative. It is a double-barreled assault upon American business and American labor. The thousands of patriotic, unselfish American businessmen who are devoting their life's savings, their energy, their ability, in the national interest should not be libeled with the provisions of this law. The millions of loyal American laboring men and women who, in the grime of the mine, the heat, dust, and uproar of the great manufacturing plants of the country, are driving the wheels of industry, naturally do not wish to carry on their voluntary and free labor under an act which questions their loyalty and their patriotism.

"You can lead a horse to water, but you cannot make him drink." Under our system of government there is no such thing as forced labor, except upon conviction for crime. We now have national unity on the question of national defense. The wrongs committed by the comparatively few recalcitrant businessmen and the comparatively few disloyal labor leaders and alien sympathizers in the ranks of labor should not be permitted to bring down this uncalled-for visitation of arbitrary miltary power upon the heads of the millions of loyal working men and women of the Nation. "Two wrongs do not make a right." This is no time to throw a monkey wrench, this is no time to put sand in the bearings of the industrial machinery of the country. If and when we go to war, and if and when we can no longer function as a free people under the law of the land, and we can no longer produce articles of defense except at the muzzle of a gun and the point of a bayonet, it will be time enough to resort to such legislation as this. It ought to be defeated because it withdraws from the businessmen and laboring people of the country the shield of the law's protection; because, in time of peace, it shuts the doors of the courts of the country, abrogates due process of the law, condemns without a hearing, convicts without a trial. By the terms of this force bill, in a star-chamber proceeding, where the accused is not present or heard, the citizens of the Nation, both businessmen and laborers, may be deprived of their property and liberty, by Executive decree, or, worse still, by decrees issued by martinets and bureaucrats.

This act constitutes the President and the Army and Navy accusers, prosecutors, judges, jurors, and executioners.

It is a dictator bill. And there is too much of that form of unrestrained power abroad in the world and in this land without further surrender to the executive branch of the Government.

For these reasons, the bill in its present form should be defeated, and I shall vote against sections 2 and 3.

Keep Our Boys Out of European War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FOREST A. HARNESS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ARTICLE FROM WABASH (IND.) PLAIN DEALER AND LETTER SHOWING FINAL POLL VOTE

Mr. HARNESS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Wabash (Ind.) Plain Dealer of June 3, 1941, and also a letter showing the final vote in the poll referred to:

[From the Wabash (Ind.) Plain Dealer of July 3, 1941]

KEEP BOYS OUT OF EUROPEAN WAR, SAY VOTERS

Overwhelming opinion of readers of the Wabash Plain Dealer and Times Star is that circumstances have not changed sufficiently to justify the sending of American boys to fight in Europe.

This belief was revealed Tuesday when the first tabulation of the poll taken among the Wabash city readers of the newspaper was completed.

Of the 2,350 ballots distributed inside Wabash, 712, or approximately 30 percent, have been returned at present, and additional returns are expected in the next day.

Each ballot contained answers for both the husband and wife, so that the 712 returned ballots contained a total of 1,306 votes which were divided as follows: "No," 85.5 percent; "yes," 11.5 percent.

The question asked was, "President Roosevelt and Mr. Willkie both promised last fall not to send American boys to fight in Europe unless the United States is attacked. Do you think the circumstances today have so changed as to justify a departure from these pledges?"

Of the 624 votes cast by men, 541, or 87.6 percent were "no," while 83, or 12.4 percent, were "yes."

Women readers showed greater opposition to the war trend, balloting 615 to 67 against any departure from the campaign pledges of last fall. The percentage ran 90.2 percent "no" and 9.8 percent "yes."

Among the comments written on the ballots by citizens, indicating the deep feeling that has been engendered by the war issue, were the following:

"Please publish these facts in the paper and let the people know how the United States stands. F. D. R. wants folks to think the Germans are coming."

"Why not let the President of the United States and Congress decide? I believe they understand what is needed better than either of us."

"While conditions have changed, it is always poor policy to make promises when one cannot control the conditions under which they are made."

"Both Roosevelt and Willkie have pursued a course that will inevitably lead to war. Millions of youths will be sacrificed to the gods of wealth."

"He (Roosevelt) is sure frightened by Hitler, ha, ha!"

"It seems funny to me that we send all the fools to the White House and leave all the smart men in Wabash as newsmen that can't run a little paper."

"We do not want to send our boys overseas. We did that once. We value their lives more than anything else."

"Absolutely not. This is their war, and we should keep out of it as far as sending our boys over there is concerned."

"Stay out of war."

"We will be left holding the bag after it is all over anyway, so why kill a lot of men on top of it."

"Hell, no."

"Wilson kept us out of war, so F. D. R. will keep us out? Nuts, let Britain get licked, then we get ours in the neck."

"The pledges were no good when they were made."

(Those voting in the poll felt free to express themselves, inasmuch as the ballots were unsigned.)

WABASH PLAIN DEALER,
Wabash, Ind., July 8, 1941.

Mr. FOREST A. HARNESS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HARNESS: The results on our recent war poll are as follows:

		Percent
Ballots sent out	2,350
Ballots returned	920	39.1
Total vote cast	1,682
Yes	196	11.6
No	1,487	88.4
Number of men voting	807
Yes	102	12.6
No	701	87.4
Number of women voting	876
Yes	89	10.1
No	786	89.9

In our June 3 issue we carried a story regarding the first tabulation. Enclosed is a marked copy.

Very truly yours,
LERA MAE DELAUTER, Secretary.

Old-Age Pensions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP A. BENNETT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

RESOLUTION OF THE TOWNSEND CLUB, OF CARTHAGE, MO.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the Record I include therein a resolution recently adopted by the Townsend Club of Carthage, Mo. I also request that a petition, accompanying said resolution, signed by 2,016 residents of Jasper County, Mo., and praying for passage of H. R. 1036 be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

To the Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

GREETINGS: The members of the Carthage Townsend Club, uniting in a plea that the Congress of the United States enact legislation providing pensions adequate not only for the American standard of living for the aged but as well, and more so, for national recovery, giving the youth of our land assured employment, have adopted the following resolution: That—

"Whereas the members of the Carthage, Mo., Townsend Club No. 1 are in all sincerity convinced that a uniform Federal pension for the aged, based on citizenship and the age limit, and not on conditions of need, should be enacted; and that

"Whereas the outstanding issues confronting our Nation today are the need of an efficient social-security program on a pay-as-you-go basis, the circulation of buying power constantly in every section of the country, and guaranteed jobs for the millions of our unemployed, principally of the younger generation; and that

"Whereas the answer to these perplexing problems is not readily to be found in the ability of the States to raise sufficient revenues to finance the distribution of the wealth necessary for the elimination of distress and for adequate national recovery; and that

"Whereas the Townsend bill (H. R. 1036) now in committee provides that a general Federal tax, known as the gross-income tax, be levied, the returns from which to be divided pro rata and paid to all eligible citizens of the United States who have reached the age of 60 years or over: Now and therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the members of the Carthage, Mo., Townsend Club No. 1, in regular session here assembled in the Jasper County Courthouse, Saturday afternoon, June 21, 1941, with the highest regard for the citizenry of our national legislative body, do appeal to the Congress of the United States to give earnest and conscientious consideration of our appeal that the principles of the Townsend bill (H. R. 1036) be enacted into a law of the land."

Praying for divine guidance.

THE CARTHAGE TOWNSEND CLUB,
HENRY EASSON, President.
MRS. FLORENCE GOULD, Secretary.

Addendum. These resolutions are accompanied by a roll of petitions representing an overwhelming voting strength in this community favoring the Townsend plan.

Federal Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. C. W. (RUNT) BISHOP
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, why is it so difficult to pin the national administration down on this important question: What is to be done about the thousands of unemployed in the United States, particularly in the face of predictions of sharply rising price increases?"

I have asked many persons in Government service just such a question, but I cannot get a logical, sensible answer.

We seem to be in a worse paradox than ever. During the depression there was a constant cry that people were starving in the land of plenty; that farmers' crops were rotting while people in the city, unable to find employment, were going hungry.

Now we have a spectacle in the greatest industrial activity in our national history, and in all important industrial key cities there is perpetual demand for more workers, skilled and otherwise. Meanwhile there are thousands of persons in countless American inland villages and cities anxious and willing to work and in these communities are many idle factories, with rusting machinery. If we had more common sense in our national-defense plan and less personality and statement making some of the important work could be assigned to these communities and these people.

But more important still is the question of how the poor are to cope with the rising prices. Leon Henderson, Federal Price Administrator, has told the press in Washington that living is bound to increase during the national emergency.

Many of the poor are able to eke out 90 meals per month, but with the prices rising they are confronted with the prospect of having fewer and smaller meals.

This is no theory developed by a dreamer sitting behind a mahogany desk in Washington—this is an actual fact and unless the Federal Government does something and does it definitely and quickly, it is not discharging its first obligation—of serving the people of our own land.

NORTH AMERICAN PLANE PLANT RETURNED TO PRIVATE OPERATION

By Executive order dated July 2, President Roosevelt directed the Secretary of War to return to Inglewood, Calif., plant of North American Aviation, Inc., to private operation. The Army took control of the plant by Presidential order on June 9, after other efforts to terminate a strike were unsuccessful.

CIVIL-SERVICE JOBS OPEN

Applications for the following positions can be had by writing to my office: Executive officer, $8,000; chief administrative officer, $6,500; principal administrative officer, $5,600; senior administrative officer, $4,600; administrative officer, $3,800; junior Public Health nurse, $1,800; farmer-fieldman, $2,600, and assistant messenger, $1,080.

ATTENTION BLONDES

The War Department announced human hair is not being purchased by the Army. The Department stated it had received many requests for information concerning the sale of human hair as a result of a newspaper story that blonde human hair was needed by the Army in the manufacture of certain instruments.

SILK STOCKINGS AND PERMANENT WAVES

O. P. M. Conservation Chief McConnell told his press conference that many luxury and common items will not be available to "both the rich and the poor" during the emergency. He said:

Silk used in parachutes will make silk stockings more scarce, women will have fewer permanent waves, cosmetics, and creams, because the ingredients are needed for national defense.

ICELAND

It is about the size of Kentucky, 40,000 square miles (only one-fourth habitable), mountains, lava fields, glaciers, and high plateaus sloping to coastal lowlands, no mineral resources, nearly all water power—estimated at 2,500,000 horsepower—remains unharnessed. Reykjavik, the largest city with a population of 36,100, is the capital. The entire population of 120,000, almost entirely of pure Scandinavian stock, literally lives off the seas, as fish and fish products constitute about 85 percent of all exports. Only about one-half of 1 percent of the total area is cultivated, and short summers limit crops largely to hay and potatoes; on large tracts of grass lands, sheep raising is important; altogether 36 percent of the population derives its living from agriculture, while 30 percent gets its living from the fishing and fish-products industry. The fishing trade was severely affected by the Spanish civil war; Italy, Spain, and Portugal took 52 percent of all Icelandic exports in 1929, but only 15 percent in 1939.

Based on figures for 1939, Iceland's foreign trade: Imports, $10,879,000, with 22 percent from the United Kingdom, 21 percent from Denmark, 16 percent from Germany; exports, $12,294,000, with 17 percent to the United Kingdom, 11 percent to Denmark, 11 percent to Germany, and 11 percent to the United States. Previously United States trade with Iceland was largely by transshipment over Hamburg and Copenhagen, but in November 1939 direct shipping connections were established.

TWENTY-ONE-YEAR-OLD DRAFTEES

Selective Service National Headquarters announced the 21-year-old men who registered for Selective Service on July 1 will be integrated for induction among previous registrants with order numbers larger than the last inductee of their local board, rather than placed ahead of or after the older registrants on their local-board lists. The new registrants will be integrated proportionately in the order to be determined by a national lottery to be held in Washington within the next few weeks, Selective Service Headquarters said.

WHEAT UNDER THE A. A. A.

The Department of Agriculture announced wheat farmers desiring to avoid payment of wheat-marketing-quota penalties by delivering excess wheat to the Secretary of Agriculture, may now deliver the actual wheat to the treasurer of their county A. A. A. committee, in cases where it is "impracticable to deliver the wheat to an elevator or warehouse and obtain a receipt." The regulations previously provided the farmer must first deliver the wheat to an elevator or warehouse, obtain a receipt, and then deliver this receipt to the treasurer of the county A. A. A. committee, the Department said.

UNCLE SAM'S POCKETBOOK

The official Daily Treasury Statement of June 30 showed the financial condition of the Treasury since July 1, 1940, to be:

Expenditures	$12,710,000,000
Receipts	7,607,000,000
In the hole	5,103,000,000

The gross Federal debt on that date was $48,961,443,535.

Your per capita share of that debt is $372.58.

MORE MONEY FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE

The House on Wednesday passed another deficiency appropriation bill calling for more than $800,000,000. Most of it is for national defense. The debate developed the fact that over 300 dollar-a-year men are working in the emergency production administration. Charges that they may represent big firms which get big contracts, are made. In private life they get from ten thousand to a hundred thousand dollars a year. For patriotic reasons, they work for Uncle Sam for a dollar a year. If their firms make excess profits, it is felt that taxes will even things up. Anyway one agency of government is now trying to stop these firms from raising prices and if they make big profits it will have to be on the basis of volume. To stop profiteering rackets which were prevalent in the last war, is a job which Congress has asked the administration to perform right now.

OFFICIAL VISITORS TO THE NATION'S CAPITAL

Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Bundy, Thompsonville; Harry Holland, Marion; Neil J. Robertson, West Frankfort; Evan M. Elkins and E. K. Elkins, Carbondale; Paul Bussler, West Frankfort.

Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY VARIOUS MICHIGAN ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a resolution adopted by the Exchange Club, of Pontiac, Mich.; Detroit-Strathmoor Kiwanis Club, Detroit, Mich.; Lincoln Park Exchange Club, of Lincoln Park, Mich.; Strathmoor Business Association, Detroit, Mich.; and the Bergian-American Business Men's Association, Detroit, Mich., urging the enactment of legislation which will bring about the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway:

Resolution to the Congress of the United States of America from the Exchange Club of Pontiac, Mich.; Detroit-Strathmoor Kiwanis Club, Detroit, Mich.; Lincoln Park Exchange Club of Lincoln Park, Mich.; Strathmoor Business Association, Detroit, Mich.; Belgian-American Business Men's Association, Detroit, Mich.

Whereas the Detroit industrial area and the State of Michigan are a part of the great midwestern section of our country in which 40,000,000 people live; and

Whereas a bottleneck of approximately 48 miles in the St. Lawrence River deprives the people of the United States of a direct outlet to the ocean; and

Whereas the deepening of the channel in the St. Lawrence River will enable us to make our full contribution to the needs of our Nation and to participate in the post-war program of world rehabilitation and stabilization; and

Whereas our national defense requires full utilization of the potentialities of the Great Lakes shipbuilding; and

Whereas investigation has shown that active shipyards on the Great Lakes could build and the proposed-deepened channel could pass all naval ships except battleships and airplane carriers; and

Whereas, the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River provide an unparalleled natural highway of 2,350 miles from the heart of our Nation to the Atlantic Ocean; and

Whereas a deep waterway from the heart of our industrial, mineral, and agricultural region is vital to our Nation and a bulwark of strength to our defense; and

Whereas engineering surveys made by our Government have approved the feasibility of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway project and forecast a benefit to the entire Nation; and

Whereas President Franklin D. Roosevelt, in his message to the seaway conference recently held in Detroit, called to the attention of the American people the importance of completing the St. Lawrence seaway as soon as possible, not only as a national-defense measure but as a means of bringing a new era to the country's most important agricultural and industrial regions: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Exchange Club of Pontiac, Mich.; Detroit-Strathmoor Kiwanis Club, Detroit, Mich.; Lincoln Park Exchange Club, of Lincoln Park, Mich.; Strathmoor Business Association, Detroit, Mich.; and Belgian-American Business Men's Association, Detroit, Mich., That we do formally and respectfully request the Congress of the United States of America to enact legislation which will bring about the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway; and be it further

Resolved, That a formally attested copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States of America and to the Michigan Senators and Representatives in our National Congress.

Respectfully submitted.

EXCHANGE CLUB, of Pontiac, Mich.
DETROIT-STRATHMOOR KIWANIS CLUB, Detroit, Mich.
LINCOLN PARK EXCHANGE CLUB, of Lincoln Park, Mich.
STRATHMOOR BUSINESS ASSOCIATION, Detroit, Mich.
BELGIAN-AMERICAN BUSINESS MEN'S ASSOCIATION, Detroit, Mich.

JUNE 30, 1941.

Rededication—July 4, 1941

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. GEORGE H. BENDER, OF OHIO

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the Mutual network on the evening of July 4, 1941:

This is the most critical Fourth of July since the year 1917. The difficulties which face our Republic cannot be exaggerated. Our people are standing on the brink of war, and the outcome of that war is shrouded in uncertainty. In our own country, we are troubled by divided counsel. The struggle between our national administration, pulling us toward direct involvement in wars across the oceans, and 125,000,000 people who do not want that war, is so tense that it can be felt everywhere. As we read the terrible headlines, we can understand why our people hesitate. The confusion of world affairs tells us to move slowly. Today's friends become tomorrow's enemies. Aid to suffering Finland has overnight become aid to aggressor Germany. Our policy toward Russia becomes more obscure than ever before. No wonder we are at a loss for words. No wonder the Nation is perplexed.

But there are still some truths to which we Americans can cling in this agonizing hour. Despite the cries of interventionists, isolationists, New Dealers, reactionaries, and all the rest, there is still something solid beneath our feet. This Fourth of July must serve to recall these things to mind.

Let us remember that no matter what tomorrow may bring, we still live in the United States of America. Our country was born from a deep-rooted abhorrence of all that Europe represented. It grew from roots watered by a determination to leave the hatreds of the Old World behind. It took its origin in a fierce struggle for human friendship, for tolerance, for the right to live as free men. We know that the narrowness and bigotry of old Europe was hard to escape. It cropped up again and again in the history of the American Colonies. But when those colonies had grown to manhood, when they brought forth their Declarations of Independence and their Constitution of the United States, the battle was won.

We have destroyed the last vestiges of tyranny which bound us to the slavery of Europe. Today the nations of the Old World are battling again. They are killing innocent men, women, and children by every foul means of which the human mind is capable. Hitler's divisions marching upon Stalin have cleared the atmosphere. They are not seeking to replace one system of life by another. It is no longer a struggle of totalitarians against free peoples. It is the same old story of world dominion. Men bent upon mastering the earth are marching hypnotized robots into the jaws of death.

We in America remember those marching armies. Those armies marched in Europe before our Declaration of Independence. We heard their echoes in our own country back in the days of the French and Indian War. We have heard them all too frequently since. Our country was forced into the Napoleonic wars in 1812. We were fighting European battles again in 1917. We may be fighting them again unless the American people decide the issue otherwise.

The Old World is determined to keep the new in its power. It does not easily relinquish its grasp upon our thinking. It is our task to see to it that the Western World does not surrender. This Fourth of July should be the day when all of us realize the distance which separates our continent from Europe. It is not a question of physical space. It is not the Providential blessing of the Atlantic and the Pacific of which we speak. Not these physical things, but the things that are of the spirit mark us as a people apart.

Today, on the holiday of our national redemption, everyone of us should reread the immortal documents of our history. Every one of us should seek to understand the meaning of our civilization. This is the only land in the world where men have conceived the ideals of our Declaration of Independence. Here alone is there a Nation which holds those truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Here is the land which long ago answered the challenge of totalitarian Germany, Russia, and Italy. On July 4, 1776, we told the world that governments are instituted among men to secure these rights; that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

Every charge which we can make against the dictators today was made in that Declaration of Independence. We submitted the facts to a candid world, and among those facts, the men who wrote our freedom into law told the world the story of our grievance.

The people of America did not stop with this statement of their troubles. They were so eager to assure themselves an end to the European system that they refused to ratify the Constitution until it had wiped out the last traces of the Old World. So few of us today remember the Bill of Rights. We know vaguely that they constitute a guarantee of our fredeom, but the words themselves should be part of our Fourth of July. These words were not the talk of idealists. They were practical terms, written by men who were talking specifically. Apply them to Europe today, and see how far apart our civilizations stand.

The first provision of the Bill of Rights once and for all time proclaimed that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. No European nation has ever known such freedom. No state on the continent has ever had a free press to speak its mind, to criticize the government, to protest against wrong.

The second amendment to the Constitution declared that a well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

No state in Europe would dare to place weapons in the hands of its people today. Houses are searched before the rulers of the state dare march through a street. Only in America does this freedom persist.

And to spare us the enervating influence of an army constantly engaged in politics, forever interfering with private affairs, the people of our early days wrote into the Bill of Rights their third amendment. No soldier shall in time of peace be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

How the suffering peoples of Europe and Asia would welcome a law like this today.

And how would they react to the fourth provision of our Bill of Rights. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized.

It is a far cry from the Gestapo of Herr Hitler or the Ogpu of Josef Stalin to the protection of these words.

And the sanctity of human life guaranteed by the fifth amendment to our Constitution strikes a note which separates us from Europe no less certain than the oceans. No person shall be held to answer for a capital or other infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

The right to speedy trial, to meet the witnesses face to face, to enjoy the privilege of trial by jury, to demand fair treatment and normal punishment—all these are the rights guaranteed the American people by the first 10 amendments to our Constitution. But our people were not content with these safeguards alone. They wanted to be sure that the powers they had seen abused by the governments of Europe were not abused here. And so they reserved for themselves in the last provision of the Bill of Rights, every power not specifically delegated to their Federal Government.

This was the structure of our New World. It cut a channel between our point of view and the system of Europe deeper than the Grand Canyon. There can be no compromise between the principles enunciated in the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution of the United States, and the hatreds, suspicions, and tyrannies of the Old World.

All these things are with us on this Fourth of July in the troubled year of our Lord 1941. They must continue to be with us, no matter what happens across the seas. For these are ideals which have become real. These are principles which have been translated into our daily lives. To defend them, everyone who glories in the name American would stand up and fight—not for the preservation of a feudal Europe, bent on self-destruction, not to perpetuate a system of hatreds which has driven men from their homes more than 200 times in 2,000 years of history to kill their fellowmen, but to keep this American way of living.

This is a day for rededication. It is a day for every citizen of America to reaffirm his loyalty to the traditions of our land. As we look across the seas, we know that we have achieved something which no other nation has ever known. Alone among the peoples of the earth, we are free. Free to think, to act, to speak, to write, to do as we choose to a greater extent than any other men and women in the history of mankind.

In this country, all of us agree on the basic fundamental principles which guide our lives. To Republicans, to Democrats, to political dissenters, the Bill of Rights must remain sacred ground. So long as America remains worthy of its name, these rights will continue inviolate. When once a political party challenges the validity of our basic freedoms, our Nation will cease to be America. By the grace of God, we trust and pray that our people will never alter the human guaranties which form our most precious heritage—freedom for all men.

Our people in America face many dangers on the Fourth of July 1941. There is the menace of physical warfare. But no less dangerous is the spreading danger of poisonous hatreds which engulf the world. Everywhere in the world, these poisons are pouring into the blood stream of unsuspecting men and women. America must fight this disease. Whether it calls itself fascism, nazism, communism; whether it takes the form of Berlin or Leningrad, tyranny is still the same. It crushes mankind everywhere. It destroys every value for which men live. It makes life barren and meaningless. Everywhere it moves it creates suspicion and animosity. People begin to regard their neighbors with suspicion. They look upon their fellow citizens with an eye to complaints. Human kindness crushed to earth is slow in rising.

Here in our free Nation we have built a household anchored in tolerance. That tolerance extends to all men who love this Nation. It reaches out to all those who come to our shores seeking the right to live in peace and happiness. Live and let live in America means live and help live. Perhaps we are still idealists in a world which looks with contempt upon ideals. But our ideals are not far above us. We have brought them out of the skies to dwell among men.

Today the idealisms of America are under fire. Europe never knew them. Yet Europe is seeking their destruction. Whatever may be the cost, we cannot permit that destruction.

On this Fourth of July, we in America owe a solemn duty to the world. Ours is not the cause of oppression. It is not the love of conquest. It is not the will to hate. We have might; we have strength. Within our armies lies the potential force of a resolute Nation. Our cannons can roar. Our planes can fly into the skies, unlimited in their numbers. Our ships can rule the waves.

We do not choose to terrorize the earth with the strength of our arms. We seek a different answer to the problems which assail the world. We visualize our Nation as the leader in a battle to reestablish the lost hopes and ideals of a peace-starved world.

Everywhere on earth today, men, women, little children have forgotten goodness. They have lost the memory of tolerance, kindness, justice, and love. Let it be said in the United States of America on this Fourth of July, on this anniversary of our freedom, that here we have not forgotten.

Ours must be the mission of peace. Each year on this day, we rededicate ourselves and our Nation to the preservation of freedom. That preservation may prove harder in 1941 than it has ever proven before. We shall not fail. This great Nation, the last outpost of true civilization, cannot fail because it must not fail.

Congress Should Act To Save the Legitimate Stage From Extinction in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

LETTER FROM EDMUND PLOHN, MANAGER NATIONAL THEATER

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Edmund Plohn, manager of the National Theater, Washington, D. C., who presents reasons why he believes H. R. 1047 should be passed by Congress:

NATIONAL THEATER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR REPRESENTATIVE RANDOLPH: Under the constitutional right to petition, I am addressing you in behalf of H. R. 1047, favorably reported by your House District of Columbia Committee, and awaiting some conclusion by the Congress.

In the present national emergency we all realize that essential defense legislation must hav the right-of-way, and that much of the time of a filling and patriotic Congress is devoted to imperative appropriation bills needed to carry out administration policy.

Consequently, we of the professional theater are indeed gratified that your committee has moved toward enactment a resolution which will help remedy a situation, slowly but surely strangling the so-called legitimate stage in Washington. Unless Congress furnishes relief, the stage—or that part of it we call the spoken drama—is threatened with extinction in the National Capital. It simply cannot survive with its main avenue of profit barricaded by a law, completely idealistic, and completely impractical in today's world.

As the only representative of the professional legitimate theater in Washington, I have a keen appreciation that the majority of Congress—in both the Senate and the House—are interested in the stage and its people. I know that in the promotion of the general welfare and morale they would not endorse a ruinous curb on any legitimate business or enterprise, nor one that adds to unemployment. Yet that is what the existing child-labor law, in operation and practice, imposes on the Washington theater.

It can only be regarded as regrettable that an amendment to the child-labor law which will lift this repressive influence should confront opposition which beclouds the real issue. Let us examine the situation from a realistic standpoint.

The condition which confronts the Washington theater with relations to bookings for the 1941–42 season opening in September is one that will recur frequently while we are prohibited from bringing in attractions which employ juveniles in the cast. There are at the present time in New York City five plays or musical comedies of such overwhelming popularity it is fair to assume, that they can look forward to highly successful engagements in those road cities which are permitted to book them. They are:

Life with Father. A delightful play by Russell Crouse and Howard Lindsay (founded upon Clarence Day's novel), which is in its second year on Broadway, ran a year in Chicago, and has enjoyed record-breaking engagements in Boston, Philadelphia, and Detroit. So clean it could be played in a Sunday school. Barred in Washington.

Watch on the Rhine. A play by Lillian Hellman, which won the 1941 Pulitzer prize and was also given the season's highest honors by the New York critics' circle. It was the ardent wish of Playwright Hellman to open this drama here, but because of legal curbs it was forced to play elsewhere.

Lady in the Dark. A musical play by Moss Hart, starring Gertrude Lawrence, and the outstanding hit of the late New York season.

Panama Hattie. The most successful of the 1941 musical comedies on Broadway, with a book by Herbert Fields and B. G. De Sylva, and music by Cole Porter.

Pal Joey. A George Abbott production of a Rodgers and Hart musical comedy, one of the reigning New York hits.

These are attractions of proven box-office magnitude, and it is a reasonable assumption that if they were shown in Washington they would attract widespread patronage. The receipts from these plays could well represent the difference between operating over the season at a profit, or facing a deficit. To deny them engagements here must inevitably involve dark weeks, meaning periods when the National Theater must be closed, with a consequent loss of employment to more than 60 of the personnel, back stage and front.

From the standpoint of Federal revenue, the legal barrier which prohibits these plays on the Washington stage denies the United States Treasury an estimated $25,000 or more in ticket-tax income. In these days when the national economy is being stretched to provide funds for all-out defense, and when Congress is studying every source and resource to bolster the national income, I submit this sum is worth consideration.

H. R. 1047, if and when passed by Congress, would alleviate a condition causing economic distress in the Washington legitimate theater. May I say that it was drawn up with the cooperation of Dr. Frank W. Ballou, head of the District of Columbia schools, and he approves its terms. It also has the endorsement of Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, who (in a January press conference) said: "That she felt that the law barring children from the stage in Washington should be modified, that children should be allowed to appear, provided there were certain requirements to safeguard their health and make it possible for them to continue their education."

It is the contention of the proponents of H. R. 1047 that the resolution provides the safeguards suggested by the First Lady, and the measure has the further endorsement of:

The National Child Labor Committee.
The United States Department of Labor.
The Board of District Commissioners.
The District Budget Bureau.
The District Corporation Counsel.
The District Bar Association.
The District Board of Education.

Now, I submit to the Members of Congress, that these organizations, and the people who voice their will, are as jealous as anybody in America that the health, the morals, and the general welfare of juveniles making their living in the theater, should be surrounded by every safeguard and zealously protected. Nor does the organized theater have any desire to do other than give them the most elevating environment. Any study of testimony taken at the hearings on these measures will reveal that the average child of the stage is well cared for in the matter of education and moral surroundings. Usually their parents travel with them. As a rule they are especially gifted or talented, with incomes far greater than that of the average juvenile.

For those who have not had an opportunity to attend the hearings, or familiarize themselves with the testimony, may I recount briefly what the measure provides.

It permits minors, at least 14 years old, to take part in professional theatrical performance in the District of Columbia.

It stipulates that a child shall not appear on the stage after 11 p. m., or more than 6 hours, or two performances in 1 day, or more than 6 days a week, or more than 24 hours in 1 week.

Under its terms the Board of Education is authorized to issue permits. But only to minor children who have completed eight grades in elementary instruction, or their equivalent.

Permission to appear must be sought at least 14 days in advance of such an appearance.

The board, or its agent, may issue a permit if satisfied that the parent or guardian of such minor has made adequate provision for the educational instruction of such minor, and for safeguarding his or her health, and for the proper supervision of such minor.

This measure, it sems to me, throws a legal mantle of protection over professional children. The Board of Education has full power to examine and approve the conditions under which stage minors work, and absolute power to withhold the necessary permission if there is the slightest breach of good taste.

I need not recount at great length at this time what a depressing influence the present child labor law has been on theater operation in Washington. Over the years the National Theater has lost as many as 100 attractions, desirable for their entertainment value, but barred by this unjust restriction. Such attractions as the Pulitzer prize play, The Old Maid, has never been permited in Washington.

New plays constantly skip Washington because they are unable to meet the conditions, and prime hits are all-too-often barred. Any examination of the books would show that "dark weeks" and consequent unemployment for stage hands, musicians, ticket-office personnel, ushers, cleaners, and executives can be directly traced to booking tangles enforced by District regulations.

The legitimate theater in Washington asks only for reasonable security and the opportunity to function without unnecessary burdens that add to economic distress. Its primary purpose is to furnish entertainment, but like all other business enterprises, it is fueled by the profit motive. To ask that it continue to struggle against handicaps which are palpably unjust is to jeopardize the future of the stage in Washington.

As I interpret the will of Congress, expressed in national-defense measures and other legislation, I perceive an intent to preserve the American way of life and, if possible, to improve it. The amusement industry, insofar as I can speak for it, subscribes to that laudable aim. It will cooperate in every way that the Government requests to carry out the national idea and promote health and happiness. In that connection it would like to swell the National Treasury with amusement taxes, that must remain uncollected while this barrier is on the books.

May I thank the members of the House Committee on the District of Columbia for the patience and generosity they have shown the proponents of H. R. 1047. If their fellow Members of Congress show the same understanding and consideration, I feel sure of success.

Most respectfully,

EDMUND PLOHN,
Manager, National Theater.

Communists In C. I. O. Defy Our Courts—Violate Our Laws

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, on the 2d of May attention was called to the strike against the West Penn Hospital of Pittsburgh, instigated and carried on by the Hospital Workers' Local Union No. 255 of the State County and Municipal Workers of America, affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations. David Kanes, Robert Weinstein, Foss Baker, John Donnelly, and John W. Filer, using communistic methods and procedure seemed to be the directing leaders and spokesmen.

At that time the files of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania were cited, showing the prison and communistic records of some of these leaders and it seemed clear that the strike was instigated and carried on by the Communists. The union and its officers maintained pickets and the pickets assaulted and beat men—yes, women who sought to enter the hospital for the purpose of aiding and caring for the sick and the unfortunate in this State and charitable institution.

It was the purpose of the Communists in this union to use this strike and the unionization of this hospital as the opening wedge to force their organization upon the other 25 hospitals in Allegheny County and then to extend their organization throughout the country until they were in a position to control the services rendered in all hospitals in the United States.

One of the ringleaders responsible for the conduct of the pickets and who directed their violence was John W. Filer.

The attention of the House was called to the fact that this man Filer, prominent in the union, as long ago as January of 1921 was sent to the Morganza Reformatory for a period of 2½ years for breaking and entering. It appeared that later and in 1926 he was sentenced to the United States Penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kans., for 1½ years for deserting the Army. That in February of 1931, he was charged with a $5,400 robbery, convicted and sentenced to serve a term of from 5 to 10 years in Western Penitentiary.

Shortly after this exposure of his record, he resigned from the union and gave up his position as an employee of the Mayview Hospital, a State institution in Allegheny County. The hospitals of Allegheny County sought and obtained a preliminary injunction which restrained the Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board, its officers and agents from aiding the strikers or the pickets. This on the ground, among others, that the hospitals were in part at least, operated as charitable and as State-supported institutions.

The unlawful activities of the pickets and the Communists who were aiding them were condemned in no uncertain terms by the court and the decision of the local court was later affirmed by the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. A final decree was entered on June 11, 1941, decreeing, among other things, that the Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board and its officers should not interfere with the operation of the hospital or entertain complaints filed by Local 255 against the hospital and further decreed that the union itself, its agents, and officers should not in any way interfere with the employees of the hospital or with the management in its operation of the hospital.

Although the acts of the union, its officers, and those pickets were unlawful and were forbidden by the court, the city welfare director of Pittsburgh, Clarence C. Klein, according to newspaper reports, granted a leave of absence to John M. Kennedy, a male asylum attendant at City Home and Hospital, Mayview. Kennedy obtained this leave of absence, which was later extended, on the theory that he needed the time to attend to his personal business.

Investigation reveals that Kennedy used this leave of absence for the purpose of assisting the strikers and appearing in their defense at police hearings when they were charged with violence.

Investigation also reveals that Klein failed to notify the Civil Service Commission of Kennedy's absence and the extension granted. The Civil Service Commission has stated that it had no record of Kennedy's leave.

During the strike automobiles loaded with clubs descended upon helpless women employees of the West Penn Hospital, who were waiting for streetcars or private conveyances to take them to their homes, and without provocation assaulted and beat them.

Notwithstanding the fact that the highest court in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania ordered the union to desist and refrain from interfering in any way with the operations of the hospital or with its hiring of employees, on the 26th day of June the union held a meeting at Sitz's Hall, 3701 Fifth Avenue, in the city of Pittsburgh. At this meeting, which was a secret meeting, officials of the union, though they knew of the injunction, announced defiance of the courts, and it was publicly stated, by Donnelly who was backed up by Kanes, at this meeting that a drive would be instigated to unionize all the Allegheny County hospitals and that when such drive began it was the intention of the union to resort to "goon squads" to accomplish their purpose. It was further stated at this meeting that when the strike was called no employee was going to get into any hospital in Allegheny County without a union card.

It should not be forgotten that this strike at the West Penn Hospital was a strike against the State itself and that it was unlawful under the fair, liberal, labor law of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Nor should it be forgotten that the acts of violence advocated at this meeting of June 26 were in violation of the criminal laws of the State, had been expressly forbidden by the courts of the State, and that those present at the meeting—and there were some 61 persons present—knew that the course of conduct which was there advocated was unlawful and a defiance of the State and county court.

If Kanes carries out the plans formulated at the meeting of June 26, and if the authorities of Pittsburgh are not on guard, he will cause some sort of an incident to be created which will give him and the Communists who seek to create disorder here their much-sought opportunity to instigate and carry on a riot.

Whether the hospitals of Pittsburgh will be able to operate, to continue to minister to the sick and unfortunate, depends entirely upon the attitude of the officials of the city of Pittsburgh, of the county of Allegheny, and of the State of Pennsylvania.

The fact that the mayor, who holds membership in the American Civil Liberties Union, is running for reelection, that the district attorney is running for judge of the court of common pleas of Allegheny County should in no way prevent these gentlemen from enforcing the law and giving protection to the respectable, peaceful, God-fearing people of the city of Pittsburgh. There is now no uncertainty as to the law, the Court of last resort has spoken. It has condemned the conduct of Kanes and Local Union 255. The citizens of Pittsburgh should keep an eye on Kanes and on Donnelly. These gentlemen intimated at the secret meeting of June 26 that those who sought to continue to minister to the sick and the unfortunate, the poor and the needy at the West Penn and in the other hospitals of Allegheny County might expect violence and serious disorder.

Perhaps they were encouraged to believe that they could continue their campaign of violence and of terror, of intimidation of the hospital employees by the fact that in the earlier days of the strike their lawlessness was not prevented.

Perhaps they relied upon the fact that the Mayor of Pittsburgh did not prevent the unprovoked beating of honest citizens whose only offense was that they sought work.

There is an old saying that men are to be judged by the company they keep: that birds of a feather flock together. Perhaps the fact that the Mayor holds membership in the American Civil Liberties Union, which all too often has been the champion of lawlessness; too often ready to defend those charged with subversive activities, is one of the reasons for their defiance of law and order.

The American Civil Liberties Union has many times been condemned as Communistic. Roger Baldwin, its present head, was convicted and served time in the Federal Penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kans., for counseling evasion, during the World War, of the draft law.

It is no credit to the mayor of Pittsburgh that he finds himself a member of such an organization as the American Civil Liberties Union.

It is no credit to him that in this strike against the hospital, against the State; a strike which brings not only inconvenience but actual suffering to the unfortunate; he finds himself alined in that controversy with John W. Filer, Kanes, and the Communist Party.

The citizens should keep an eye on their candidates for office as well as upon all those now in office who are charged with the enforcement of the law.

The Nation is extending aid to the Communists in Russia, but there is no reason whatever why the Communists in Pittsburgh, in Allegheny County, in the State of Pennsylvania, or anywhere else in these United States should not obey the law of the land, show respect for the courts, and the rights of American citizens.

Notwithstanding the order of the court, plans were made at this meeting to organize the other hospitals of the county and it was openly stated that whatever was necessary to bring about that organization would be done.

Note this defiance of the law of the court. Here is a group among which were Communists, who advocate the overthrow of this Government by force, who announced as their purpose, actions which were in direct violation of the order of the court. It should be remembered, as will be later pointed out, that when the pickets got into difficulty because they attempted by force to prevent employees working at the hospital, the union and Kanes ran to the police and to the courts for the protection which they denied to peaceful American citizens.

It was at this meeting of June 26, that Mr. Kanes advised that Mr. Donnelly, president of the union, had been delegated to attend the sessions of the American Youth Congress, which, it may well be recalled, has been charged with being a communistic movement. It was at this meeting of this communistic organization that Mr. Donnelly, according to Mr. Kanes, was to give a report of the strike against the West Penn Hospital and of the plans which the union had in mind for the organizing of other hospitals of Allegheny County.

The fact that the Communists in Local 255 should send its president to make a report of its strike against the hospital to a communistic organization and to there ask for the support of the Communists to carry on its organizing drive against other hospitals is further proof, if proof be needed, of the communistic influence back of this strike.

It was at this same secret meeting, held on the 26th day of June, and where defiance of the court was planned, that Mr. Kirchfield, who was then living at the employees' quarters of the West Penn Hospital but who, out on strike, speaking from the floor, told of his plans to assist in organizing the St. Francis Hospital. This in spite of the fact that such organizing activities had been forbidden by the highest court in the State of Pennsylvania.

More recently Kanes, whose pickets were guilty of molesting and beating women employees of the West Penn Hospital, has complained because hospital employees, when accosted, annoyed and threatened, have attempted to defend themselves against his pickets. Mr. Kane can hand it out, especially if he hires some poor ignorant picket to assume the post of danger and commit the assault, but he just cannot take it when some of his distributors of violence, of broken heads and black eyes, meet an employee who hands back some of the same sort of treatment. Kanes, like all advocates of violence by others, squawks when he gets a dose of his own medicine. He appeals to the courts, to the police, for protection, though he has no scruples whatever about beating and intimidating those who seek employment at the hospital. It makes a difference to Mr. Kanes whether he is on the receiving or the giving end. He is a big, strong man. He is a courageous man when he hires a picket to beat up a woman, helpless and defenseless, but he whimpers and he cries and he runs to the police, and he appeals to the courts for the enforcement of the law when one of his thugs gets it on the chin.

This man Kanes did not do so well over in the neighboring city of McKeesport. He went over there to organize a strike against the city, but Mayor George Lysle, of McKeesport, a man who has been mayor in a union town for some 30 years, would have none of him. The mayor exposed Kanes and his record befor the city council and as a result, so it is reported, Kanes was asked by the members of the local union of McKeesport to get out and to remain out.

What Pittsburgh, and for that matter every other community in these United States, needs is a strict enforcement of the law, respect for the courts, more officials like Mayor Lysle, of McKeesport. When once we have that, then these Communists will find themselves without influence or power.

Ignace Jan Paderewski—Now He Belongs to the Ages

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 7, 1941

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a résumé of the life and death of one of the world's most noble characters, a musical genius, and a great patriot, Ignace Jan Paderewski. I dedicate this tribute to the liberty-loving people of Poland, and the lovers of liberty everywhere throughout the world, and especially to the Polish-American citizens of the United States who have made such splendid contributions to the stability and security of our Republic.

Mr. Speaker, it is reported that when the Great Emancipator, President Abraham Lincoln, closed his eyes in death in the presence of his son Robert and members of his official family, his Secretary of War, Edwin McMasters Stanton, turned to the bereaved group around Lincoln's deathbed and said:

Now he belongs to the ages.

When Ignace Jan Paderewski closed his eyes in death on Sunday, June 29, 1941, no doubt there were millions of liberty-loving souls and music lovers throughout the world who reechoed Stanton's tribute to Lincoln, and said of Paderewski:

He now belongs to the ages.

Ignace Jan Paderewski was born in the Province of Podolia, then southwest Russia, in the village of Kurilovka, November 6, 1860. His father, though a man of some wealth and the administrator of large estates, was a rebel at heart, and a leader of numerous uprisings against Russian tyranny in 1863. For his activities he was arrested and exiled to Siberia when his famous son was scarcely 3 years old.

Paderewski's mother was the daughter of a university professor who was exiled by Russia after the war for independence against the Russians in 1830. An uncle of his mother's, who was a member of the cabinet of Poland, was murdered during that war against Russia. Little is known of his mother, who died a few months after the birth of her son. It is significant that Paderewski's blood on both sides rebelled against oppression. Hence the Polish genius was destined from youth to be a leader of free men.

From his mother, who was very musical, he inherited his musical talent that was destined to acclaim him as the world's greatest living pianist. Paderewski's father shaped his son's career by providing him with splendid teachers, one of whom was Michael Babinski, a Polish refugee who had fled to France after the disastrous war of 1830 and 1831. Later he returned to Poland after he was pardoned, and became the tutor of Paderewski from 1868 until his death.

He was in charge of shaping the education and assisted in the musical development of young Ignace Jan Paderewski. Being a great student of Polish history he did more to impress young Paderewski with the story of the internal struggle of Poland against ruthless invasion than any living being. How well he impressed his young pupil is recited in Paderewski's Memoirs, written by the great musician and patriot himself. He said:

When I was 10 years old I read the description of the Battle of Grunwald, which was fought in 1410 against the Knights of the Cross (then Germany) and which was a tremendous victory for the Poles. I conceived then the idea that as the year 1910 would be the five-hundredth anniversary of that victory, how wonderful it would be if I at that time could erect a monument for that great anniversary. I thought of that during the whole of my life. Years later I realized this dream. In 1910 I gave that monument to the city of Cracow.

The world is familiar with the progress made by Paderewski in the field of music. His father on his release from prison became his companion in his early days, and through the influence of the wealthy Count Chadkiewicz, young Paderewski was able to attend the Conservatory of Music at Warsaw. His talent attracted the attention of the memorable Polish actress Helena Modjeska. It was she who made possible the raising of funds for tutorship under the great Theodor Leschetizky, of whom Paderewski later said:

I learned more in 3 months' study in Vienna under Leschetizky than I had learned in the 24 years of my life to that time.

Beginning with this first public concert in Vienna, 1887–89, and in Prussia in 1888 he was soon on the way to success. He was triumphantly received in London, and reached the height of his ambition when he made his first concert appearance in New York City November 17, 1891. This was the beginning of the 20 concert tours he was to make in the United States of America up to his last public appearance in this country, when he returned for his final music tour in 1939.

Mr. Speaker, it is said that the language of music is international, and any one of us who has ever heard Paderewski play must have been impressed with the finesse with which he executed the difficult compositions, reflecting in his interpretations the patriotism and love of liberty he ever cherished. Like Victor Herbert there was something uncanny in his portrayal of the work of the masters and his exemplification of the very soul of his native land expressed musically by this genius.

The artist in Paderewski was second only to the patriot who took his place in world affairs and spent his money lavishly in behalf of his native Poland, organizing a Polish brigade in America to assist the fatherland, and emerged after the Treaty of Versailles as the Premier of the new-found Polish Republic.

He was a devout Roman Catholic, as was and is the great majority of Polish people. Faith in God spurred him on to great heights, and there is not recorded in his political activity any despicable act that characterizes some of the national political leaders in other lands.

It was under his leadership as Premier of Poland that he achieved amicable relations with Czechoslovakia and Latvia, and other nations born with the last World War. He obtained German and Austrian recognition of the new Polish Republic, and recognition by the United States Government of his native land. He was the recipient of many testimonials in this country as a tribute to his patriotism, and in 1926 received from the American Legion the Distinguished Service Medal in recognition of his contribution of $28,500, the receipt of four concerts, to the American Legion endowment fund.

The political difference between him and Marshal Pilsudski for a time was a severe blow to his prestige, but like all political differences between great leaders it did not detract in any way from his love for his native land, and his desire for a stable government.

In early June of 1939, after a physical collapse, Paderewski left the United States and arrived in France at the time when Poland and Germany were in the throes of altercation that led 3 months later to Hitler's invasion of Paderewski's native Poland. He organized a Polish defense fund in December 1939. After the rape of Poland by Hitler and Stalin, Paderewski became a member of the Polish National Commission, and it was his influence primarily as a member of the League of Nations that Soviet Russia was dropped from membership in that body.

Saddened by the turn of events in Europe, especially by the dismemberment of his native Poland, Paderewski once more journeyed to the United States, the place he loved second to his native land, and decided to make a permanent home on the soil of the free Republic. He remained with us until his death June 29, 1941.

Although physically weakened by his last illness, he was in spirit with the Polish delegation who called on the Holy Father, Pope Pius XII, to discuss with him the plight of their native land, and to join with him in prayer, at which time the Holy Father said:

May Christ, who wept at the death of Lazarus and over the ruins of His fatherland, gather and some day compensate you for the tears you spill over the death of Poland, which will not die.

On the occasion of a testimonial dinner tendered to Ignace Jan Paderewski, Wednesday, May 16, 1928, under the auspices of the Kosciusko Foundation, held in the Hotel Commodore, New York City, in the presence of the President of the United States, the Governors of most of the States of the Union, clergymen, and laymen from all over the country, phrased a brilliant speech in response to the toast tendered to him with these words which were a splendid tribute coming from a great artist and a great patriot:

I thank you all who have so generously supported me during the long years of my artistic career, who have so bountifully rewarded my public services. I thank you all who have so nobly helped me and permitted me to realize the patriotic dreams of my youth. I thank you, ladies and gentlemen, for having imparted magnitude and charm to this reunion, and by your presence enhanced the importance and the meaning of the present hour. But as you feel, think, and act, as you have always thought, felt, and acted in the spirit of your country, so let me incline my head with profound reverence and infinite gratitude before the sanctity and greatness of that spirit which has also done so much to restore to the Polish plough the ancient soil of my forefathers.

Our beloved national hero, Thaddeus Kosciuszko, has served your country unselfishly and usefully. Blessed be his name. But blessed be the name of every one who has served your country unselfishly and usefully. Blessed be whoever contributed to the enlightenment, to the happiness, to the mightiness of your people. Blessed be whoever added to the glory of that sacred symbol of your young Nation, "The Stars and Stripes," the flag that never retreats, in the folds of which we have found at last, hidden for over a hundred years, the independence of Poland.

With services befitting the great contribution made by Paderewski, all that is mortal of him was laid away temporarily in our National Cemetery at Arlington on July 5, 1941. The Nation accepts the responsibility of guarding the sacred dust of Paderewski until such time as his dust can be returned with proper pomp and ceremony to his native Poland at some future date. May God hasten the day a free Poland will stretch out her arms to welcome one of her greatest sons and take to her bosom his mortal remains. Until that day he will sleep in peace in the shadow of the tomb of our American unknown soldier, who may be an American boy of Polish ancestry, a race that had made such splendid contributions to the spiritual and material development of the United States of America.

Construction of Roads in Idaho With Federal Funds a Necessity for Greater Production of Strategic Metals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

LETTER FROM S. E. JOHNSON, ACTING DIRECTOR OF HIGHWAYS OF IDAHO

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit a letter received from Mr. E. E. Johnson, acting director of highways of the State of Idaho, with reference to the necessity for the allocation of Federal funds for the construction of roads into latent mining districts with proven strategic mineral deposits requisite for the manufacturing program under national defense. The passage of the bill, H. R. 5110, would expedite such a construction plan.

The letter follows:

STATE OF IDAHO,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS,
Boise, June 12, 1941.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE, M. C.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN WHITE: Gold began the settlement of Idaho in 1862, and that same gold went far in financing the Civil War to a successful end. Agriculture and growth followed. Now, 80 years later, in an age of high metallurgical development, we are again in preparation for war, and to win we must have other metals which Idaho has stored in the ramparts of her mountains.

These metals are available in the back country, miles from adequate transportation. They are latent. For war they must be moved to smelters. To move them, mountain roads must be financed and built. An advanced stage of mineral development is now under way, but is impeded by lack of a link of transportation.

The phenomenal growth of our country is due to the discovery and use of our mineral resources. It has been asserted that one-half of the total wealth of the Nation has resulted from mining and the utilization of minerals. From 1924 to 1928 inclusive, the taxes paid by mining industries were six times as great in amount as those paid by the largest other industry in the country.

Mineral industries contribute to Federal revenues running into several hundred million dollars annually. Mineral products enter into almost every field of human activity, and are indispensable to modern civilization. We might say, "As mines and their affiliated industries go, so goes the Nation." In the procurement and development of minerals necessary to defense, Idaho should play a leading role.

The development of motor truck has brought about a great change in methods of transportation of mineral products, and in nearly all cases, has replaced other methods of transporting minerals to rail and sea.

In this period of national emergency, we need access roads to mineral deposits of all kinds. Factories are lagging for lack of minerals and, as time elapses, this condition will no doubt grow worse.

Most of our mineral areas are accessible within comparatively short distances. From these main highways and railroads these relatively short gaps are the ones which now demand immediate construction or improvement. The only solution seems to be the appropriation of Federal funds to be used exclusively on mine-to-market roads.

True, many mining companies profit to the extent of constructing their own access roads, but in the majority of cases the small and intermediate operator is handicapped by insufficient starting capital to care for all of his immediate needs.

The United States Bureau of Mines has spent much time and effort in exploring mineral regions of Idaho. Surely that agency knows what minerals are necessary to national defense and should be able to recommend justifiable access roads to these areas.

Assuming that minerals exist in quantity and kind necessary to defense, and we know that the demand exists, and knowing the return from the investment, the expenditure of Federal funds seems justified.

If improvements were made only on existing mountain trail roads to the point where transportation costs could be reduced, mining would open up to the extent of employing thousands of additional men in Idaho. Such development would directly affect agriculture because our agricultural products would then find a greatly enlarged market at home, dispensing with the necessity of shipping expense to distant markets.

In one-half of the counties in Idaho there are producing mines employing thousands of men at over average wages, and the average annual production is more than $30,000,000 and the average annual pay roll is more than $10,000,000.

We know that our State has great deposits of copper, lead, zinc, and other metals necessary to our national defense, and it is our duty to bring these facts to the attention of those upon whom the responsibility rests.

Practically all of our mines are located in timbered country, where ample water power is available for operations. Access to mines is access to timber and to power development and culminates in employment and expansion of agriculture to home markets. Our commercial deterrent is long hauls to the general markets. Our salvation is greater home markets for agriculture. The present emergency provides a twofold opportunity. One, to supply military needs so essential for our national defense, and the other, a vast expansion in mining operations and related activities, which will continue in more peaceful times.

Respectfully submitted.

S. E. JOHNSON,
Acting Director of Highways.

May-Connally Amendments to the Selective Training and Service Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. SCANLON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

Mr. SCANLON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the vicious attempt being made in this bill to restrict labor and take away from it all of the rights it has secured after long bitter years of struggle. Every Member of the Congress, whether Republican or Democrat, is anxious to pass this bill insofar as it refers to the ages of the selective service trainees, but we find here a vicious attempt by labor baiters to tack on provisions which should, if brought before the House at all, have been deliberately considered by the Committee charged with dealing with labor legislation, after all sides had been given an opportunity to be heard.

This legislation is not now needed and never was needed. I should like to call the attention of the House to an article printed on Monday, June 30, 1941, in the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, dealing with a fair proposition made by the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce. No one has ever accused a Chamber of Commerce of being partial to labor, but here is a body in my City of Pittsburgh, which has suggested a local mediation board to voluntarily arbitrate labor disputes.

Concerning the activities of the Congress, Frank L. Duggan, President of the Chamber, said—and remember, Mr. Speaker, this is the President of a Chamber of Commerce in an industrial city talking and not an official of a labor union:

Congress can do something in the way of regulating the conditions of employment, but it cannot by statute compel a man to work if he is unwilling to work. The old adage about driving a horse to water still holds good. We cannot get to the core of the situation by enacting laws.

Mr. Speaker, vicious restrictive laws enacted by a hysterical Congress will not bring about labor unity.

Unity can be achieved by such proposals as that made by Mr. Duggan, who said that when a dispute arises it would be submitted to a board composed of representatives of labor, capital, and the general public. This board would be local, and every member would have more than a working knowledge of the individual conditions bringing about the dispute.

Mr. Speaker, I include as a part of my remarks at this point in the RECORD an article entitled "Labor Today," from the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, in which the Duggan proposal is explained in detail:

[From the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette of June 30, 1941]

LABOR TODAY

(By Guy L. Ralston and Joseph H. Shea)

The Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce is supporting a plan to curb strikes through establishment of a local mediation board composed of representatives of labor, capital, and the general public.

Chamber President Frank L. Duggan, in outlining the plan, said that when a dispute arises it would be submitted to the board and talked out around a council table. With the support of the three parties on the council, he believes such a plan cannot fail to be successful.

Mr. Duggan emphasized that the Chamber offers this proposal as a representative of the general public, and not of either management or labor. The chamber has taken a similar stand in labor disputes for the last several years.

"The Pittsburgh district is engaged upon the gigantic job of supplying much of the material for rearming the United States and for supplying the nations this country is pledging to defend," Mr. Duggan said. "We cannot afford to let lesser difficulties and grievances distract our attention from the gigantic and imperative job of defense.

WOULD KEEP UP OUTPUT

"I refer to strikes, lock-outs, shut-downs, and interruptions of any and every kind that decrease the flow of production. In this respect employees and employers and the whole public have a common responsibility.

"Congress can do something in the way of regulating the conditions of employment, but it cannot by statute compel a man to work if he is unwilling to work. The old adage about driving a horse to water still holds good. We cannot get to the core of the situation by enacting laws.

"The Government has taken over plants in one or two instances, but this is a remedy that should be administered only as a last resort. If it were a fixed policy, both labor and management would lose their birthright of freedom. In the dictatorships labor is forbidden to organize. Workers are told when and how to work and what wages they are to receive. Capital is commandeered and used to serve the purpose of the dictators.

"COERCION HELD DANGEROUS

"Coercion under any circumstances is a dangerous weapon and its use can be justified only by relentless necessity. I think that is the viewpoint of responsible leaders of both labor and management. The President himself has given assurances that the plants will be promptly restored to their owners as soon as the emergency which has led to taking them over has passed."

The only solution to the problems, Mr. Duggan holds, is voluntary cooperation.

The plan proposed by the Chamber has been tried in a number of communities. Two examples are the Newark Labor Relations Board and the Toledo Peace Board. These two differ somewhat in make-up but not in essentials. On both, labor, management, and the public are represented.

Good Neighbor Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

LETTER FROM A CONSTITUENT

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a letter from one of my constituents. I am hopeful that others will be interested in the idea he presents. Mr. Huppke is well qualified to express an opinion on this subject.

The letter follows:

LOMITA, CALIF., July 5, 1941.

Congressman LEE GEYER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GEYER: I had a long chat with your field secretary Thursday regarding some ideas of mine for the betterment of our relations with the Latin American countries. He seemed to think the ideas were very constructive and suggested that I present them to you and tell you what I have done to further them thus far. He thought you would like to know about them and probably could suggest the best method to get a program of this nature started.

Briefly, here is the story. For a number of years I have been interested in a plan to promote better feeling and closer cooperation between our country and the Latin-American countries. If we want to neutralize the effect of foreign propaganda and improve our status in South America, we must work out a really constructive and far-sighted program. At present the agricultural products of Latin America are, to a great extent, competitive with those grown in this country, therefore, they look to Europe for their markets. We should be able to change this condition because they can raise an infinite number of commodities which we need and cannot raise here. This is where our scientists—mainly chemists with agricultural experience—could beat the Nazis at their own game if they were given the opportunity. I believe we should send some of our technical men down there as colonists—not as exploiters. They can help to develop the countries by initiating diversified agricultural programs and real farm chemurgic practices. For instance, these alert scientists could set up cooperative enterprises to make products other than coffee from the coffee berry—caffeine, other alkaloids, coffee oils, proteins for plastics, and the residue for cattle fodder. This would tend to relieve the economic distress of the coffee growers and at the same time supply us with materials we need instead of surplus coffee. I know that some effort along this line is in progress in Brazil among the huge coffee plantation owners, but there are lots of other countries in which there are only small growers who have no technical help to show them what else their coffee can be used for. In many cases these small growers could band together to form a cooperative to maintain a small extraction plant under proper technical guidance.

The flora of the tropical countries, being so diverse, make them a regular paradise for a chemurgist—a chemist looking for new plant products to develop. There are many native plants which contain valuable alkaloids or medicinal chemicals. Many other tropical plants contain essential oils which are widely used in the perfume and chemical industries. A small extraction unit can be built at a relatively low cost which will serve a community where the plants grow readily. The market for these alkaloids and aromatics is usually large enough to guarantee a good living for the people in a limited area.

There is a huge market in the United States for tasty fruits to be used in the ever-increasing beverage industry. Mangos, mangosteens, lichi, and many other delicious tropical fruits are, for the most part, unavailable in the United States. These tropical fruits can be made available by modern quick-freezing or concentration processes. Papaya fruit and leaves can be used for the extraction of the enzyme papain, for alkaloids, carotin and chlorophyll. The market for papain is huge and at present the supply is chiefly obtained in the Far East. It is used to tenderize meat, mixed with other fruit juices for curing stomach disorders, it can even be used in detergents to break up and remove proteins, or it can be used in the manufacture of valuable amino acids by treating cheap proteins—possibly derived from otherwise useless fish.

Rubber-, quinine-, and rotenone- (insecticide) containing plants are at present grown mostly in the Far East. It is of great strategic importance to develop a large supply of these essential materials in this hemisphere.

I believe it is of the utmost importance that we try to avoid the obvious exploitation of Latin America by big financial interests. Rather, I believe that a more wholesome and beneficial condition can be brought about by encouraging the more or less natural development in Latin America of industries whose products are not competitive to our own, but are commodities which we need. We should encourage not only the growing of these plants but also the actual industrial processing near where they are grown because it is more efficient and more beneficial to that area.

We have in our country thousands of brilliant young technical men who are striving to make something of themselves. Opportunities in this country for them are somewhat limited and the competition is severe. I believe we can work out a program by means of which these men can be encouraged to go to Latin America to work in this field. Surely a program of this type would do much more permanent good in promoting better inter-American relationships than the mere loan of money to huge financial interests to further exploit these countries.

First, we should send competent men all over Latin America to study conditions and to obtain initial data so that a comprehensive program can be worked out effectively. Then we should canvass our schools and technical organizations for promising young men. These men should be given a course of training in Latin American customs, language, the elements of diplomacy, and all the technical information available which is applicable to their particular line of work. They should then be sent to various locations to cooperate with the natives and, in effect, work as missionaries in a technical sense. It would be necessary to subsidize these men but it would be expected that they would be self-supporting when their programs matured.

I don't have the financial backing to initiate a program of this sort by myself. However, it remains that this should be sponsored by our Government. I have written to everyone in Washington whom I believed might be in a position to initiate some action. Each one refers me to some other bureau head and I am getting nowhere. Mr. Mills Dean, assistant to Nelson Rockefeller, and Dr. E. C. Auchter, Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, have both expressed their appreciation of my generously offered services and said they would communicate with me promptly should a suitable occasion arise. In other words, nothing is being done to really produce tangible results.

During the present emergency is undoubtedly the opportune time to launch a program such as this. I believe that by way of training and experience I have the unusual prerequisites and the desire to put over a program of this kind with utmost efficiency. I took my bachelor and master of science degrees in chemistry and agriculture at Washington State College in 1923 and 1924. For years I have studied the economic and agricultural conditions in South and Central America. I have grown many of their plants in my own greenhouse and have worked out methods of extraction of many of the valuable products. For 16 years I have been a research chemist and have developed many processes and patents. As president and founder of the Plant Culture League, I have the good will and cooperation of the leading technical institutions in this country. In this capacity, I have taught home gardeners all over the world the applications of the latest developments in plant science. I compose our monthly News Letter, which discusses some new development in plant science each month. I have answered thousands of inquiries on the growing of plants and their treatment with chemicals to speed up natural processes.

You will note in the enclosed annual report a brief description of the work our league is doing and a statement of our objectives. Our chief technical cooperation is obtained from the California Institute of Technology, Department of Plant Physiology, from which three members of our board of directors have been selected, Dr. Went, Dr. van Overbeek, and Dr. Bonner. I mention my work with the league chiefly because I believe it has given me a broader knowledge of agricultural science and chemurgy than anyone without similar experience. As far back as November 1935 I was given a rating of 88 as senior chemist in engineering chemistry by the United States Civil Service Commission.

Under separate cover I am sending you a complete set of the Plant Culture League news letters for your information. I will appreciate it a great deal if you will consider these ideas carefully and advise me what you think can be done about them.

Sincerely yours,

W. F. HUPPKE.

The Cloakroom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, James Monroe would be surprised.

Japan evidently does not believe in a shooting war.

Iceland now and Dakar in January makes climatic sense.

There are new and bigger fishes in the Atlantic every day.

The first gesture for peace was removing 7 years from conscription.

The Chief now proceeds to give Iceland a solemn promise regarding our boys.

Why was it important that the Congress should know that troops had been landed?

Wall Street Willkie seems to think we should establish bases at Brest and Copenhagen.

The Signal Service must have a long-range program in mind with the $350,000,000 request.

The House of Lords, the House of Morgan, and Hyde Park seem to be hooked up with the same drain.

The America First Committee should have started at Salina, Kans. The heart of America is the most American.

It is an addition to the sum total of human knowledge to have it announced that Iceland has a prime minister.

The little island in the North Atlantic may not be a bottleneck but it may be a neck carrying a hint of protrusion.

Between the penalized farmers and the pinched taxpayers we know Congressmen who would find solace in northern Ireland or Scotland.

The Declaration of Independence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM G. STRATTON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE DAILY ARGUS-LEADER, SIOUX FALLS, S. DAK.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Daily Argus-Leader, of Sioux Falls, S. Dak.:

[From the Daily Argus-Leader, Sioux Falls, S. Dak.]

AMERICA'S STURDY BASE

(It was late in the afternoon of July 4, 1776, that the Continental Congress, assembled in the Pennsylvania State House in Philadelphia, adopted a "declaration of independence," proclaiming to the world that the American Colonies had broken all ties with Great Britain and had become the free and independent United States of America. That document is now a historic symbol of freedom—a text of liberty that provided the foundation for the greatest nation the world has ever known.

(Particularly on Independence Day this year, it should be read in full by every American. Fathers should read it to their assembled families. Individuals should study it. For their convenience, it is reprinted herewith in full.)

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume, among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident: That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that, whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient suffering of these colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former systems of government.

"LET FACTS BE SUBMITTED"

The history of the present King of Great Britain is history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these States. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world.

He has refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his assent should be obtained; and, when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature—a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only.

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved representative houses repeatedly for opposing, with manly firmness, his invasion on the rights of the people.

He has refused, for a long time after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected, whereby the legislative powers, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise; the state remaining, in the meantime, exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without and convulsions within.

He has endeavored to prevent the population of these states; for that purpose obstructing the laws for the naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass others to encourage their migration hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.

He has obstructed the administration of justice by refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers.

He has made judges dependent on his will alone for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out their substance.

He has kept among us in times of peace, standing armies, without the consent of our legislatures.

He has affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power.

"ACTS OF PRETENDED LEGISLATION"

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitutions and unacknowledged by our laws, giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation:

For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us;

For protecting them, by a mock trial, from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these States; for cutting off our trade with all parts of the world;

For imposing taxes on us without our consent;

For depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury;

For transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offenses;

For abolishing the free system of English laws in a neighboring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its boundaries so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these colonies;

For taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering, fundamentally, the forms of our governments;

For suspending our own legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

He has abdicated government here by declaring us out of his protection and waging war against us.

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is at this time transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries to complete the work of death, desolation, and tyranny already begun with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow citizens, taken captive upon the high seas, to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren or to fall themselves by their hands. He has excited domestic insurrection amongst us and has endeavored to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions.

In every stage of these oppressions we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms; our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

Nor have we been wanting in our attentions to our British brethren. We have warned them, from time to time, of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them, by the ties of our common kindred, to disavow these usurpations, which would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They, too, have been deaf to the voice of justice and consanguinity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends.

"FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES"

We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in general congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare: That these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that, as free and independent States, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do; and, for the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

Bonneville-Grand Coulee Industrial Empire

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ARTICLE BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent of my colleagues, I insert the informative article by Mr. Richard L. Neuberger, published in the Christian Science Monitor, July 5, 1941, describing the industrial empire which is being created by the Bonneville and Grand Coulee hydroelectric dams in the State of Washington. The Bonneville project is in my congressional district on the Washington side of the Columbia River and most of the industrial development resulting from its construction has taken place in the communities in my district.

The article referred to reads as follows:

Through the last lingering reaches of the American wilderness men are erecting steel towers to carry electric power to America's newest industrial empire. Factories and workshops are rising along the Columbia River. Against an imposing background of peaks and evergreen forests, these factories are producing strategic materials for the defense of the United States and for the embattled British Isles.

A year ago no aluminum was produced west of the Mississippi. Before the next snows tint the Cascade Mountains, plants in the shadow of their ramparts are expected to manufacture a third of the country's aluminum output. Aluminum is produced when an electric current is run through a chemical bath of bauxite, and electric current is available in unlimited quantity where the Columbia River drops through mountain gorges to the sea. The Columbia Basin, says Richard S. Reynolds, president of the Reynolds Metal Co., is to become the aluminum production center of the world.

The Washington State Planning Council recently predicted that at least three more aluminum factories and an aluminum fabricating plant soon will be constructed within transmission distance of Grand Coulee Dam.

Defense authorities estimate that United States requirements, plus the aid-to-Britain program, make imperative an extra 800,000,000 pounds of aluminum each year. Plants operated by Columbia River power will be called upon to furnish half this quota. Business groups hope that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will finance these plants, with actual construction and operation left to private concerns. New Dealers, on the other hand, want federally owned factories as a "yardstick" for aluminum quality and prices.

From Bonneville and Grand Coulee Dams, transmission lines fan out like the rays of the sun, carrying hydroelectricity to shipyards and metal-reduction units which dot the entire Pacific Northwest. In this new citadel of industry, civilization and frontier meet in strange contrast. To build a network of wires that serves the recently constructed plants, men have hacked into deep fir and pine fastnesses. Backbone lines loaded with 220,000 volts have been strung across the crags of high mountains.

Coal and iron ore have been the basis of numerous strongholds of American industry. The foundation of this newest stronghold is water power. In the Columbia River and its tributaries lurks nearly half the latent hydroelectricity of the Nation. No four rivers combined contain as much energy as the Columbia. It foams out of the Canadian Rockies and twists across Washington and Oregon with a force which has worn down granite mountains and basalt cliffs.

Today, for the first time, this force is hooked to the wheels of industry. In the present emergency the greatest power waterway on the continent has been called to the colors. Grand Coulee Dam is 2 years ahead of construction schedule. Its vast output is already needed by the defense program. Already the Bonneville Power Administration has signed contracts for more than 250,000 kilowatts of energy which will go directly to new factories.

Aluminum is one of the main symbols of the Northwest's industrial boom. In two Washington towns that lie along the banks of the Columbia are the first aluminum plants ever built on the Pacific slope. The factory of the Aluminum Co. of America at Vancouver has an annual capacity of 150,000,000 pounds of aluminum. The Reynolds Metal Co. plant at Longview, now under construction, will be on a 60,000,000-pound annual production basis by autumn. Congressman MARTIN F. SMITH, in whose district the factories are located, estimates that this is enough aluminum to build 21,000 military planes—planes that might alter the course of the war.

Power is a vital element in the manufacture of aluminum. Two kilowatts, running night and day for a year, are required to make a ton of this essential national defense material. This is the real importance of the Columbia River in the present crisis. At Grand Coulee a huge generator capable of producing 108,000 kilowatts will be switched into operation in July. Late in October another such generator will be ready, and next January still another. These are the largest generators ever designed, yet Grand Coulee can whirl 18 of them. A train of 75 freight cars is necessary to carry the parts for one generator.

Longview, where the new Reynolds Metal plant is rising, is in the heart of the lumber industry in the Columbia River Basin. Trees from the uplands, floated to Longview, are sawed into boards, planks, shingles, and plywood. Timber represents half the payroll dollars in the region. At present the forests are being depleted twice as fast as they grow.

In the Grays Harbor area and other parts of the Northwest the trees have disappeared like a great green carpet being shredded thread by thread. Mills penetrate farther and farther into the mountains for their lumber supply. At the insistence of the Forest Service, conservation practices have been followed, but often too late. The Northwest Regional Council, an organization endowed by the Rockefeller Foundation, has pointed out that, due to ruthless lumbering, economic decay and community dissolution confront many people in the region unless some substitute employment is discovered.

The industrial boom due to Columbia River power and the defense emergency may be the answer to this employment problem. In addition to the aluminum factories, energy from Bonneville Dam is being sold to carbide plants, salt plants, machine shops, and shipyards. Government officials also have talked about a colossal steel mill at Mount Pleasant, Utah, which would be run by hydroelectricity from Grand Coulee. And recent proposals by Secretary of the Interior Ickes for Federal aluminum plants all involve extensive use of the great energy resources of the Columbia River.

One of the features of this latest American industrial boom is the fact that most of the big factories are in small communities rather than in the major centers of population. When the President dedicated Bonneville Dam in 1937 he said he hoped there would be no "new Pittsburghs" in the Northwest. He urged that industry be decentralized and said that concentration of plants in one or two places would lead to unhealthy expansion and overpopulation. Bonneville officials have followed this doctrine by charging a "postage-stamp" rate for power instead of granting reduced charges to factories in the immediate vicinity of the project.

Both new aluminum plants are in places of less than 20,000 inhabitants. Mount Pleasant, site of the proposed steel mill, has fewer than 5,000 people. Planning agencies maintain that industries in communities of this size will lead to better living conditions and that many workers will be able to have an acre or so of land as an anchor to windward should the jobs give out. This trend showed in the 1940 census figures. Although neither Seattle nor Portland made any substantial gains over 1930, the adjacent countryside filled up enormously as families bought suburban homes and small farms.

Authorities at Bonneville Dam attribute recent industrial developments to the fact that Columbia River power rates for industry are the lowest in the Nation. Factories can buy Bonneville hydroelectricity for 2.5 mills per kilowatt-hour. This contrasts with 3.4 mills in the Tennessee Valley Authority and 7.3 in Boston. Just as oranges are cheap in California and cotton cheap in Alabama, power sells at low rates along the Columbia River because of the huge quantities available. Although it is the second largest river in the Nation, the Columbia in some stretches attains a velocity of 15 miles an hour, a speed comparable to that of swift mountain creeks.

Besides Bonneville and Grand Coulee, there are seven other sites for dams on the Columbia which the Federal Government might develop. The House Rivers and Harbors Committee recently authorized construction of the Umatilla Rapids project, 175 miles upstream from Bonneville. Many power sites also exist on the Columbia's main tributary, the Snake, where it surges through the 6,100-foot trough of Hell's Canyon. Development of all these power resources would enable the Northwest to produce as much energy as is used in the entire Nation.

Of course, such a program as this is only for the distant future. Were it not for the national-defense emergency, some newspapers in the Columbia Basin doubt whether the Government could sell all the available power at Bonneville and Grand Coulee. Much of the Pacific Northwest is wilderness. Forests and upland deserts cloak a large proportion of its land area. Migrants from the Middle West boosted the population 15 percent in the last decade, but many horizons are vacant still.

The fact that electricity is not an exportable commodity accounts for the Northwest's present industrial boom and also insures its industrial future. Power must be transmitted by alternating current. Direct current transmission is prohibitively expensive. Alternating current can be sent only about 300 miles. This distance would get energy from the Columbia River only to the Rocky Mountains. Thus the Northwest's most valuable resource can be shipped away only in the form of manufactured goods.

The main obstacle to the establishment of factories in the Northwest is the long distance from the great centers of distribution. Goods manufactured on the shores of the Columbia must be hauled across the continent to be sold in New York and Philadelphia and Boston. Yet in any situation where cheap and abundant electricity is a more important factor than the transcontinental haul, the rolling meadows and uplands of the Pacific Northwest will be chosen over industrial sites in Pittsburgh and Cleveland and Detroit. This already has proven to be the case in aluminum, carbides, and other industries.

The value of manufactures for the United States as a whole is $196 per person. In the Columbia Basin it is only $146, and with the lumber industry subtracted it is only $68. Industrial use of water power is gradually balancing this situation. The Pacific Northwest today is expanding more industrially than in the past generation. Streams rushing down mountainsides are the cause of this manufacturing boom—the Lemhi as it flows to the Salmon, the Salmon as it flows to the Snake, the Snake as it flows to the Columbia, and the Columbia as it flows on to the sea.

Address Before General Agency Convention of the State Mutual Life Assurance Co.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVE E. SATTERFIELD, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ADDRESS BY HON. DAVE E. SATTERFIELD, JR., OF VIRGINIA

Mr. SATTERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the banquet of the General Agency Convention of the State Mutual Life Assurance Co. at Virginia Beach on the evening of Tuesday, June 24, 1941:

I have wanted very much to accept your kind invitation since it was first extended so graciously to me by Mr. Ben Cottrell. For a time it looked as if it would be impossible for me to get away from Washington. The situation overseas is so acute and events are moving with such rapidity that one hesitates to make an engagement very far in advance for fear that the legislative program might develop to such a point as to render it unwise and improper to absent himself from Washington. Luckily no such contingency has arisen and I am made much happier and you are shortly to be made very miserable, indeed.

I thought Mr. Cottrell was a very trustful person or a very injudicious person at least, when he wrote me last week that "we want you to feel that there is no time limit on your talk." Let me assure you at the outset that I have no idea of taking advantage of such benign innocence. I have, however, been asked to discuss two subjects very close to your hearts. They concern, I believe, great struggles yet to be made. The first involves a contest on the home front, not soon, I hope, to begin in view of the fact that we are confronted with much more pressing problems. I refer to the recent report of the Temporary National Economic Committee, and more particularly to that part of the report dealing with insurance.

Your distinguished president, Mr. Chandler Bullock, in presenting Commissioner Detrick, of California, to the annual convention of the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, in 1928, at the Hotel Astor, said this:

"He hails from California, being insurance commissioner of that State. It happens that he went to the same university, Leland Stanford, that graduated Herbert Hoover. It may be that he is going to high Federal office. I can't say: In any event, I can assure you that he is going to spare us two things. He has promised that he will not boast of the unparalleled success of the various California football teams, and that he will not drag in mention of that tiresomely salubrious sunshine of that remarkable California climate. With this remarkable self-denial (and it is remarkable in any Californian), we are very glad to have him here."

While Mr. Bullock has not up to this good moment given me any specific charge, I shall nevertheless strictly adhere to that admonition despite the fact that it is nearly 13 years old. I solemnly promise to make no reference to the beauties of my native State or to that galaxy of early Virginia statesmen to whose farsightedness and wisdom you owe a great deal. It seems to me, however, I might be permitted to say with becoming humility and meekness that Virginians hereabouts are delighted to have so distinguished a group of their countrymen in such close proximity to the beginnings of this great country.

It is a bit puzzling that the recent Temporary National Economic Committee's monograph on insurance has provoked such little public discussion. It projects the Government's possible entry into an untried field. If the suggestions of this committee are as truly a genesis to governmental participation as congressional investigating committees usually are, it would seem to me that every policyholder in these United States, employers, and employees of insurance companies should be on the alert. Summarized, the committee made the following recommendations:

"1. Designate a Federal agency or create a new commission to assist the States in strengthening their regulatory machinery.

"2. Create an insurance advisory council of 12 to assist insurance-company managements in solving their own problems without legislative compulsion. This council would report annually to Congress on the state of the insurance business.

"3. Have Congress designate a Federal agency to conduct a thorough investigation of all forms of fire, casualty, and marine insurance."

Frankly I have welcomed the investigation which has thus far been made because I have had an abiding conviction that such an investigation would reveal nothing to cast any very real reflection upon the institution of life insurance, for I believe that no other line of human endeavor has written a finer chapter than that presented by the record of the life-insurance companies of America. This must be true if Mr. Leon Henderson, valued scout for reformation that he is, in commenting upon the investment record of life-insurance companies in the last 10 years, says:

"I think it is an extraordinary record as far as the integrity of the insurance policies is concerned."

Studious, conscientious investigations are welcome. They are made unwelcome only by those who fear the results. The danger, however, in these reports are twofold. First, they may encounter nothing more than a passive resistance on the part of insurance companies in this country. Secondly, in this world of confusion the imprimatur of a congressional committee expressing one side of an economic theory has a great chance for survival. I shall not find the report of this Committee welcome, however, if its documents and reports are only to be used in future years as source material on the part of some professors who play a part in this century not unlike the role played by their brethren in the thirteenth century in France, whose illogical deductions contributed immeasurably in building up the power of the French throne at the expense of the French people themselves.

Recently a Government official of high standing stated in effect to a group of insurance men that we are living today in an era of change at home and abroad, to which we all must adjust ourselves whether we like it or not, that failure to appreciate and accept these changing conditions will not alter what has already taken place or what still may need to be done one iota, and that all of us might just as well realize now as later that the pages of history were not going to be turned backward, and that social laws will not be repealed even if they did increase the Government's Budget.

This gentleman was no oracle. He could not be considered as a harbinger of things new. There is nothing new about social security, old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, restriction of hours of labor, minimum wages, and the abolition of child labor. A Germany of a more distant day under Bismarck had all of these things, and I might add that they were not even new to Rome. They are not even old wine in new bottles.

These domestic problems before the country today are not new. There will be nothing new even in their attempted solutions, unless if, indeed, they are successful. To fail now is but to reenact the familiar tragedies played to bewildered people in the earlier democracies long, long ago. Appeals to the Government and suggestions that Government intervene is not the answer. Business and Government have their particular spheres of operation and they must not be merged in any wholesale plans and systems. Not if we wish to preserve the balance between the two, which has given this country the most remarkable development in a short space of years that the world has ever known.

Admittedly there are a number of things that need correction, but the report of the T. N. E. C. reveals complaints of such scarcity and triviality that they are, it seems to me, in themselves a strong recommendation for State-controlled insurance companies when one considers the vastness of the business. Critics find it all too easy to dwell upon some of the shortcomings of the present system, and to forget its good work. Too little has been made of the fact that under the State-controlled system, the business of insurance was nurtured through its early life, was guided along the path of safety and sanity and has climbed to the heights upon which it stands today. Let these gentlemen point out also that through the years adjustment and correction have constantly been made and that the insurance business in this country is about the only one existent that has purged itself, overcome adversity, and all the vicissitudes encountered by business and today faces the future virile and unafraid.

The Congress is constantly importuned to pass laws, to assist the States as suggested by this committee in the insurance field, and to establish organizations, perhaps I had better say, establish bureaus, to meet what is sincerely represented at the time as a merely temporary emergency. Here in the realm of emergency, fancied or real, lies the pitfall which from the very beginning has always threatened the democracies. If ever this Government of ours comes to devour itself it will be a feast served by Americans and sumptuously spread upon the tables within the halls of legislation, long since deserted by wise, courageous, and prudent statesmen.

We cannot go on forever characterizing every problem as of varying degrees. I, for one, hold there is always an emergency when the Nation is confronted with the choice between good and evil—right or wrong.

It would be a pity indeed after all these years to have the Government interrupt. The business of insurance involves long contracts. The fidelity of performance of those contracts will not brook interruptions. For over 100 years the business has functioned smoothly and under every sort of condition. It has a pretty good constitution; it has survived all the diseases of adolescence and all the shocks. I, for one, cannot believe that there are greater dangers lying in wait than those already passed; and if this be true, why should we tamper with a system thus far proven? About the only investment I can think of today worth 100 cents on a dollar is a life-insurance policy in a good company or a Government bond. There are some who will always advocate change. Change is not always good. There are many illusions wrapped up in change. Merely to change is not to progress; what will it profit us to follow after change if in the process we miss the path along which we have come so gloriously? It is so easy to be fooled by the illusions of change.

We are moving through a period in which concentration of power at Washington is the unmistakable trend. Until recently a great many insurance companies could not believe that the concentration-of-power idea was moving in their direction. They have been consoling themselves with a line of Supreme Court decisions beginning with Paul v. Virginia in 1868, in which the Court has decided that a constitutional law could not be enacted that would give the Federal Government direct supervisory power over insurance companies. However, since the World War the world has been treated with a course in circumvention. There are several techniques, and none more effective than the "let me advise you brother" method. That is a suggestion of the T. N. E. C. First advise, then embrace, and then—oh, why bother about a definition of interstate commerce?

If then the avenue of approach by the Federal Government is to take some part in the business of insurance, if only to supervise by reason of the failure of insurance commissions in the several States of the Union to control the situation, then I have this word for you gentlemen: Go back to your native States and see that the statutes under which your State insurance commission operates be strengthened if they need it, and even if it be against your own company. If the commissioners of insurance in your States are inefficient, address yourselves to the problem of putting someone in their places who will administer the insurance laws of your respective States impartially. If the Government is to keep its hands off this business, you gentlemen can contribute immeasurably in seeing that your company carries its share of the burden of working out social obligations and responsibilities. If your house needs cleaning, be sure to clean it yourself, and if it is as tidy in the future as it has been in the past I think you have nothing to fear. Life insurance to our fathers was an unheard-of thing—unbelievable. To make credible the incredible is the mission of your fraternity.

If we are to stem the tide of concentration at Washington the task is as much yours as it is your duly elected Representatives. We are a mentally alert people. We have the courage to experiment, and in this field if it is overdone is to be found the seeds of our destruction. You remember Shakespeare speaks of the "quick forge and working house of thought." Sometimes we are poor smithies in striving to mold a good idea, not because of poor tools, for we have the sharp edge of experience and the full power of the world's history. Let us not forget that our fathers before us labored mightily in the quick forge and working house of thought not to mold but to strike away the enslaving shackles of the past.

It is difficult for one who has lived with every news dispatch on the world situation through these passing unhappy months to lose one single opportunity to speak of the great threat to the security of our beloved country. Somehow I feel that my right to speak to you stems from an authority over and above my service in the Congress as one of your representatives. As one who served through the last war, and still a member of the Naval Reserve, having passed successfully his physical examination a few weeks ago, as a father of two sons, both shortly eligible for the high honor of service to their country, permit me a few words with which I hope to sound a warning.

When Admiral Darlan and Hitler conferred at Berchtesgaden it was evident that the most critical phase of the war for America was in the making. Petain's blessing and direction to the French to follow Hitler without mental reservation brought the war closer to us. These events were cause enough for serious speculation but when Darlan announced a few weeks ago that France was about to take an active role in insuring speedy victory for Hitler, banished was all hope that the French might at least be counted upon to stand. The distressing thing is that France no longer believes that Germany can be defeated, and what is worse, that so far as they appraise their own interests, the defeat of Hitler is not even desirable. In addition, there is the Turkish nonaggression pact and the fact that Germany will surely either crush Russia or enter into another pact with that country more far-reaching than the one signed nearly 2 years ago.

These things and the President's last address have served to invite the question, What would it mean to us if Germany can collaborate itself across the Atlantic into the Western Hemisphere? I know that there are some good Americans, stout in their resolves to keep the conquest of totalitarianism from coming even close to America, have decided to do so by measures that suggest staying in a hole until that hole is bombed and invaded. More sensible to most people is a policy of meeting aggression where it shows its fangs, of supplying those who are making a first-line defense, of keeping honor alive as well as courage, and of having still the possibility of a final defense here in the Western Hemisphere.

We have come now to the ultimate issue of the war raging overseas. We cannot stand in the middle of the road all summer, engaging in halfway measures. Our foreign policy to date has been faithfully following after events, never ahead. The result is that we have reached the point now where any decision we make involves war risks. Standing between this country and the raw forces of destruction in Europe is the British Navy and the British people. If England is defeated, no longer may we rely upon that nation as a buckler and a shield. There is no sentimentality in that statement. The effect of that statement is to bare an ugly fact, the fact that ultimately the American people will admit its truth in a rush to do for their own protection what they should have done months before. It may be then too late. We have watched one surrender after another—Spain, Manchuria, Ethiopia, Czechoslovakia. The fate of France and the smaller democracies of Europe induced by indecision merits the epitaph: "Too late."

There is ample excuse and explanation for the slowness with which democracies move, but there is no reasonable excuse for our inability as a great nation to formulate now a definite, affirmative foreign policy. We have followed events long enough. This great decision now before the American people, sad to relate, is befogged by personal animosities and political partisanship. Every vote taken on the floor of the House relating to this war and touching the course of conduct that we as a nation should pursue has nearly every time resulted in a division marked by the center aisle, Republicans on one side and the Democrats on the other. If ever this country needed leadership in every State, town, and hamlet it is today. I well know the import and the responsibility which the statement I am making entails.

Those of us in Washington, fully conversant with the dangers of the present situation, must speak out now. In the cloakrooms, on the street corners, in clubrooms wherever Americans meet, it is rare to find a person who does not sincerely suggest the use of convoys if without that assistance British defeat is imminent. We face that possibility now, and the time has come for a definite and courageous decision. Sinkings of ships leaving ports of this country for England thus far this year have not been so numerous. Sinkings of empty bottoms headed this way for cargoes have, however, been heavy. I favor convoys as a preventative of sinkings and as an earnest on our part that we fully intend to see that supplies reach England. This summer Germany will launch her greatest attack of the war. It will be unrestricted submarine warfare in the Atlantic. Shall we wait for that, and follow events once again?

We should favor convoys to be employed now, not tomorrow nor the day after tomorrow. Of course, there is an alternative—if we fail to convoy we must begin to dig in here, and who knows but perhaps to become prisoners within our own fortress. One thing is certain, digging in here when Britain is no more will neither preserve our peace nor our property. We can no longer afford to stand another hour vacillating, wondering, doubting the future.

The time for decision is at hand—most certainly we shall have to decide upon our course. For us the possible loss of sea control is the real danger. For us this war is a war to determine who shall dominate the waters of the two oceans. We who live on the seaboard know this. Our neighbors in the mountains and on the plains are unfamiliar with the implications of sea power. But if the light goes out in England they will then understand—it will be clear to everybody. Those who today are unable or unwilling to see this danger will, when it comes, be the loudest to shout for our Government to do something about it.

We must resist on moral grounds; we must resist on the ground of security. If we permit Britain to be defeated we shall find ourselves in a few short months in a zone of danger from which our enemies may never permit us to escape. A year hence, with all of our construction, we will have 18 ships of the line, the Japanese will have an equal number, and Germany will have 9. If Britain is gone the Germans will, with unlimited slave labor and innumerable shipyards, outbuild us 2 to 1. Strikes nor wages nor hours will not embarrass or interfere with their program. We shall truly be prisoners within our own lines.

In this day, when dictatorships rise to turn upon and fight one another as they are doing now, and to plague civilization, and when there is a decreased emphasis on independence, we know that it is history repeating itself once more. Perspective is lent to this problem when we recall that Paul the Apostle faced it. He had preached freedom to the Galatians. He found them regimented by a legal code. From the eighth day of their existence until they died they were under the duress of a detailed legalism. And Paul freed them from that. He said, "Love God and do as you please." He presented to them a Christ as an inner possession and a mentor, and then in a little while, as you remember, the Galatians grew tired and weary with their liberty. They grew weary of responsibility and making decisions for themselves and they yearned for the apparent security of the old tradition. They were careless. Paul wrote them:

"For freedom did Christ set us free. Stand fast, therefore, and be not entangled again in a yoke of bondage."

Few sentences of Holy Writ could be more applicable to our present world. If we are wise, this kind of a situation time and again repeated from Paul's day to our own, and as obvious and menacing, can teach us valuable lessons about freedom. We have been facile in our praise of it. We have taken it too lightly as a priceless boon. We have sung too much with Robert Burns in his poem, Liberty's Glorious Feast.

The great advantage which has been Germany's in putting in years of preparation, particularly in the manufacture and use of airplanes, is for the first time definitely threatened. Hitler knows he cannot successfully invade England until his army has achieved unquestioned security in the east. In that great undertaking against Russia the German air force must play the leading role. While Nazi aerial squadrons are hovering over these new lines, we must throw every contribution possible to Britain. Hitler undertakes in a sense a task which he no doubt has ardently hoped it would not be necessary to perform. The result is the English have been made beneficiaries of an unexpected opportunity provided we can increase our aid.

Once again we are shown just where the road of appeasement leads. This new war is eloquent proof of the perfidy of Hitler. It is ample proof that the Germans are out to conquer the world. After the World War we heard much of the expression, "What price glory." The immediacies of the present situation demand a course on our part which will compel the average German to ask with considerable spirit, "What price victories for us?"

Napoleon, 128 years ago, rode at the head of a half million men toward Moscow, with all continental Europe at his feet. Few saw that he was riding to his doom in the snowstorms of the Russian steppes. May Providence decree that another war-mad militarist will soon be retreating from Moscow, not because we have any affection for the shabby Stalin or the other shadowy forms within the Kremlin. The Russians are not fighting a good fight; they campaign for no great principles; they are but jackals perhaps to be driven from the carcasses of Finland and Poland. There is an old saying when thieves fall out honest men get their just desserts. We can't, even if we would, help Russia. The thing to do is to redouble our help to Britain. I have faith that in a little while perhaps that looking back we shall have the comfort of knowing that all the would-be usurpers of the rights of free men have come and gone while truth has persisted and freedom has once again raised herself from the dust and fundamental human rights have emerged again. Whatever of fault be ours, and there has been fault, it must not be said in history that our Republic faltered in its tasks, its duty to its people, its duty to mankind, or has taken one step backward in honor, or in retreat before those who would seek to destroy our virile life stream, our institutions, our homes, our bodies, or our souls.

America is gradually awakening to the realization of the folly and the peril of isolationism. Not all the king's horses and the frenzied voices of the isolationists in these United States can drown out the ominous sounds increasing in volume in Europe. The question dismally repeats itself here, Will we defend our interests at once and by every means in our possession and while we have a faithful ally or shall we wait, to follow after events once more, until all the advantage of decision is with our enemies? That decision must be faced now, without another moment's delay. We need truth; we need courage; we need determination.

With great decisions come great visions. Whatever the future may hold for us we can never lose the vision of these United States united—as our fathers before us have seen it, as most of us here have been permitted to see it. Our country is not just a name, it is a living force; our country is not a sentiment, it is a vital engine of righteousness. We have seen; we have learned; we know.

For great decisions, greater visions, greater opportunity—for these we thank the God of our fathers. Let us say with Rupert Brooke as he went gallantly to his death at Gallipoli, "Thank God he has matched us with this day!"

A Convenient Cloak

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. WILLIAM DITTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, the problem of national defense is uppermost in the minds of all of us. Its magnitude and importance and the disastrous delay in directing attention to it should make it the first objective of the administration which is responsible for its execution. Every ounce of our strength as developed by freemen working under a free economy should be made available for the assurance of a sense of national security. Social philosophies and political experimentation can await a quieter and more settled season for their advancement. First things should be put first. The attempt, therefore, to foist upon the American people a program for the socialization of our domestic economy by the insistent demand that radical proposals are necessary for defense purposes is disheartening and demoralizing.

For some years such efforts were made by those who claimed that our domestic difficulties could only be overcome by a departure from established landmarks and by the substitution of some form of Marxist philosophy. Most of these disciples of a new order are still entrenched in positions of power in Washington. To them the defense program offers a convenient vehicle for furthering their socialistic ambitions. As a result of these efforts, confusions and conflicts, instead of singleness of purpose, have become increasingly apparent in Washington to such an extent that the sense of direction which is so sorely needed today is woefully lacking.

The opinion has been expressed that these confusions and conflicts are not at all distasteful to that group of advisers which has insisted for a long time that private enterprise is an enemy that must be punished rather than a friend that should be encouraged. If a sufficient degree of sabotage could be effected by a continued program of cross-purposes, the resulting frustration could easily be seized upon as the necessary excuse for the exercise of more drastic and inclusive powers by the Federal Government.

What might not have been possible, therefore, by direction could be accomplished by indirection under the very convenient plea of necessity. Thus there would be leveled at our processes of self-government the false indictment of failure in the hour of grave emergency, with the attendant specious plea that revolutionary readjustments were required for the successful prosecution of the defense program.

The economic planners, the state ownership advocates, the collectionist collaborators have not been dismissed by the President. Instead they have been permitted to assume the presently more acceptable and covering cloak of national defense. Thus the dynamic energy and productive capacity of America continue to be subjected to the insidious attack of a band of buccaneers which has boasted of its purpose to remake America according to a socialistic pattern.

Taxes Paid by American Industry in 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALLEN T. TREADWAY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE JULY 1941 ISSUE OF INVESTOR AMERICA

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article from Investor America dealing with the amount of taxes paid by American industry in 1940. I believe this article will be of interest to the House in connection with the new tax bill. It shows that 165 representative business concerns paid 56 percent of their net earnings in 1940 in taxes, which is equivalent to $3.92 for each share of common stock, $451 for each owner of common stock, and $735 for every employee on the pay rolls of these companies.

It must be remembered, of course, that corporation earnings are also subject to tax when distributed to their stockholders in the form of dividends. These dividends are subject to both the normal individual income tax and the surtax.

Under the proposed tax bill, much heavier taxes will be imposed, both on corporate and individual incomes.

The article is as follows:

[From Investor America for July 1941]

TAXES FOR 1940 TOOK NEARLY 56 PERCENT OF NET EARNINGS (BEFORE TAXES) OF AMERICAN INDUSTRY—SURVEY OF 165 REPRESENTATIVE CORPORATIONS BY AMERICAN FEDERATION OF INVESTORS REVEALS THAT BURDEN OF TAXATION IS INCREASING DESPITE HIGH RATE OF INDUSTRIAL ACTIVITY

(By Charles A. Segner)

That the fears of investors regarding the ever-increasing tax burden imposed upon American industry are well founded is indicated by the results of an exhaustive survey of 165 representative corporations just completed by the American Federation of Investors.

Despite the impetus given to industrial activity in 1940 by the spending of hundreds of millions of dollars in the national-defense effort, and the appropriation of additional billions to be spent as rapidly as possible, the percentage of total taxes to net earnings continued to rise.

Under the severe terms of the two revenue acts passed by Congress last year, the large slice that taxes have been taking out of industry's income dollar grew in size. Whereas taxes for 1939 of these same 165 companies amounted to 53½ percent of net income (before taxes), the new tabulation shows that taxes for 1940 amounted to nearly 56 percent of net income.

These 165 corporations represent a fair cross-section of American industry. Their combined assets approximate $45,000,000,000, and their capitalization $16,811,000,000. Total profits last year, after taxes, amounted to $2,023,000,000. Net earnings, before taxes, were $4,588,000,000, but taxes of all kinds for the year took more than half of such earnings. The total taxes amounted to $2,565,000,000.

The capitalization of these 165 companies is represented by 699,000,000 shares of common and preferred stock, which are owned by 6,360,000 shareholders. The total common stock outstanding represents 654,000,000 shares, owned by more than 5,686,000 stockholders. The average number of common shares held by each stockholder is 115.

Taxes of all kinds for 1940—Federal, State, and local—of these 165 representative American corporations exceeded $2,565,000,000, equivalent to $3.92 for each share of common stock outstanding and $451 for every owner of common stock. Tax collectors took from these 165 companies for the 1940 fiscal period 87 cents more per common share of stock than for 1939, and $97 more per common-stock holder.

The 1940 taxes amounted to $735 for every employee on the pay rolls of these companies, compared to $612 for 1939, an increase in taxes equivalent to $123 per worker.

Whereas the total taxes of these companies for 1940 showed an increase over 1939 of five hundred and eighty-five and one-half million dollars, or 29.6 percent, the total net earnings (after taxes) of all the 165 companies showed an increase of only three hundred and one and one-half million dollars, or 17.5 percent. In 1940 the aggregate net earnings were $2,023,000,000, compared with $1,721,000,000 in 1939.

Stockholders received in dividends in 1940 a total of $1,247,000,000, compared with $1,077,000,000 in 1939, an increase of $170,000,000. Total dividends paid in 1940 amounted to but $1.91 per share of common stock compared with the $3.92 per common share taken by taxes. In other words, the amount received by stockholders for the use of their invested savings was less than one-half the amount paid in taxes.

The average number of employees of all these companies in 1940 totaled 3,490,000, compared with 3,237,000 in 1939. Based on the average number employed for each of these years, the increase of 253,000 does not properly reflect the real increase in the number of workers at the end of 1940, inasmuch as pay rolls were growing rapidly in the closing months of last year due to the pressure for industrial production in connection with national-defense preparedness efforts and the greatly augmented armament orders placed in the United States by Great Britain.

Since the first of this year the vast program of plant expansion in American industry has provided employment for hundreds of thousands of additional workers, and the liberal wage increases granted throughout industry have added greatly to the total pay rolls. Contrary to the popular belief, the present high rate of industrial activity does not mean record profits for industrial corporations generally. The increased cost of labor and materials, combined with a Government policy of price fixing and the most severe Federal taxes in history, act as an effective check against excessive profits. In fact, the concern of investors is whether even reasonable profits may be expected under the circumstances.

The weeks and months immediately ahead are certain to witness a further transition from "normal business" to "production for defense"—or for war—and many nondefense industries will find it increasingly difficult to continue operation on a normal scale, due partly to Federal rationing of materials urgently required for armament production.

The repercussion of the new World War upon the pocketbooks of all Americans will be more keenly felt when the effects of the new Federal Revenue Act, now under consideration in Congress, are fully realized. Individuals subject to Federal income tax under present laws will be required to pay two or three times the amounts paid this year, and it may be that Congress, contrary to present indications, before it enacts the 1941 tax legislation will reduce the personal exemptions to take in hundreds of thousands of citizens in the lower-income brackets who have never been required to pay Federal income taxes. More than $1,000,000,000 in new taxes is expected from increases in individual income provisions. Another billion dollars of additional revenue will be extracted from the people of the United States through new and increased excise and sales taxes on consumer goods. These are the so-called nuisance taxes and scores of other hidden taxes that are supposed to be "painless" because the people seldom realize that they are paying them.

But it is already apparent that, notwithstanding the present onerous taxes on corporations, the burden upon industry is to be greatly increased. The revenue bill agreed upon by the House Ways and Means Committee, which forms the basis for tax legislation to be passed by Congress late this summer, broadens the excess-profits tax base established in the Second Revenue Act of 1940 and provides other revisions that are expected to increase Federal revenue received from corporations by approximately one and one-half billion dollars annually.

Following the recommendations of the Joint Congressional Committee, instead of the more severe plan submitted by the Treasury Department, the Ways and Means Committee retained the earnings alternative to the invested-capital method of determining the excess-profits-tax exemption of corporations. However, it tightened up drastically on deductions allowed and reduced the invested capital credit from its present level of 8 percent to 7 percent on capital in excess of $5,000,000.

By requiring that companies compute their excess profits before, not after, deductions for Federal corporation income taxes, the proposed bill operates to push a higher portion of excess profits into the higher-rate brackets. These excess-profits-tax rates are sharply increased, the present minimum rate of 25 percent on the first $20,000 of excess profits being lifted to 35 percent, and so on upward, the present maximum rate of 50 percent on excess profits above $500,000 being raised to 60 percent. New corporate surtaxes also are included in the bill.

Originally intended to increase present Federal revenue by 3½ billion dollars to a total of 12½ billions, there is the possibility that before the new revenue law is enacted, Congress may be faced with a situation suggesting the inadequacy of the total revenue to be expected from the bill now under consideration. The Treasury's plan of financing the defense emergency provides for two-thirds of the spending to be raised through taxation and one-third by borrowing. Since the 12½-billion-dollar total for taxes was proposed, the Government's spending program has expanded at an alarming rate and it is now apparent that, unless a great deal more can be expected from taxes, the proportion regarded by the Treasury as necessary to reasonably safe financing of national defense cannot be maintained. Borrowing far beyond the one-third ratio will be inevitable, and the Federal debt, now approximately 49 billion dollars, will quickly pass the statutory maximum of 65 billions fixed by Congress earlier this year. There have been predictions that the Federal debt may reach or exceed 100 billion dollars. Where this debt will go if the United States becomes involved in a long war is impossible to predict.

One course should be clear to Congress and to the administration in Washington: Wasteful spending on unnecessary nondefense projects should be stopped immediately. One, two, three—no one knows how many—billions of dollars could be saved each year if Congress and the administration were to waive political considerations and apply the economy ax to needless and extravagant expenditures. Whatever sacrifices are necessary will be willingly made by the American people in the interest of national defense, but in this grave financial crisis the people are justified in demanding and expecting of their Government a policy of strict economy.

Forty-nine Cent Penalty On Wheat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 9, 1941

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, two rather stormy, but I hope helpful, hearings have been held by the Committee on Agriculture as Members of the House get demands for relief from the 49-cent per bushel penalty on excess quota retroactively imposed on wheat-growers not in the triple A.

The protests arise on the point to which I directed attention when the matter was before the House, April 29. During that debate I said:

> This bill affects a situation that has already been created. It is retroactive. The farmer who has planted his wheat planted it on the supposition that if he was not a cooperator, he would be subject to a penalty of only 15 cents on the wheat that he might market in excess of his normal production quota—if marketing quotas should be voted. I also pointed out that the 1938 act permitted the farmer to consume his excess wheat on the farm but that a sentence in the committee report said the new bill—> puts the marketing penalty on the excess of wheat regardless of whether it is actually marketed.

Others joined in the protest and we drew up an amendment which was offered by Congressman O'CONNOR, of Montana, to exempt the 1941 crop from the increased penalty. It was defeated, however, on the argument that the mandatory loan feature of the bill would increase wheat prices by 20 cents so that the penalty on the excess quota would be more than offset by the better price on the marketing quota, presumably the larger part of the producer's crop.

Today, however, although wheat prices have advanced since the loan was voted, hardships created by the increased penalty have raised a storm of protest from Ohio to Oklahoma. Farmers are saying, as I predicted they would, that they took their choice when they planted and that increase of the penalty from 15 to 49 cents afterward was unfair, that war and weather have something to do with present prices. In Ohio a case is being started to test the constitutionality of "changing the rules after the game has started." Many letters point out, as I said in the House, April 29—

> A great many farmers' quotas have been reduced to the point where they could not sign up * * * and support their families and pay their interest to the Federal land bank * * * or pay rent and other expenses.

In my office we are getting many letters on the subject. Those that present some new or specific problem we are taking up with the administrative officials in the Department of Agriculture. They point out that a noncooperator can—

First. Place his wheat in storage until a year comes without quotas or until he can work it into his marketing quota of normal production for his quota acres.

Second. Store on his own farm. The farmer may then borrow 60 percent of the 85-percent loan on this stored excess quota.

Third. Turn it over to the county committee for the Secretary of Agriculture, which, in effect, means selling it for 49 cents.

These, however, do not meet the problem of the farmer whose crop was hurt by drought, hail, freezing, or what-not, so that his actual total production hardly exceeds his excess quota, nor do they meet the basic injustice to the man who measured benefits of "signing up" against the chance of quotas and a 15-cent penalty and deliberately made his choice.

During the hearings this week four suggestions have been made:

First. To waive the bond requirement on farm storage. This was agreed to by A. A. A. officials today.

Second. To figure the penalty on harvested acres rather than seeded acres.

This suggestion has been made to remove the hardship on the man who overplanted but will not actually harvest more than his "penalty" quota, forcing him to pay 49 cents on all, or nearly all, of his production.

Third. To permit the farmer to feed his excess wheat on the farm.

This suggestion has considerable support. I have added the suggestion that the farmer be permitted to use the excess wheat for seed as well as feed.

Fourth. To reduce the penalty on the 1941 crop from the 49 to 15 cents as it stood at planting time.

This is being opposed on the ground that the majority of the wheat growers are signed up and get the benefit of the 85-percent loan and that the will of the majority should prevail.

On that point I have taken sharp issue. When that point came up in the House, April 29, I said:

> One of the greatest concerns of government is to protect the weak or the minority. The strong always have ways of protecting themselves.

On the same issue in the committee hearing today I read these sentences from a Fourth of July address by Senator BAILEY, of North Carolina:

> There is such a thing amongst men as that which is called Americanism. Politically it is a government by representative democracy, restrained by a Constitution that defines the limits of the power of those who govern; that erects as against the Government itself a bill of inalienable rights in behalf of each individual. It proposes a justice that goes far beyond the courts, an economic and social justice for each and all, the weakest no less than the strongest.

It is obvious that the 80 percent of the wheat growers would vote for marketing quotas since they were in compliance and would be eligible for mandatory loans as 85 percent of parity, a figure equal to the then market price of wheat. Farmers should get full parity, which means the price of just ratio and fair relationship between farm prices and industrial prices. That, however, does not excuse the Congress for acting unfairly to the minority or permitting an injustice to be done them. They could not protect themselves. The Congress has created a situation which it should correct immediately.

The Congressional Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

SHIFTING GOVERNMENT

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, in 1939, Congress enacted a measure known as the Reorganization Act which conferred upon the President certain powers to reorganize and consolidate the various agencies in the executive branch. In pursuance of that authority, the President issued five reorganization plans. A recent estimate of the effect of these plans indicates that about 115 different agencies of Government have in one way or another been affected. Some have been abolished altogether. Others have been transferred from one department to another. Some have been abolished and their functions transferred to other agencies. Some have been slenderized and renamed, and still others have been expanded. Two of the most provocative changes were the transfer of the Immigration and Naturalization Service from the Department of Labor to the Department of Justice and the transfer of the Civil Aeronautics Authority to the Department of Commerce. It takes a considerable time for those dealing with Government agencies to readjust themselves to so many changes.

FARM PARITY

For many years a substantial portion of the membership in Congress was lukewarm on the subject of parity prices and parity income for farmers because parity as recognized by the Farm Act of 1938 applied only to the 5 basic commodities of cotton, corn, wheat, rice, and tobacco. These commodities were selected because we have always produced and exported the surplus and the price of these commodities was most quickly affected by lower world prices or by a curtailment of the world market as a result of war or the export restrictions in other countries. Growers of citrus fruits, flax, hops, soybeans, and many other commodities as well as producers of milk, cheese, and dairy products were, therefore, not particularly enthusiastic about parity unless their products were included. For some time congressional committees have had under consideration some modification of the basic Farm Act of 1938 to make it more inclusive and bring other crops and products into the parity picture. It remained, however, for the House Committee on Banking and Currency to bring in a bill relating to commodity loans on farm commodities which contains a provision reading as follows: "It is the policy of the Congress that other purchase, loan, or other operations of the Department, taking into account the funds available for such purposes for all commodities and the ability of producers to bring supplies into line with demand, shall be carried out so as to bring the price and income of the producers of such commodities to a fair parity relationship with other commodities." This may appear as a lot of involved language to the average person but it does in fact constitute the recital of a legislative policy that may result in parity for all commodities whether basic or not. It seems amazing, indeed, that a policy so drawn should be announced by Congress in the last 7 lines of a measure which dealt entirely with this subject matter.

3237

It is estimated by the Bureau of the Census that between October 16, 1940, and July 1, 1941, 832,000 young men will have attained the age of 21. That means that they have moved across that invisible line which separates 20 from 21 and makes them eligible for military training under the Selective Service Act. From October 16 to July 1 is 257 days. In that period there will have been 832,000 birthdays, or an average of 3,237 birthdays every day.

THE NEW OATH

Congress takes its own medicine. In order to assist in rooting communism and subversion out of government, it has inserted in all of the departmental appropriation bills a provision to the effect that no part of the funds can be used to pay the salary of any person who advocates the overthrow of the Government by force and violence. That same provision was written into the appropriation bill which provides the funds for the legislative branch of the Government. Therefore every Member of Congress, before he can receive his salary, must take an oath which reads:

I solemnly swear that I do not advocate the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence; that I am not a member of any organization that advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence; and that I am a citizen of the United States.

The Tribune and the Azores

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. McKEOUGH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHICAGO DAILY TIMES

Mr. McKEOUGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Daily Times of July 7, 1941:

[From the Chicago Daily Times of July 7, 1941]

THE TRIBUNE AND THE AZORES

Comes July after the fourth and Chicagoans look for hotter weather. We're used to it—expect it. We don't like it particularly, but it's part of living here—there's the good lake—we can take it.

Along with the expectancies of weather, part of life here is the invariable disagreement of the Chicago Tribune with each personality, phase, and policy of the national administration. The vagaries of this invariance are even less predictable than the whims of weather. Mr. Roosevelt, as President in unpredictable times and as head of an unpredictable family, puts the Tribune into such a mood of estrangement that it even disagrees editorially with the opinion of its own editor and publisher, Colonel McCormick, that we should take the Azores as a defense contingency.

After Colonel McCormick had testified on February 6 before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the lease-lend bill, the Tribune published a story from which the following extracts are taken verbatim:

"Senator PEPPER. To whom do the Azores belong?

"Colonel MCCORMICK. To Portugal.

"Senator PEPPER. Suppose Hitler should capture and occupy Portugal and set up a puppet government in Portugal, what would you recommend this country to do about the Azores?

"Colonel MCCORMICK. I would get there first.

"Senator PEPPER. You think that would be a policy calculated to keep the peace of the United States?

"Colonel MCCORMICK. Yes, I think so.

"Senator PEPPER. Wouldn't Hitler do anything to resist?

"Colonel MCCORMICK. I think England will make an arrangement with us to occupy the Azores. You understand that England has the right.

"Senator PEPPER. If Hitler conquered both England and Portugal and decided there should be a Hitler base at the Azores, what would you do?

"Colonel MCCORMICK. Get there first. Just as General Jackson did in Florida. I would go right in and take them. That is how we got Florida.

"Senator PEPPER. Suppose Hitler declared war on us for occupying the Azores?

"Colonel MCCORMICK. Then we should have to fight. These Germans are not so tough. I have been up against them and there is no use being scared of them."

Colonel McCormick said that if it could be assumed that the British, French, Italian, and German Navies were combined and in control of the Cape Verde Islands, the United States probably would have to act on the defensive. If our fleet were able to get to the Azores first and occupy them, he added, it could defend them against the combined naval strength of the navies mentioned.

"I would like to get to the Azores right away," he told PEPPER. "The British would be glad to have us."

"Senator PEPPER. The British do not own the Azores, do they?

"Colonel MCCORMICK. They have a right to occupy them. They did 23 years ago. We based our Navy on the Azores in the war of 1917–18."

"Senator CLARK concluded the questioning of Colonel McCormick. 'When you were being questioned by Senator PEPPER,' he said, 'there was some discussion about the occupation of the Azores. You did not mean, or did you mean to leave the impression that the defense of the United States was dependent or contingent upon our occupation of the Azores?'

"'No,' was the answer. 'It would be improved; that is all.'"

We gathered from this testimony 5 months ago that Colonel McCormick suggested getting to the Azores right away because the defense of the United States would be improved thereby. It seems we were mistaken. Last Thursday in an editorial entitled "Hemisphere Defense" the Tribune said:

"The suggestion that we occupy the Azores or Cape Verde Islands as a defense measure is not made in good faith. We occupied the Azores 23 years ago as a part of our invasion of Europe and we abandoned them when we returned home.

"We will need the Azores only if we have aggressive intentions to invade the Old World. Then we would need the Azores and possibly the Cape Verde Islands. But if self-defense is our motive, an occupation of these possessions of Portugal would be an international wrong and an aggression such as the German occupation of Holland and Belgium. * * *"

And so here we are again in July weather, and what's the prediction for tomorrow?

Discipline in the Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BRENT SPENCE

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

TELEGRAM FROM A CONSTITUENT

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegram received by me from the Reverend O. W. Robinson, of Newport, Ky.:

NEWPORT, KY., July 10, 1941.

Congressman BRENT SPENCE:

As a member of draft board from Campbell County I protest the senile action of General Lear in his uncalled-for action regarding the discipline of troops. I feel that our young American men called to the colors deserve leaders who are really qualified to lead men. Does he not deserve to be disciplined for his childishness?

Rev. O. W. ROBINSON.

Annual Commencement of Boston University, Boston, Mass.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE J. BATES

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, our country is today passing through a grave period, and times like the present demand the services of men with high achievements, leadership, clear minds, and courage in order that we may better absorb the shocks by the dictators and tyrants against our American way of life and keep the torch of democracy and liberty aflame with unceasing brightness.

Men of this type deserve the honors that the Nation wishes to bestow upon them, and I wish to congratulate our very able and distinguished colleague from Missouri, the Honorable DEWEY SHORT, and upon whom Boston University has conferred the honorary degree of doctor of laws.

The House of Representatives, I am sure, rejoices in this tribute. For many years the House has benefited from his clear insight into economic and political problems, his devotion to his duties, and desire to be helpful to all. DEWEY SHORT's remarkable ability as a speaker has made him extremely effective in presenting his ideas backed by a steadfastness of purpose to uphold the very highest ideals in our American way of life.

On June 7, 1941, Congressman SHORT delivered an address which, in my opinion, is filled with elevated thoughts and eloquent language, and characteristic of our colleague. It is inspiring to us all in these troublous times, and I can readily appreciate the impression it must have made upon his audience. I know my colleagues join with me in congratulating him not only upon the honor bestowed upon him, but also upon this address, which speaks for itself more convincingly than I could in any words describe it.

After Congressman SHORT finished his discourse before a large group of fine young men and women of Boston University, he was presented by President Daniel L. Marsh, who spoke in part as follows:

CITATION BY DR. MARSH

DEWEY SHORT, Member of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress from the State of Missouri, graduate of Boston University, a Christian scholar who has consecrated superb eloquence, the eloquence of sincerity, to the intelligent and patriotic service of his country—Doctor of Laws.

Under leave granted me to extend my remarks, I include the following address delivered by Congressman SHORT before the graduates of Boston University at Boston, Mass., on June 7, 1941:

OUR AMERICAN WAY OF LIFE

(Address of Hon. DEWEY SHORT, of Missouri)

President Marsh, members of the board of trustees and of the faculty, and fellow alumni of Boston University, it is both a distinct honor and an immense pleasure for me to return with thousands of my fellow alumni to attend the sixty-eighth commencement exercises of our alma mater. It is now nearly a score of years ago that I graduated from the oldest college in this great university.

When I was a little boy I read with curiosity about the seven wonders of the world, and during the past two decades it has been my privilege and good fortune as a Missourian who has to be shown to have traveled rather widely and to have seen for myself some of these wonders of the world. The longer I live the more widely I travel and the more I study men and institutions the more I am convinced that there is only one wonder left in the world today and that is the United States of America.

There are other countries larger than ours in area, that cover more acres, that have richer mineral deposits, and more diversified agricultural products, and perhaps that possess vaster natural resources; just as there are also other countries that are larger than ours in population, outnumbering us three or four to one. Notwithstanding the fact that other countries are larger than ours both in area and population, within the brief span of a century and one-half the United States has grown to be the greatest Nation on earth and our people, in spite of all the vicissitudes of fortune through which they have passed, have become the happiest and freest people under the face of the shining sun.

Why is it then that we are supreme among the sovereign nations of this earth? Our preeminence is due not to accident because neither geography nor population is the true criterion by which to judge the greatness of a nation or its people.

Among many fortunate factors, there are at least three great forces that have contributed to our supremacy. First, the Christian religion—the founders of this Republic and the men who wrote the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States were God-fearing men who accepted the tenets of our Christian faith. This faith looks upon the soul as a pearl of great price, acknowledges and respects the dignity of man, and stresses the eternal value of individual redemption. Men must be saved one at a time before they can be saved as a whole. The faith of our fathers believed not only in the good-neighbor policy between nations but also between individuals and groups within a nation. We are our brother's keeper and should do unto him as we would have him do unto us. Never should we demand for ourselves that which we are not freely willing to grant unto others. This is the very essence of democracy. It is the backbone of liberty. We all want economic recovery in America but we need most a spiritual revival. Moral regeneration must precede the return of a normal, sound, and lasting prosperity.

The second force contributing to our greatness and which goes hand in hand with our Christian faith is our American form of government—a constitutional representative republic where the people themselves are the supreme sovereign, a government which derives all its just powers from the consent of the governed. When Washington refused a kingly crown the divine right of kings was challenged and instead of one-man rule the Father of our Country and his copatriots established a government of, by, and for the people. They were as careful and anxious to avoid a pure democracy as they were to avoid an autocracy because they fully realized that autocracy ends in tyranny and democracy ends in anarchy. In order to keep final authority in the hands of the people through their legally chosen representatives the powers of government were divided into three separate, distinct, coordinate, and coequal branches—legislative, executive, and judicial.

It is true that the Congress, the President, and the Supreme Court are in Washington, D. C., but the Government of the United States is in Boston, Chicago, San Francisco, and every little hamlet of our land. The Government, in other words, is in the people and not outside them, and the people themselves are above the President, the Congress, the Court, or all three combined. If freedom is to be kept alive and our liberties preserved we must ever keep the three branches of our Government separate and distinct, each to act as a check and balance to the other two, and we must never suffer the usurpation of the powers of one branch of the Government by either of the other branches. Over-concentration of wealth in the hands of a few is dangerous to the freedom of a people but over-concentration of political power in the hands of one man or any single group of men is fatal to their freedom. In defending liberty and democracy abroad let us make sure not to lose it at home. One must put his own house in order before he is able to save the world.

The third great force which coincides with and supports both the Christian religion and our republican form of government in making America the land of freedom is our underlying, basic, economic philosophy of individual initiative and private enterprise. This philosophy sets no limit upon the accomplishments of the individual except his own talent, genius, and untiring industry so long as he does not trespass upon the rights of others. Those men imbued with the Christian spirit who wrote our Constitution wanted to establish a government ruled over and controlled by neither a monopolistic capitalism nor a proletarian communism. When the fathers wrote that "all men are born and created equal" they did not mean that all men are possessed with equal capacities or energies, but they did insist that all men should be given equal opportunity to develop the talents and to exercise the energies with which God had endowed them. These three forces, then, the Christian religion, our republican form of government, and our basic economic philosophy of free, individual enterprise comprise our American way of life. This way of life is being threatened more today—from without and within—than ever before.

While times and conditions change, truth never changes and one of our greatest needs in this time of confusion and bewilderment is to return to the eternal verities; to recognize, defend, follow, and cultivate once more these three great forces that have contributed to our greatness.

In a republic such as ours where the democratic processes of government have been exercised and decisions are made by the force of public opinion we must always exercise diligence and care to see that public opinion is fully and impartially informed. Indeed the Father of our Country warned us that "In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened." This important role—perhaps the most important role in a democracy—is played by the university, especially a school such as Boston University where the faculty and the students, unhampered and unfettered, pursue with an open mind the quest of truth. One of the first lessons a Member of Congress learns is that there are so many desirable ends that an act of Congress cannot accomplish. Indeed, we have learned through trial and error—and the experience has been bitter at times—that it is impossible to legislate either morality or prosperity. It requires something more than presidential fiat, parliamentary laws, and court decisions to make men good. The greatest need at this hour is for the American people to have more internal conviction for we would then need less external compulsion. Cooperation and not coercion is the method of democracy. This, of course, can be achieved through education and not by legislation. Powerful as is Congress, we cannot yet control the weather from Washington—the laws of God and Nature are still a bit above us. The significant thing then is the proper training of the mind and cultivation of the soul. Perhaps Boston University alone has contributed as much to the Nation's and to the world's good as has the Congress of the United States itself.

Mere education in itself, however, will not solve our many complex modern problems. Education brings knowledge and knowledge is power but unless directed into the right channels this power, as the world sadly knows today, can be used for evil as well as good. If education then is to be valuable to mankind and helpful to humanity it must be inspired by motives that are right and intentions that are noble. In short, it must be education based upon moral principles, ethical ideals and shot through and through with the Christian spirit. Education that is not based upon morality and religion is worse than no education at all. Knowledge without character is devilish and dangerous.

You and I should feel profoundly grateful this evening and rejoice that it was our good fortune to attend Boston University which believes in this kind of education and which inculcates these principles. Thousands upon thousands of our fellow alumni—judges, legislators, administrators, artists, musicians, business executives, captains of industry, bishops, and ministers of the gospel, architects and builders, common laborers, humble folks in all the walks of life, rich and poor, Gentile and Jew, Protestant and Catholic, men and women of every race, creed, and color—are bringing not only enlightenment to the poor distressed peoples of the world but are instilling the spirit of God into the hearts of men. They are sowing seeds of good will and spreading the spirit of brotherhood throughout the world.

Judging from the present status of the world's vortex of rebellion and slaughter, it would seem that we had failed in our task but we have not. True, today is one of the dark pages in the world's history but it is one of those periodic transitions through which the world has passed before. The world bleeds but hope never dies. Every cloud has its silver lining. Christ himself had His Golgotha. The purest beauty is born of pain and the greatest understanding comes through suffering. Much rubbish will be consumed by this terrifying conflagration. This awful present carnage will cease some day and mankind will turn its attention and efforts away from destruction to the building of a better world.

Imbued with the teachings and the spirit of this great institution, our Boston University family will convince men through reason and by example rather than at the point of a bayonet or through intolerant dogmas that the real enemies of America and of mankind are poverty, disease, ignorance, intolerance, and injustice. Cannon cannot destroy ideas; torpedoes cannot sink ideals.

Boston University itself has had her Gethsemanes. During the recent prolonged, unparalleled, and devastating depression this great beacon light of learning, which holds out hope, peace, and progress to the world, has faced many trials. Notwithstanding her present inadequate equipment and lack of proper facilities, in spite of reduced income on endowment investments, and though tuition fees have dwindled because of smaller enrollments, this great institution has been writing its annual reports in black while our Federal Government has been writing its daily statements in red. More than once I have wished that we could bring such an able administrator as President Marsh down to Washington. I believe the country would welcome him. I know the taxpayers would get relief from his presence. Because of his broad vision, untiring industry, cautious planning, coordinating capacity, and administrative ability he has been able not only to keep this university's head above water while many others were sinking throughout the Nation, but he has improved its service, advanced its influence, and made it truly one of the great universities in the world today. No doubt Daniel L. Marsh has been discouraged at times, but his unconquerable faith in this institution and his burning desire to see its ideals make an indelible imprint upon the Nation and the world has enabled him to carry on successfully in the face of almost insuperable difficulties. Dr. Marsh has great dreams and hopes for the continued growth and development of Boston University, but he cannot do the job alone.

As loyal alumni of this blessed alma mater we should not only pledge him but give him our full and wholehearted cooperation in achieving such noble aims. This we can do by urging young men and women to attend Boston University, by giving of our own substance, by enlisting the help of others who can give and most of all by carrying the spirit of this great institution into the lives of those people who inhabit the communities where we live. Boston University teaches men both how to earn a living and how to live a life. The practical and theoretical sides of education are properly balanced.

When this present terrible war is all over the task of readjustment will be exceedingly difficult and the problem of reconstruction will be almost overwhelming. More than ever before Boston University and all kindred institutions will be needed to furnish the young men and young women in all walks of life to go out and erect a new and better civilization on the ruins of the old. That is our great challenge, and my earnest hope and fervent prayer is that each one of us will meet his own personal responsibility. Liberty has duties to perform as well as rights to enjoy. Hail to thee, Boston University! May God help you and your sons and daughters to preserve our American way of life.

Amendment of the Selective Training and Service Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, many of us are placed in a dilemma. We wish to support the provision providing for deferment. If we do we are compelled to support sections 2 and 3 which are an invasion of the rights of a free people.

You heard yesterday from the floor a statement that sections 2 and 3 of this act were the best legislation ever designed to preserve and protect the rights of labor, and that labor should welcome it. In substance, Hitler said the same thing to Austria and to all invaded countries. Quisling said it to the Norwegians. The wolf said it to Little Red Riding Hood. I hope no one is so naive as to believe this. Both labor and industry have much to fear from this legislation. I have sat on both sides of the equation. From that experience—over 35 years—I garner the fact that you cannot have compulsory or enchained labor and a high morale. Free Americans are unaccustomed to that method. Enchained labor means the lash. It is the method of the dictator. Do we want that here?

Let us be logical for a moment. Admitted that a few subversives have caused trouble, do you propose to use compulsion on 40,000,000 of our free American citizens to throttle these comparative few? Would not the logical procedure be to reach in and stifle this few if they be criminal and dangerous? A strike is a symptom of discontent and unhappiness. You cannot order a symptom to cease manifesting itself. That can only be done by finding the cause and then providing the remedy. It is a delicate mechanism to which our American life is geared. Interference with any part has its reverberations throughout the whole structure. In the hysteria of the day, with which we are afflicted too, we are prone to do something which will damage the structure forever.

Adequate American Air Force

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED F. BEITER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

POEM WRITTEN FOR THE AMERICAN DEFENSE ASSOCIATION

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a poem written for the American Defense Association, of Washington, D. C., by Col. J. E. Myers, retired, president, in behalf of its efforts for air-mindedness and preparedness in the Americas:

EAGLE WINGS

(Dedicated to the creation of an adequate American air force by T. M.)

From Flanders fields the anguished souls of men
Once called to us, and now they call again,
To grasp the torch they tossed; to hold it high;
And keep it ever flaming in the sky—
In Freedom's cause.

America, the dreamer, from her sleep,
Shakes off the dust of slumber; and, at last,
Resolved her consecrated vow to keep,
Doth now begin to fill the heavens, vast—
With eagle wings.

Behold! the vault will darken with her planes,
And with the storm of motors full resound;
Now, will she change from woeful lack to gains,
And seek expansion to the utmost bounds—
Of eagle wings.

Who rules the air shall also rule the sea,
And land, and all and everything beside;
'Tis ours to serve the cause of Liberty,
And turn the Armageddon battletide—
With eagle wings.

We must not fail: split seconds yet may spell
World liberation from a Nazi hell;
And thus, while "larks still bravely singing, fly,"
We'll keep the faith with all of those who die—
In Freedom's cause.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 4, 1941.

Cooperation With Our Neighbors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. HART

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. RAYMOND H. GEIST AT WEEHAWKEN'S GOOD-NEIGHBOR NATIONS EXPOSITION

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, last month there was conducted under the auspices of the town of Weehawken, N J., a good-neighbor nations exposition. The exposition continued throughout 5 full days and nights and was attended by many thousands of people from Weehawken and adjacent communities. The exhibits were furnished not only by many of the leading industries of America, but by a number of official representatives of Mexico and Central and South American republics. The exposition was highly educational in character and gave considerable impetus to the American policy of cementing closer and friendlier relationships with those countries.

Hon. John G. Meister, mayor of Weehawken, and the town officials who cooperated with him in the development and conduct of this novel exposition, are to be highly commended for their patriotic enterprise. So far as I know, they have set a precedent and, as well, have furnished a laudable example for other municipalities throughout the land.

One of the important features of the exposition was the opening address delivered in the presence of several thousand auditors by Hon. Raymond H. Geist, Chief of the Division of Commercial Affairs of the United States Department of State. The impression made by Mr. Geist will long remain with those whose privilege it was to hear his inspiring and instructive address. Mr. Geist is, of course, an expert on the commercial relations of the United States with our Latin American neighbors and the information and ideas which he transmitted in such effective fashion to his multitude of hearers must necessarily be productive of a greater understanding on their part of the desirability of closer cooperation with the other nations of this hemisphere, as well as a greater understanding of the objectives and ideals of these people.

Mr. Geist's address follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, it is an honor to participate in the opening of this exposition which you have dedicated to the Americas and to the task of creating a common feeling of good will and esprit de corps among the nations of this hemisphere. It is a tribute to the citizens of Weehawken and the leaders of this city that you are willing to devote your energies not only to fostering civic progress in your own community, but to turn your attention to all the countries of these continents, and as has been announced, send greetings to the Americas, all the way from the northernmost tip of Alaska to the southernmost part of South America; from the Aleutian Islands to Cape Horn. By creating this exposition you give reality to an effort commonly made by the citizens of this city to foster good will and knit together closer bonds of our country with the pan-American nations. I congratulate you upon this undertaking and applaud you for the vision you manifest.

Today the greatest civilization in the world is established in these continents of the west which we call North and South America. All the riches of the earth are here distributed far and wide throughout the broad expanse of almost limitless territory. We are free peoples. The freedom which we have inherited from our fathers is our most precious possession. It is our common purpose to bequeath that freedom to our children, so safe-guarded and strengthened, that they may bequeath it to theirs; and so from generation to generation down the long vista of time.

The traditions upon which the culture of the New World is founded have their origins in eras and epochs which have passed, and among the nations of the Old World whose histories have been darkened by devastating conflicts and where millions have suffered and are again suffering the horrors of war. From the scenes of those age-old struggles our forefathers came to found a new world, where success in the quest for happiness and well-being was assured. They came not with any hatred in their hearts for the lands that they had left, but, inspired by a hope that life in the Americas would be worth while, they sought to establish better homes for themselves and their posterity. The millions who live in these continents today have realized much of the better life they sought; and the determination that it shall continue is the steady purpose of all. But this purpose can be achieved only by a common and united effort to make Americanism and the future of the Americas the aspiration and motive of every citizen. We in this country are proud to be Americans. Our allegiance to our country and to the American way of life is unshakable. And our loyalty extends further. We welcome the closest ties of friendship and sympathy with the peoples of all the countries in this hemisphere. Our neighbors to the south and our neighbors to the north share with us a common destiny. That destiny is to advance civilization, to make life nobler, and preserve those institutions upon which well-being depends. It has been the policy of the American people and of the American Government to foster and promote good relations between the nations of the Americas; but never in the history of these continents has this impetus found more common acceptance than now. In international relations, as in human friendships, the value of such ties depends upon the service rendered, and not upon the material advantages which may be obtained. This great Nation of ours, with all its wealth and resources, with its manifold actualities and potentialities of leadership, has much to offer fully and honestly to its neighbors. This, I understand, is the purpose of organizing the Good Neighbor Nations' Exposition at Weehawken. In giving intercontinental emphasis to the Pan American ideal, we wish to make our western civilization the product of a common effort in which we all participate and of which we all partake. We are disposed to place at the service of the other nations in North, Central, and South America the vast experience that we have acquired in developing our resources, industries, educational and cultural institutions. We wish to make available to all the processes by which we have raised the standard of living in this country and fostered health among our people. We wish to acquire from our sister republics to the south and from our neighbor to the north those peculiar advantages of civilized life which they have developed by their genius, industry, and talent.

At this particular time in our history, when the impact of world events arouses us to greater effort on behalf of the general health and strength of every individual in our commonwealth, the promotion of closer relations between the countries of this hemisphere in matters of public welfare are most important. The development of new machinery, and the technological progress made in this country through research and study, which costs millions of dollars annually and the efforts of thousands of scientists, engineers, and specialists, are advances made for all the nations in this hemisphere and not for the United States alone.

It will ever be the chief concern of mankind, as it was from the beginning of the human race, to develop the art of agriculture and the natural fruits of the soil, as here in New Jersey, the Garden State. Those countries of the earth are especially fortunate whose basic industry and commerce have had their origins in the products of rich and fruitful lands, which have not only provided sustenance for the inhabitants but also surpluses for other peoples living beyond the national borders.

The inventive genius of man during the last hundred years has made such progress that the existence of human life has become revolutionized. And where this process has been to ameliorate the lot of mankind and to make commonly available advantages which previously were reserved for the few or entirely unknown, the nations of the earth have been uplifted and advanced definitely to a higher standard. It is fitting, too, that enterprises which have as their object not alone the furthering of commerce, but the advancement of knowledge and technical skill should receive common support.

The Government of the United States has initiated a program of cooperation with the other American republics which has been conceived in the spirit of friendly and neighborly service and designed to make available, wherever it is desired and needed, technical progress and development. The Congress has made appropriations and approved legislation, in support of the policy of the United States, to further in every practical way the development of cordial and friendly relations with our neighbors to the south. This willingness of the United States to assist its sister republics in the utilization of their resources and the expansion of their industries has met with cordial reception, and considerable progress has been made since the inception of the program. Experts have also been detailed for a limited period to collaborate with governments in South America in an advisory capacity in connection with the development of their resources and the furtherance of their public projects.

In this general program of cooperation with the other nations of this hemisphere, probably none will be of more interest than the projects involving the collaboration of the Department of Agriculture. The chief of these are the investigations being carried on and projected in connection with complimentary trade. As you know, in recent years, since the inauguration of the trade-agreements program which Secretary Hull has so earnestly fostered and promoted, the attention of the American Government has been devoted to every phase of international commercial relations. It has been our concern not only to sell American products and manufactured goods in foreign markets but to buy the products and goods of other countries in this hemisphere as well. The time has come when American merchants must give as much attention, if indeed not more, to the possibilities of buying from other countries as to the opportunities of selling. If our neighbors have resources which are now only partially developed, and which we need as normal consumers or users in our industrial processes, we should hasten to assist them, in order that the production of such resources increase and that our purc' ases from them become larger.

We are bound, in view of the gravity of the international situation, to dedicate ourselves to finding a realistic solution of the problems which consequently arise in our economic and trade relations with other countries, particularly with our neighbors in the Americas. We must take a long-range view of these economic problems, and endeavor to build up a permanent trade on a complementary basis. We must sell to our neighbors the things which we produce and which they need; and we must buy from them the products which we need and of which they produce more than they need. We can exchange our goods for many products grown in tropical and subtropical areas. The Department of Agriculture has undertaken projects which will eventually enable us to obtain an increasing amount of such products from our neighbors in the south. The list of noncompetitive products which we can import from Central and South America is constantly increasing, and efforts are being made to expand it still further. One has only to mention woods from the forests of the Amazon and Orinoco, tropical oils, plants, seeds, and fibers. The surveys undertaken by the Department of Agriculture cover investigations and geological studies in soils, climatic factors, plant experimentation in the tropical areas of the other American republics. Certain of these acts of cooperation, notably that of defense, may be necessary only while our common peace and tranquility are threatened; but in those spheres of collaboration, of which the results are permanently beneficial, we shall continue to march together after the present turmoil in world affairs has ceased.

Much emphasis has been placed repeatedly upon the obligations of our Government to assist in establishing sound economy and mutually beneficial international trade among the nations of this hemisphere. Our own Government, in collaboration with the other nations of the Americas, is moving as swiftly, as resolutely and as directly in the solution of all our problems as government can; but business and industry cannot be spectators in this historical and epochal effort. The whole weight of our national strength, marshaled and set in motion under the leadership of our captains of industry and commerce must move forward to the task. The Government of the United States, through the various departments and independent agencies, is facing these questions, not only in our own behalf, but with the determination of securing for all the countries in the western world the maximum of prosperity and well-being. Moreover, the loyal cooperation of all the governments concerned is essential to ultimate success. If the long-range program of making all the nations on this side of the Atlantic economically sound and stable is to succeed, there will be required as well the unstinted cooperation of all the financial, industrial and commercial interests of all the countries in the Americas.

You are today celebrating the friendship existing between the United States and the other nations of the Americas. President Roosevelt announced what is known as the good-neighbor policy in his inaugural address in 1933 when he used the following words: "In the field of world policy I would dedicate this Nation to the policy of the good neighbor—the neighbor who resolutely respects himself and because he does so, respects the rights of others—the neighbor who, respects his obligations and respects the sanctity of his agreements in and with a world of neighbors." Furthermore, the President said that the policy of the good neighbor is "a policy which can never be unilateral. In stressing it the American Republics appreciate, I am confident, that it is bilateral and multilateral and that the fair dealing which it implies must be reciprocated."

The good-neighbor policy which the President proclaimed in his first inaugural address 8 years ago has inspired the peoples of this hemisphere to work together for those ideals and principles which may be shared and cherished in a great international community such as ours in the western world. In paying a tribute to the statesmen who in this hemisphere have laid the foundations for a lasting peace among us let me finally quote the words of our great Secretary of State from an address which he made in New York in 1937:

"What a boon to humanity it would be if other groups of nations were, at this crucial stage in world affairs, to give their plighted faith to a similar undertaking—if they were, in a spirit of peace, unity, and moral consecration, to reassert and revitalize the law of nations, international morality, and treaty obligations, and to pledge solemn observance of the doctrine of the equality, the sovereignty, the territorial integrity, and the liberty of all nations."

The Bishops Speak

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

EDITORIAL FROM THE BOSTON POST

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Post of July 7, 1941:

[From the Boston Post of July 7, 1941]

THE BISHOPS SPEAK

With a boom of thunder that reverberated around the world, the first fissure in the impregnable armor of the Nazi hosts developed yesterday.

Although long predicted by many out of sheer wishful thinking and by a few in position to know internal conditions, the source of the crack in the vaunted invincible shield, came as a surprise to practically all.

On the basis of common sense and past experiences of history, it was apparent that the politico-military might with which Hitler confronted the world had its weakness.

Some thought the first break would come from the belt tightening, due to food shortages, reaching the limit of endurance. Others felt that lack of fuel would be responsible. And more even considered the remote possibility that the Germans themselves would tire of the soldiering and bloodletting.

But the appearance of the disaffection on the religious front, coming with such force and suddenness, so outspoken and so daring, is bound to have greater effect than even a serious military set-back.

The vigorous condemnation by the bishops of greater Germany, of what the Nazis were doing to the Catholic religion, must have come as a shock to the Sabbath congregations yesterday, because it was the first protest from the pulpits since the Nazis marched on Poland in 1939 and, more so, because the bishops resolved the situation into a battle for "the existence or nonexistence of Christ" in Germany.

But the pronouncement held other implications that went deeper. It came at a time when Hitler and his hosts are trying to give the impression to their people and the world that the march on godless Russia is something of a holy crusade which should be applauded.

Deeper still was the fact that the bishops stressed where the message was drawn up—at the tomb of St. Boniface in Fulda. To German Catholics that held much meaning.

St. Boniface is known as the apostle of Germany, having been a great missionary who converted the heathens, organized the Catholic Church, and died a martyr at the hands of infidels in Germany in 755.

The emphasizing of St. Boniface will rankle the Nazis bitterly, for in a day when they were trying to devise a state religion, based on gods out of mythology, St. Boniface is remembered in legend for having destroyed a sacred oak of Thor at Hesse.

Since Catholics make up more than 34 percent of the population of Greater Germany, the dissenting party does not constitute any weak minority.

The single rent in the shield may not make it very vulnerable. But whether concessions are made to the Catholics or Himmler, with his bully boys, goes to work on church defiant, the break will not mend easily.

And it would be a sort of poetic justice if the spirit of St. Boniface, who was born and educated in England and began his missionary career from that island which is the stumbling block of the Nazis, should start Hitler along the road to ruin.

National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS ROLPH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ARTICLE FROM THE SAN FRANCISCO CHRONICLE

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the San Francisco Chronicle regarding national defense.

On Sunday, June 29, the San Francisco Chronicle issued a notable defense edition, and congratulations should be extended to the entire management and personnel for the patriotic motives which prompted this splendid edition.

It reflects signal honor on George T. Cameron, publisher, and Paul C. Smith, editor. These gentlemen are brilliantly carrying on the forward-looking public policies sponsored by the late Gen. M. H. de Young, who for many years was the dominant personality on the Chronicle. This newspaper not only wields a powerful influence in California—it is one of America's truly great dailies.

The defense edition graphically sets forth how the many essential raw materials and natural resources of California are being coordinated and developed so as to be the more readily available for the Nation's defense program.

One article in the paper entitled "What You, the Individual, Can Do To Aid in Defense," explains how each individual may serve. While the suggestions and instructions refer particularly to the citizens of San Francisco, nonetheless, they are applicable to every community in the United States. It reads as follows:

[From the San Francisco Chronicle of June 29, 1941]

WHAT YOU, THE INDIVIDUAL, CAN DO TO AID IN DEFENSE

Buy United States Defense Bonds. They're on sale at post offices and banks. MArket 2500 will give you information.

Manufacturers should register their facilities with the Defense Contract Service located in the Federal Reserve Bank Building.

Offer your services to the Red Cross and other relief agencies. Red Cross headquarters are at 1136 Eddy Street. WAlnut 3011.

Participate in civil defense activities. Watch for the mayor's committee, which will soon begin registration of local citizens for parts they may wish to play. In Alameda County address letters to Ralph E. Hoyt, district attorney, Alameda County Courthouse. In other cities contact chiefs of police. State Guard and the State Guard aviation section are looking for men. San Francisco headquarters are at National Guard Armory at Fourteenth and Mission. Contacts may be made Monday and Thursday nights after 7 o'clock.

Don't hoard food supplies or spread tales of price raises—the United States Government is watching them and will exercise control where necessary.

Better yourself for participation in defense by study at home or night school. For information call the Board of Education at HEmlock 4680. If you are unemployed and have mechanical knowledge or experience, register with the State Employment Service at 154 Sansome Street: EXbrook 5656.

Radio amateurs can help the Federal Communications Commission police the air waves by reporting unusual disturbances to the local inspector at Customs House: SUtter 6208.

Be watchful but not an "investigator"—report suspicious activities to the proper authorities—F. B. I. headquarters are at 111 Sutter: EXbrook 2679; S. F. Police Department: SUtter 2030.

Be courteous and helpful to men of the armed forces.

Plan entertainment and parties for men of the armed forces.

Hon. Morris Sheppard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. U. S. GUYER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. U. S. GUYER OF KANSAS

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address I delivered May 11, 1941, at the Calvary Baptist Church in Washington, D. C., on the occasion of the memorial to the late Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD, of Texas:

Shakespeare, in his tragedy of greatness, put upon the lips of Marc Antony the naked truth concerning human grandeur. Antonius was standing above the body of his assassinated friend and comrade, that "piece of bleeding earth," that pathetic clay that but yesterday was Julius Caesar "whose word might have stood against the world." As he gazed upon the prostrate form he exclaimed:

"O Mighty Caesar! dost thou lie so low?
Are all thy conquests, glories, triumphs, spoils,
Shrunk to this little measure?"

Massillon delivering the funeral oration of Louis XIV in the Cathedral of Notre Dame, declared: "Dieu, seul est grand." God alone is great. Such is the tragedy of human greatness. So the old Romans said: "Sic trancit gloria mundi." So passes the glory of the world.

But Senator Sheppard in his long and notable career achieved more than is the lot of most of our national legislators. He was an idealist, he was devoted to an idea, and ideas rule the world.

I want to speak briefly only of one of his ideas. That idea was temperance and his unyielding fidelity to the cause of prohibition. In that he sincerely believed to the day of his death. I always looked forward to the 16th of January for Senator Sheppard's annual address on that subject. He believed from the bottom of his heart that repeal is and has been a monumental failure and every year he marshaled his facts to prove it.

He saw the rising tide of drunkenness and a kindred brood of evils ever increasing, and he exposed the tragic facts in most striking and eloquent words. The agencies and causes of these conditions he fought early and late wherever he found them. His sincerity and earnestness disarmed even those who disagreed with him. Those who diametrically opposed his ideas regarding the liquor traffic had great respect for his character and admired his unflinching fidelity to his principles. His place in this worthy cause will be difficult to fill.

NEVER LOST FAITH

Senator SHEPPARD did not share in the despair and apathy of most advocates of this reform but remained firm and active during all the fluctuating fortunes of this cause. For instance, it was not difficult for one to go along with the crowd when I first came to the House in 1924 when the so-called wets could not muster enough votes to successfully demand a roll call. Then it was easy to ride along with the tide of public opinion, which favored the eighteenth amendment by great majorities. But the time came when it was the reverse when it is impossible for the drys to muster enough votes to order a roll call. But this only aroused the Senator to renewed faith and activity which he directed toward convincing the people that repeal was a tragic mistake and that it had proved a great failure in every sense.

As Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs he strove to banish intoxicating beverages from training camps where our soldier youth are to be trained. He would have exempted them from the temptation to indulge in intoxicating liquors. The Congress should pass his bill for that purpose as a monument to his integrity and his interest in the welfare of our soldier youth. He believed with Gladstone that strong drink had caused more misery and suffering than war, pestilence, and famine combined, and so believing he never ceased to wage a relentless battle against the traffic in ardent spirits.

On January 16, 1941, as usual he delivered his address on prohibition and I quote from the last few sentences of that last address of his on the 16th of January.

"I CONDEMN ALCOHOL"

I quote: "Mr. President, I condemn beverage alcohol as a threat to the health, happiness, and prosperity of our citizenship. I condemn it as a contributing factor in the premature death of hundreds of thousands of our people. I condemn it as a charge upon the public, intolerable in an era of strenuous effort toward national security and defense. I condemn it because an alcohol-drinking democracy cannot develop the maximum strength for national defense."

That was the last of these speeches of January 16 and it is a fine testimony to his fidelity and the faith that was in his heart—a fitting exit from his career in the Senate.

I know of no better manner of concluding this faltering eulogy of Senator SHEPPARD who has gone to the land of his dreams than by quoting a little poem by the great dramatic critic, William Winter:

"One other bitter drop to drink,
And then—no more!
One little pause upon the brink,
And then—go o'er!
One sigh—and then the lib'rant morn
Of perfect day,
When my free spirit, newly born,
Shall soar away.
One pang—and I shall rend the thrall
Where grief abides,
And generous Death shall show me all
That now he hides;
And, lucid in that second birth,
I shall discern,
What all the sages of the earth
Have died to learn."

Addresses Nineteenth Biennial Convention of Catholic Daughters of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARY T. NORTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ADDRESS OF DR. JOHN K. CARTWRIGHT

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the REC-

ORD, I include the following address by Dr. John K. Cartwright, chaplain, Court District of Columbia, at Mayflower luncheon of Nineteenth Biennial Convention of Catholic Daughters of America, Tuesday, July 8, 1941:

There is no subject today which comes more closely home to men's business and bosoms than peace. We who live in the region of uncertain twilight between peace and war are most conscious today of this great problem. We used to live (we who are in middle life) we used to live in a social climate where peace had reigned so long that we took it to be the normal and almost necessary condition of mankind. But two great shocks separated by the 25 years that make our adult life have deprived us of that easy confidence. After an earthquake one loses the sense of security that one had about the terra firma. After 1914 and 1939 we begin to wonder whether all the rest of our life will be spent under gloom and disaster. "Never bright confident morning again."

The world is full of men and women with advice and bright suggestions. These suggestions have their merits and demerits; their chief fault at the moment seems to be their bewildering multiplicity. But if we look beneath the surface and analyze them in their real nature, we shall find that they fall predominantly into two classes of proposals. The one class of suggestion is in the nature of mechanics: We are told to shift the boundaries and shuffle the treaties and change the parliamentary arrangements, and put the balance of material power securely within the grasp of one group. The other class of suggestion is along the line of political idealism and is expressed in terms of class justice or international morality or the spirit of democracy or the respect for freedom. Along one or other of these lines most of the remedies seem to run. But both lines of thought seem to run very much upon the surface of human nature and to hold out very little hope of a solution radical enough to deal with our very radical international disease of war. For to propose a mechanism (such as a new league of nations or a union now) is to presuppose a spirit. And to propose a spirit in the body politic (such as love of freedom or democracy) is to presuppose a spirit in the millions of individuals who make up this body or bodies politic. There is nothing wrong with many of the proposed mechanisms, as such. There is nothing wrong with the spirit of freedom or democracy, as such. The wrong of the world today is deeper seated. It is a decay of the spirit of religion in the hearts of individual men and women. The spirit of freedom is great, but it is not a source. The spirit of democracy is glorious, but it is not a primary nor a fundamental thing. What is wanted to inspire these spirits is the spirit of all spirits in every individual being.

This spirit is lacking in too many millions of people today to give us any hope for peace until it is restored.

Twenty-seven centuries ago a little nation was surrounded and engulfed by a totalitarian peril. The people of Israel in their unpreparedness were menaced with destruction by the horses and chariots of the Assyrians, which were the tanks and bombers, the mechanized instruments of evil of that day. Doubtless there were captains and rulers in Israel—and even politicians and even statesmen who found the remedy for their troubles in mechanization, in treaties, and in whatever corresponded to the spirit of democracy 2,700 years ago. But one great statesman, the prophet Isaias, told them that "not in chariots and not in horsemen but in the Lord God is your strength." "And there shall come forth a rod out of the root of Jesse—and the spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him. He shall not judge according to the sight of his eyes. He shall not judge according to the hearing of the ears. And justice shall be the girdle of his loins and faith the girdle of his reins." Then and then only, according to the prophet, then and then only, when justice and faith shall be the spirit of the people, then and then only "the wolf shall dwell with the lamb and the leopard shall lie down with the kid"; then and then only will they turn their swords into plowshares and their spears into sickles; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they be exercised any more to war. "O house of Jacob, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord."

For 2,700 years that has been the true philosophy of politics, national and international. For 2,700 years the true heroes of the nations, the true statesmen and benefactors and thinkers of mankind, have raised that standard only to have it thrown down and trampled by the peoples before they turned to trample on each other. For 2,000 years the center and rallying point of those who believed in that message has been the chair of the supreme pontiffs. Today amidst all the clamor and agony of war, amidst all the confusion of the counselors of peace, amidst all the shifting of the battle lines, amidst all the changes of politics and strategies, amidst it all there is a watchman who cries out to the world the need of peace and the secret of peace—the spirit of religion and brotherhood in the multitudinous hearts and under the myriad countenances of men.

We can be frightened—as we are—at the cruelty and destructiveness of war. We can be alarmed—as we are—at the opportunities for the encroachment of tyranny. But our chief enemy today is neither the explosives that tear down our cities nor the drums and trampling of the tyrants who seek the possession of our souls. Our enemy—our veritable enemy—our profound enemy—our permanent enemy—is the moral irresponsibility and intellectual malice of those who conceal from the minds of men or who pervert in the hearts of men the message of the spiritual which is the secret of their peace. The hideous criminals who march under the swastika and under the hammer and sickle are at least hideous enough to chill our hearts with hatred. The real, lurking, menacing, destructive foe is the unspiritual, irreligious, intelligentsia who are depriving the youth of all people of their trust in God, and with it of the basis of all faith, of all courage, of all loyalty, and of all freedom.

Against armies we can be protected by armies; against tyranny we can be protected by the institution of democracy and the spirit of freedom. But who shall keep democracy wholesome and who shall keep freedom free? Only the spirit of spirits, only the freedom of all freedoms, only the spirit of the Lord and the freedom wherewith Christ has made us free.

Catholic women, you have come here to the Capital of the Nation which you love. You will find much here to reinspire your loyalty as Americans. But that American loyalty will be inspired by nothing so much as by the abiding faith which, as Catholics, you hold in the goodness of God and in your responsibility to Him for patriotism and for civic duty. No American can love his country more than you and few as well as you who love it because God gave it to you. No American can serve the institution of freedom and democracy more than you—and few so well as you who receive your citizenship as a sacred trust. No American can look to the future with more hope than you—and few with as much hope as you who see in the greatest of this country's blessings the opportunity for the exercise of the greatest of all the freedoms—the freedom for the soul to be a soul and to honor the primacy of the spiritual in the individual, in the home, and in the family. No American can honor the national monuments of Washington more than you—and few as well as you who have received from Rome the message of the spiritual which from the days of the prophet has contained the secret of peace for all the nations and tongues of men.

For in Rome today, as in the ages past, is the center of the primacy of the spiritual for all the world of men. Rome once faced the barbarism of filth and ignorance, and won that age to civilization and to light. Today Rome faces the barbarism of mechanized power and herd psychology and it will again be her voice that will bring the nations to sanity and peace.

Some might think, looking at today's disaster—some might think that we have come to the brink of the end. Some do think thus, even some in America. But that is not the feeling of those who look on history with faith. Not on the brink of destruction do we stand, but on the threshold of a new empire, of an empire which will measure its limits not with the Rhine and the Danube but with the very poles of the world; an empire that shall at last show into Christ the fair harvest of all nations and the tongues of men, an empire whose census will be taken not by Cyrenius and the tetrarchs, not by the filing systems of the soviet of world republics, but by the recording angels and ministers of grace. Of that empire each nation shall be the shining province, and our own country shall attain within that spiritual realm the crown of its destiny. That empire will depend not on mechanical institutions and not on secondary loyalties. It will be a spiritual dominion that will rest on loyalty to Christ and that will find in Him its peace and its glory. Of that spiritual dominion the capital will be eternal Rome—not the Rome of Romulus and Caesar, not the Rome of the barbaric kings, not the Rome of Pius, that is the Rome of Peter, the spiritual citadel that is the Rome of God.

Kenneth Farrand Simpson

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 18, 1941

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. KENNETH FARRAND SIMPSON, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, as a representative of this House, I attended the funeral of my neighbor and friend, KENNETH F. SIMPSON. The religious services were held at St. James Protestant Episcopal Church in Manhattan. Gathered at the church, to pay tribute to Congressman SIMPSON, were throngs of men and women of every religious, political, and racial group.

By long and constant service to his political party he was recognized as a student of government and as an astute leader of men. While he was an ardent partisan, he was considerate of the views of his political adversaries.

Throughout his adult life the Republican Party honored him with positions of importance and trust. His useful career was capped with further distinction in his election as a Member of this great legislative body. While his service was brief, he made a most favorable impression here in Washington and gave evidence that he would have brought to his new high position the same degree of capability, industry, and energy that marked his life as a distinguished lawyer and public official.

He left a devoted wife and four lovely children.

FOR HE WALKED WITH MEN AND UNDERSTOOD

Here was a man whose heart was good,
Who walked with men and understood.
His was a voice that spoke to cheer,
And fell like music on the ear.
His was a smile men loved to see
His was a hand that asked no fee
For friendliness or kindness done.
And now that he has journeyed on,
His is a fame that never ends
And leaves behind uncounted friends.

Demands for American Blood To Fight Great Britain's War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

ARTICLES FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES AND THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper articles:

[From the New York Times of July 5, 1941]

WAVELL SEES NEED FOR A NEW A. E. F.—BRITISH GENERAL ASSERTS NAZIS WILL BE BEATEN EVENTUALLY BY INVASION OF GERMANY

(By Harold Denny)

CAIRO, EGYPT, July 4—Gen. Sir Archibald P. Wavell, soon to relinquish his post as commander-in-chief in the Middle East, in which he has won the greatest distinction of any British soldier in this war, discussed the war today in an informal interview that may be considered as his valedictory to the command he is leaving.

In his office he reminisced briefly on the victories and defeats of the past glorious and tragic months and, responding to conversational questions, sketched opinions as to the future that are of special interest at this critical point in American and world history.

The most interesting of these from the American point of view sum up to this:

Whatever happens in eastern Europe, where the Germans and Russians are battling, the final issue of the war will be decided in the west, as it was in the last war, and in the end it will be a battle of manpower.

HE EXPECTS LONG WAR

If the war continues long enough—and General Wavell appears to have no illusions that this will be a short war if it is to be effectively and permanently won—American manpower will be needed. Our airplanes, tanks, and guns, decisive though their aid has been in helping Britain hold out this long, will not be enough. There is a limit to Britain's own manpower.

Germany can and will be beaten eventually by an invasion of her soil after she has been hammered sufficiently from the air.

When and where American troops should eventually be employed are matters to be determined by events.

Britain has no intention of abandoning this theater of war.

General Wavell's conclusions on the part the United States may play, though they coincide with those of many highly placed Americans, were not volunteered by him, but were disclosed only in replies to specific questions and sometimes were revealed more by inference than by statements. Like every other high British official, he has studiously avoided advising Americans what they should do.

The interview was given to only two correspondents, Frank Gervasi, of Collier's, and the writer, who had been trying to arrange it for some time—not an easy thing to do, for the general has a terrific working schedule. Once one gains access to him, General Wavell proves once more what every reporter learns early, that the bigger the man the more gracious he is.

The commander in chief's office, in a big Cairo office building taken over by general headquarters, has no hint of war except maps, studded with pins, that almost entirely cover the paneled walls. There are no other decorations. On a large, plain flat-topped desk are reports from subordinates and a few reference books.

The general left his desk as we entered and led us to a small table in a corner where we could talk close together in complete informality. The general apologized for his shirt sleeves. He has a fine military bearing, listens carefully, and speaks directly to you in the language of an orderly, well-stocked mind and gives the impression of perfect frankness and intellectual honesty.

It was evident General Wavell was relinquishing this command with some regret although he looks tired and in great need of rest. Everywhere among subordinate officers one finds regret at the general's leaving.

"How do you feel about your new post, General?" was the opening question.

"I was in India 30 years ago as a subaltern," he replied. "It will be a new job and quite a change. I have had 2 quite strenuous years here. We have had our ups and downs, Auchinleck (Gen. Claude J. E. Auchinleck who will succeed General Wavell in the Mideast command) is a very good soldier. It will be a good thing to have a fresh mind work on this situation. If one is too long in one place he is likely to become fixed in his thoughts about it. A fresh mind may see things in a new perspective."

Then the conversation began roving over the whole subject of the war, beginning with the present Russian-German conflict. It can hardly be reported chronologically for topics were begun and dropped and then resumed in some other connection.

STRESSES IMPORTANCE OF PLANES

General Wavell avoided any predictions as to the outcome or duration of the Russo-German war except to indicate that air power might prove the controlling factor there and that the German air force was strong. But he saw Germany assuming many disadvantages from the point of view of the war as a whole in plunging into the east.

"Germany in this war, as in the last, has been able thus far to operate from a central position and rely upon her existing network of railways, waterways, and highways to move her weight westward or eastward as she required," he said. "Meanwhile we have had to move and maneuver on the outside of that circle at long distances from our sources of supply.

"Germany, by this drive eastward, has lengthened her line of communication while ours remains constant—and our supplies are coming in increasing quantities from America.

"Can Germany sweep through the Caucasus, Iran, and Iraq?" came another question.

"We cannot speak of sweeping," said the General. "Communications there are bad and the terrain is difficult. Russia's strength lies in the vastness of her numbers, her lack of communications, her ability to withdraw long distances and continue withdrawing.

"If the Germans penetrate deeply into the Ukraine they will find themselves in difficulties for they will be far from their bases; faced with the necessity of transporting supplies over a very long line of communication."

The question of all-out American participation in the war was launched with the writer's query, "Do you hold with the views that only tools are necessary to win the war?"

MORE MANPOWER NEEDED

General Wavell paused and answered, "No, undoubtedly we shall need manpower if the war continues long enough and I have no doubt it will.

"To my mind the west remains the decisive battlefield, notwithstanding this drive eastward, as it was in the last war. England must remain secure (meaning Britain cannot risk weakening home forces for fear of an attempt at invasion.) It will be a battle of manpower in the end."

[From the Christian Science Monitor of July 8, 1941]

"WIN ON NAZIS' SOIL," MIDDLE EAST CHIEF'S DICTUM TO BRITAIN

CAIRO, EGYPT, July 8.—Gen. Sir Claude Auchinleck, new commander in chief of British forces in the Middle East, said yesterday United States manpower was needed if the war is to be won properly—on Germany's own soil.

"And it must be won properly, not half won," he told correspondents.

The new commander, who exchanged posts with Gen. Sir Archibald P. Wavell last week, was former commander in chief in India.

"I've always thought the war must be won in Europe, in Germany, on Germany's own soil," he replied to queries.

"They must be beaten in the way Napoleon was beaten. Therefore, I see as much need for American manpower in this war as in the last. In 12, 14, or 24 months this need will certainly arise. How we are to get into the German's country is another matter, but ways and means will present themselves."

Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 10, 1941

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, daily we hear one or another Member of the Congress of the United States condemn labor and charge labor with being controlled by Communists. Labor is charged with being unfaithful and lacking in patriotism and loyalty in this national emergency. These Members insist that labor should be denied the right to strike in this national emergency. They demand that labor give its all to its country and sacrifice every right so that we may reach maximum production in order to help the democracies of the world. Yet this same group says nothing about the loyalty, the faithfulness, or the patriotism of industry in our national-defense program. This same group says nothing of those employers who refuse to recognize unions or even adhere to decisions of the National Labor Relations Board, an agency or instrumentality of the court. The fact that the earnings of all major industries in America have shown a tremendous increase over those of the preceding year is not even mentioned. Nothing is said about the increased living costs affecting the life and welfare of every workman and his family in America. And the majority of the press of America commends these statesmen and editorializes their stands. To be frank, I must say that the people of America do not get a true picture of the situation as it actually exists.

Labor is on the spot. Daily the newspapers headline stories of strikes in defense industries. The question now being publicly asked amounts to this: Will labor strike up the band for national defense, or will it merely strike? That question shows not only ignorance of the facts, but betrays a willful and criminal attempt to destroy labor's rights; to wipe out all the social gains of the New Deal, and to pervert the whole purpose of our national defense effort.

Is labor unreasonable in its demand? Should it seek wage increases now? Should it keep its right to strike in this emergency? These are vital questions which concern the entire Nation.

Has labor been unreasonable? Since May 1940, when our defense program really got under way, the number of strikes has decreased over that of the corresponding months in 1939. The total number of strikes for the present period is much less than for 1917 when we were actually at war. The right to strike is basic to all workers' rights and to all liberty in the United States. Without this right, labor has no real protection against low wages and decent living standards. Labor must keep this right in order to remain free, in order to keep and improve standards won over past years of struggle. Abraham Lincoln, one of our greatest Presidents, said: "Thank God we have a country where workingmen have the right to strike."

It should be clear that if our defense program is to defend democracy then every act which strengthens democracy is an integral part of our defense program. An increased standard of living is just as important as an increased schedule of airplane production. All the sacrifices necessary for democracy? Of course. But in view of our vast unused resources and the swollen industrial profits of the last months, it is sheer nonsense to say that labor must sacrifice living standards to enable this country to continue producing for defense.

My investigation with the Department of Labor verifies this statement, and I can quote no greater authority than the senior Senator from my State, Senator JAMES J. DAVIS, of Pennsylvania, who was Secretary of Labor under three Presidents, when voicing his opposition to antistrike legislation said:

> No one should be permitted to believe that labor troubles are more acute now than in the last World War period. In 1919 there were seven times as many workers involved in strikes as in 1940; and in 1917 there were twice as many strikes as in 1940.

There are now dozens of bills before Congress, including the bill now under consideration, designed to freeze wages, to penalize strikers, impose severe criminal penalties for pickets, Government seizure of plants, denial of wages to workers, to force compulsory mediation or the so-called cooling-off period, which are all aimed at the workmen of America. I am unalterably opposed to bills of this nature which attempt to force or regiment American workmen to the same status as the workmen of the totalitarian nations. This certainly will not bring about the national unity we are all clamoring for in this crucial period of our history. Collective bargaining and the right to strike has had behind it the support and influence of outstanding statesmen in this country, and the leaders of other countries throughout the world. Just within the last month Pope Pius XII made his plea to the people of the world for labor's right of collective bargaining; and just recently the Methodist National Conference Board made a declaration in favor of this same principle and stated that after a thorough 2-year investigation much of the propaganda, rumors, and statements against organized labor were erroneous and misleading. It is evident that we cannot force labor to do things by repressive legislation and it is my firm belief that in the Vinson bill and other similar measures now before Congress, the rights of organized labor now guaranteed under the law would be stricken down and destroyed.

Each day sees new proposals to take away the right to strike, or to curb that right so severely that its value to the workers will be destroyed. The greater part of the press of the Nation has been championing these proposals. Most of the schemes originate among Congressmen from poll-tax States who have very few industries in their districts, and who know very little about the problems of workmen in the industrial districts of America. One of the greatest antilabor campaigns in history is in the making, all aimed at labor's basic right—the right to withhold work in order to enforce a little share of those increased profits through higher wages so that the workmen of America can maintain decent standards of living, which bring about happiness, unity, and an invulnerable America. As the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, Congressman CASEY, so well stated to this House several days ago: "We must stem the hysteria that has enveloped this Congress, or we will be undermining the very democratic principles we are trying to preserve." Labor naturally is trying to fortify its position during this emergency in view of the profits of the large corporations of America. And I believe the vast majority of Congress will agree that if we are to maintain our present standard of living, labor is entitled to its share of profits for its "all-out" efforts in this national-defense program by means of increased wages to the average workmen. The following are undisputed facts of the 1940 profit figures of the six largest corporations of the United States:

Corporation	Profit	Workers employed	Average profit for worker employed
General Motors	$195,500,000	200,000	$917
American Telephone & Telegraph	188,544,052	260,000	725
Standard Oil	110,000,000	55,000	2,000
U. S. Steel	102,180,000	260,000	393
DuPont	99,900,000	65,800	1,550
General Electric	55,000,000	65,000	846

In other words, these six leading corporations made $776,000,000 profit in 1940, an average of $860 profit a year on each worker employed, over and above the wages paid to him.

For the first quarter of this year, the profits exceed the earnings of 1940 by approximately 15 percent, yet some Members of Congress denounce labor because of its attempt to secure increased wages commensurate with the increased cost of living. The Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation, represented for the first quarter ended March 31, 1941, profits of $4,160,507, after all charges were deducted. This compares with the net profit of only $1,134,611 for the same quarter last year. Yet we hear labor berated when it threatens to strike upon making a reasonable demand of industry for an increase in wage rate. We hear the cry of Communists in full control of labor in America. These statements grossly exaggerate the actual situation. True enough, there are some Communists in labor's ranks who have caused much of the unwarranted trouble. There are some Communists in labor's ranks who even refused to heed the warnings of labor's recognized leaders. But will we in Congress add to national unity by abolishing the right to strike, by forced cooling-off periods, or compulsory mediation, or by freezing wages and conditions by outlawing the union shop and pleasing the open shop by seizing struck plants, by penalizing pickets because of a few radicals—a very few in labor's ranks in America?

There are Communists among the businessmen of America. There are Communists in the colleges of America. There are Communists in the legal and medical professions. Communists are everywhere. But thank God, so few, yes; so very few. Can we condemn labor as a whole because of a few undesirable Communists within Labor's ranks? Would we by logical reasoning condemn the law profession, the medical profession, or any other profession because of some shysters or quacks or frauds in any of them? Of course not. Their respective obligations are to clean their own households. Labor is attempting to do just that, and is doing so with distinct credit. The number of strikes throughout the Nation has reached the lowest ebb since the early part of this year. The organized workers of this country are good, true, loyal, and patriotic Americans interested in the preservation of our democracy and of helping this country in this emergency. We cannot impose upon them undue hardship by the enactment of compulsory mediation, or totalitarian policies such as now rules the controlled countries of Nazi Germany and communistic Russia.

In the Thirty-first Congressional District of Pennsylvania, which I represent, the heart of the industrial district of America, and in which district are located the United States Steel Corporation, the Westinghouse Electric Co., the Westinghouse Airbrake Co., the McKeesport National Tube Co., the Edgar-Thompson Steel Works, the McClintock-Marshall Co., the Christy Park Works, the Firth-Sterling Steel Corporation, the Union Switch & Signal Co., Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corporation, the Glassport Copperweld Steel Co., the Pittsburgh Steel Foundry Co., and the United States Glass Co., represented by 18 local C. I. O. unions, comprising over 70,000 workmen engaged in national-defense work, there was not even the semblance of a strike. Industry and labor sat down at the counsel table and conciliated their differences with distinct satisfaction to all parties concerned. And my district is typical of every industrial community in America. It is unfair for Members of Congress and the press of America to condemn labor because of isolated infractions in remote sections of our Nation. Do the Members of this Congress wish to change this situation by enacting legislation to compel the workmen of our Nation to do anything contrary to their wishes and create hatred and enmity in the minds and hearts of labor toward Congress and the Government? Of course not. The greatest weapon in America is the morale of its people. To build morale and unity in America, industry and government must be considerate, just, and equitable in their dealings with the American workmen, as they, too, are sacrificing, and it is their sons who are serving this country in our armed forces during this emergency.

Let us deliberate with caution on these vital problems affecting the welfare of the workmen of the Nation, and if industry, labor, and Government, in a real spirit of national unity, will arbitrate and conciliate their differences in the good old American manner of give and take, America will continue to go forward in her progress as the greatest democracy in the world, where workmen will retain the priceless heritage given them by our forefathers, namely, freedom, justice, and equality.

I therefore request the committee to defeat these amendments.

Sixth Monthly Report of Government Finances, Fiscal Year 1941

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 14, 1941

LETTER AND STATEMENTS FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave previously granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and statements from the Secretary of the Treasury concerning receipts, expenditures, and the public debt. Each month, commencing with January of this year, I have placed similar exhibits in the RECORD. These statements bring the data down to the end of June, which marks the close of the fiscal year 1941. The material now presented shows the actual receipts, expenditures, and the status of the public debt for the completed fiscal years, 1940 and 1941, and similar data, on an estimated basis, for the fiscal year to end on June 30, 1942.

The totals relating to "expenditures" as set forth in these statements should not be confused with the totals of "appropriations." An appropriation is authority to spend money for a certain purpose. An expenditure is the actual drawing of money out of the Treasury pursuant to the authority of that appropriation. Generally speaking, "expenditures" from an appropriation can be spread over 3 different fiscal years, the larger proportion, however, being spent in the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made. It is important, therefore, for those who follow the granting of appropriations by Congress, not to confuse the totals of "appropriations" made during any session and the totals of "expenditures" for any given fiscal year as displayed in the statements of the Treasury Department. The terms "appropriations" and "expenditures" are not synonymous. They are intimately related but vary widely on a time-factor basis.

The matter referred to follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 10, 1941.

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
Chairman, House Committee on Appropriations, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: By direction of the Secretary and in accordance with the arrangements made with you as outlined in his letter of January 31, 1941, I am enclosing herewith the following statements:

Statement No. I, general Budget summary: Receipts and expenditures, showing (1) Budget estimates for the fiscal year 1942 and (2) actual figures for the fiscal years 1941 and 1940.

Statement No. II, effect on the public debt of financing the deficit, showing (1) estimated amounts for the fiscal year 1942 and (2) actual figures as of June 30, 1941, and June 30, 1940, respectively. This statement shows the extent to which the net deficit has been met through borrowings and reductions in the Treasury's cash balance. It also shows the debt at the beginning and the close of the period.

Statement No. III, statutory debt limitation, showing the amount of the debt outstanding which is subject to the debt limitation and the balance of the borrowing authority, that is, the amount of additional debt which may be issued pursuant to existing limitations.

Statement No. IV, general fund balance, showing an analysis of the general fund balance and the changes therein during the period. This statement sets forth the balances at the beginning and the close of the period classified as to working balance, increment on gold, and seigniorage. It shows how the general fund balance was affected by (1) borrowings, (2) excess of receipts or expenditures in trust accounts, etc., and (3) the net deficit as set forth in statement No. I.

Statement No. V, obligations of corporations and credit agencies guaranteed as to principal and interest as of June 30, 1941: This statement shows the contingent liabilities of the Government, that is, the outstanding securities issued by corporations and credit agencies which are guaranteed by the United States as to principal and interest.

Statement No. VI, combined statement of assets and liabilities of governmental corporations and credit agencies, as of May 31, 1941, based upon the latest official reports received by the Treasury. This statement shows the total assets of such corporations and agencies, the liabilities (including reserves), and their net worth. The liabilities are segregated according to obligations guaranteed by the United States and obligations not so guaranteed. The net worth is classified as to the amounts of the Government's proprietary interest and of the proprietary interests not owned by the Government. The total amount of interagency interests of all corporations and agencies included in this statement is also shown.

Very truly yours,

D. W. BELL,
Under Secretary of the Treasury.

I. General Budget summary—Receipts and expenditures

[On basis of daily Treasury statements, i. e., checks paid by Treasurer of the United States. In millions of dollars]

Classification	Budget estimates,[1] fiscal year 1942	Actual
		Fiscal year 1941	Fiscal year 1940
Receipts:
Income tax	5,420.0	3,469.6	2,125.3
Miscellaneous internal revenue	3,135.0	2,966.9	2,344.6
Taxes under Social Security Act	847.0	788.2	712.2
Taxes upon carriers and their employees	145.0	136.9	121.0
Customs	390.0	391.9	348.6
Return of surplus funds from government corporations		319.2	53.6
Other	177.0	195.8	219.5
Total receipts	10,114.0	8,268.5	5,924.8
Less net amounts transferred to Federal old-age and survivors insurance trust fund	712.0	661.3	537.7
Net receipts	9,402.0	7,607.2	5,387.1
Expenditures:
Departmental	[3] 875.0	[4] 810.7	809.9
Agricultural program [5]	1,202.0	1,126.3	1,425.0
National defense:
War	6,940.0	3,635.5	667.1
Navy	3,950.0	2,216.8	891.5
National defense funds for the President	353.0	[6] 103.1
Selective Service	32.0	17.5

Classification	Budget estimates,[1] fiscal year 1942	Actual
		Fiscal year 1941	Fiscal year 1940
Expenditures—Continued.
National defense—Continued.
Emergency ship construction (U. S. Maritime Commission)	200.0	11.6
Defense aid (lend-lease)	3,500.0	21.4
National defense housing (Federal Works Agency)	225.0	[8] 42.0
Other agencies	300.0	[7]	[11]
	15,500.0	6,047.9	1,558.6
Interest on the public debt	1,275.0	1,110.7	1,040.9
Federal Loan Agency	9.0	11.5	14.2
Federal Security Agency	872.0	944.0	799.3
Federal Works Agency [8]	[3] 1,134.0	1,673.9	[3] 2,066.7
Tennessee Valley Authority	40.0	51.2	39.1
Veterans' Administration	569.0	552.7	556.7
Transfers to trust accounts	268.0	234.6	207.9
Return of surplus funds from Government corporations		[9] 329.0
All other	425.0	[4] 476.1	479.9
Total expenditures [10]	22,169.0	12,710.6	8,998.2
Net deficit (excess expenditures over receipts) [10]	12,767.0	5,103.4	3,611.1

[1] Revised June 1, 1941.
[2] Not including departmental expenditures of Department of Agriculture.
[3] Revised to adjust classification.
[4] Includes national-defense expenditures augmenting regular activities.
[5] Revised to include revolving fund transactions.
[6] Reflects adjustment to give effect to sec. 5, act of Oct. 14, 1940 (54 Stat. 1127), by merging funds allotted to Federal Works Agency from allocations made by the President to the War Department for national-defense housing with funds appropriated to Federal Works Agency for the same purpose.
[7] Expenditures included in totals for departmental, Tennessee Valley Authority, Federal Security Agency, and all other. See note 4.
[8] Exclusive of National Defense Housing activities shown above.
[9] Credits, deduct.
[10] Exclusive of debt retirements pursuant to sinking fund and other appropriations
[11] Expenditures included in totals for departmental.

II. Effect on the public debt of financing the deficit

[On basis of daily Treasury statements. In millions of dollars]

Classification	Budget estimates,[1] fiscal year 1942	Actual
		Fiscal year 1941	Fiscal year 1940
Net deficit (statement I)	12,767.0	5,103.4	3,611.1
Changes in cash accounts during period:
Add: Increase in general fund balance during period	[2] 663.4	742.4	[2] 947.5
Total	12,103.6	5,845.8	2,663.6
Deduct: Excess of receipts over expenditures in trust accounts, etc., during period	37.8	[2] 148.1	135.6
Total financed by increase in public debt	12,065.8	5,993.9	2,528.0
Add: Public debt at beginning of period	48,961.4	42,967.5	40,439.5
Public debt at end of period	61,027.2	48,961.4	42,967.5

[1] Revised June 1, 1941. [2] Decrease, deduct. [3] Increase, add.

III. Statutory debt limitation

[Under sec. 21 of the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended. As of June 30, 1941. In millions of dollars]

Limitation		65,000.0
Deduct:
Gross public debt outstanding June 30, 1941	48,961.4
Unearned discount on United States Savings Bonds (difference between current redemption value and maturity value)	1,110.1*
	50,071.5
Less—Debt outstanding not subject to statutory limitation	577.9
Total		49,493.6
Balance of borrowing authority		15,506.4

IV. General fund balance

[On basis of daily Treasury statements. In millions of dollars]

Classification	Estimates,[1] fiscal year 1942	Actual
		Fiscal year, 1941	Fiscal year, 1940
Balance in general fund at beginning of period:
Working balance	1,884.6	1,162.7	2,159.5
Increment on gold	143.1	142.8	142.4
Seigniorage (silver)	605.4	585.2	536.3
Total	2,633.1	1,890.7	2,838.2
Increases:
Borrowings—net increase in public debt	12,065.8	5,993.9	2,528.0
Net receipts, trust accounts, etc.	37.8	[2] 148.1	[2] 135.6
Total	14,736.7	7,736.5	5,501.8

Classification	Estimates,[1] fiscal year 1942	Actual
		Fiscal year, 1941	Fiscal year, 1940
Decreases: Net deficit (statement I)	12,767.0	5,103.4	3,611.1
Balance in general fund at end of period	1,969.7	2,633.1	1,890.7
Analysis of general fund balances at end of period:
Working balance	1,195.8	1,884.6	1,162.7
Increment on gold	143.7	143.1	142.8
Seigniorage (silver)	630.2	605.4	585.2
Total	1,969.7	2,633.1	1,890.7

[1] Based on Budget estimates as revised June 1, 1941. [2] Decrease, deduct.

V. Obligations of corporations and credit agencies guaranteed as to principal and interest

[As of June 30, 1941. In millions of dollars]

Corporation or agency	Limit of authority	Outstanding liabilities [1]			Corporation or agency	Limit of authority	Outstanding liabilities [1]
		Total	Matured [2]	Unmatured			Total	Matured [2]	Unmatured
Commodity Credit Corporation	[3] 1,400.0	696.2	----------	696.2	Tennessee Valley Authority	61.8	----------	----------	----------
Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation	2,000.0	1,269.5	0.1	1,269.4	U. S. Housing Authority	[7] 800.0	226.3	----------	226.3
Federal Housing Administration	[4] 4,165.0	17.4	(8)	17.4	U. S. Maritime Commission	[8] 200.0	----------	----------	----------
Home Owners' Loan Corporation	[6] 4,750.0	2,419.4	10.5	2,408.9
Reconstruction Finance Corporation	7,141.8	1,741.4	----------	1,741.4	Total	----------	[9] 6,370.2	10.6	6,359.6

[1] Exclusive of obligations owned by the Treasury.
[2] Funds have been deposited with the Treasurer of the United States for payment of all obligations guaranteed by the United States, representing outstanding matured principal amounting to $16,000,000 and interest of $3,100,000.
[3] Excludes an increase of $1,250,000,000 approved July 1, 1941.
[4] Limit of authority to insure mortgages. This amount may be increased by $1,000,000,000 upon approval by the President. Debentures may be issued and tendered only in exchange for insured property acquired through foreclosure.
[5] Less than $50,000.
[6] The Corporation was authorized to issue bonds for an amount not to exceed $4,750,000,000 to be exchanged or sold to obtain funds for financing home-mortgage loans or for the redemption of any of its outstanding bonds. Its authority to make loans expired on June 13, 1936, and the above limit may only be increased for the purpose of retiring its outstanding bonds by an amount equal to the amount of the bonds to be retired, which would not affect the net amount outstanding after June 13, 1936.
[7] Represents gross limit of borrowing authority. The corporation has issued obligations totaling $488,256,000 leaving a balance of borrowing authority amounting to $311,744,000.
[8] Limit which may be outstanding at any one time with respect to the insuring of mortgages and the issuance of debentures.
[9] The total amount of assets of these corporations and agencies is in excess of the total amount of liabilities, including obligations guaranteed by the United States. See statement VI.

VI. Combined statement of assets and liabilities of governmental corporations and credit agencies

[As of May 31, 1941. In millions of dollars]

Corporation or agency	Assets		Liabilities			Net worth
	Exclusive of amounts due from Government corporations and agencies	Due from Government corporations and agencies [1]	Obligations guaranteed by the United States [2]	Due to Government corporations and agencies	All other (including reserves)	Proprietary interest of the United States	Other
Commodity Credit Corporation	1,055.3	10.0	696.9	[3] 0.1	128.0	100.3	----------
Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation	1,467.0	4.5	1,276.6	1.8	93.1	100.0	----------
Federal Housing Administration	84.5	----------	17.3	----------	3.6	63.6	----------
Home Owners' Loan Corporation	2,494.1	100.0	2,438.2	----------	47.7	108.2	----------
Reconstruction Finance Corporation	1,695.7	972.1	1,745.2	45.4	345.3	531.9	----------
Tennessee Valley Authority	400.0	1.0	----------	57.2	18.0	325.8	----------
U. S. Housing Authority	445.4	----------	226.8	75.1	5.9	137.6	----------
U. S. Maritime Commission	388.4	14.6	----------	----------	242.4	160.6	----------
Federal land banks	2,226.4	9.3	----------	.7	1,801.1	213.2	220.7
All other	3,612.4	331.7	----------	671.2	972.2	2,098.2	202.5
Subtotal	13,869.2	1,443.2	[4] 6,401.0	991.5	3,657.3	3,839.4	423.2
Less: Interagency interest shown above	----------	—1,443.2	----------	—991.5	----------	—451.7	----------
Total	13,869.2	----------	[4] 6,401.0	----------	3,657.3	3,387.7	423.2

[1] Includes capital stock and paid-in surplus of Government corporations and agencies.
[2] Includes principal and accrued interest.
[3] Excludes 271.8 millions held by the Treasury.

NOTE.—The foregoing figures are compiled from latest reports received by the Treasury Department from the respective corporations and agencies. The amounts coverin. obligations guaranteed by the United States differ from those shown in table V for the reason that they are stated in this table as of May 31, 1941, instead of June 30, 1941 and include accrued interest.

Psychological Fortification

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSH LEE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 14, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. JOSH LEE, OF OKLAHOMA, AT COMMENCEMENT EXERCISES OF UNIVERSITY OF OKLAHOMA

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address which I delivered on the occasion of the commencement exercises of the University of Oklahoma on June 9 last.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Dr. Bizzell, class of 1941, distinguished guests, members of the faculty, ladies and gentlemen: May I thank you with all of my heart for the invitation to deliver this commencement address. May I also congratulate this university for having had at its head a man like Dr. Bizzell who has given this institution such cultural and spiritual leadership through the past years.

Graduates, it is unfortunate that we must discuss questions of war and national defense on the occasion of your graduation instead of being allowed to discuss educational, economic, and cultural subjects, but since the future of America, as well as the entire world, depends upon the outcome of the present struggle, I believe it entirely appropriate that I discuss at the present time the fortification of America against the psychological assault which is now being made by Nazi Germany.

Twenty-three years ago this month the class of 1918 graduated from this university. Most of the men of that class walked out of the auditorium and exchanged their academic robes for military uniforms. They went into the service of their country because of a firm belief in the ideal of liberty. They fought and won a war to make the world safe for democracy.

VICTORY LOST AFTERWARD

They did make the world safe for democracy for a period of time. That is, it was safe for all of the little peoples of the world. For after that victory there was no fear in the earth that some powerful nation would invade the small countries and destroy their rights to self-government and liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Therefore, I repeat, the world was made safe for democracy.

For 20 years the tourists who visited the Forest of Compeigne saw there a small railroad car and near it, on a granite stone, they read this inscription:

"Here on the 11th of November succumbed the criminal pride of the German Empire, vanquished by the free peoples which it tried to enslave."

The American tourists who read that inscription said to themselves, as they turned away, "Yes; that's right; we fixed that, all right," and continued their sightseeing tour with a feeling that that victory for right had been nailed down securely for all time.

But, ironically enough, in that same little car, the same forces which would have enslaved the world in 1918 placed a booted heel on the neck of France in 1940. Thus ended the period in which the world was safe for democracy.

The victory of the boys of 1918 was a great victory and a great success. Don't let anyone tell you differently. We made the world safe for democracy, all right, but we did not keep it safe. The failure came afterward when we threw away that victory by abandoning the ideals for which we had fought. It is not enough that some should die for an ideal; others must live for that same ideal, or else the ideal itself may perish.

No victory for right is secure for all time unless we make it secure by constant vigilance and sacrifice. There is no such thing as a permanent victory. Life itself is a continuing struggle, with two forces in the world, one pulling up and the other pulling down. It is not possible for one generation, by pouring out its blood and sweat and tears, to purchase liberty for all time to come, but each succeeding generation must, by its own vigilance and sacrifice, make secure for its time the citadels of liberty.

POLICY OF ISOLATION REPLACED IDEALISM

There is a constant deterioration which goes on all the time and wears away even our ideals unless we work just as constantly at the job of rebuilding those temples of faith. So it was with the victory of 1918. For the victory which was won on the battlefields of that war was lost afterward in the council halls and classrooms during the peace which followed.

After the victory of 1918 we turned away from the noble leadership of men like Woodrow Wilson, who offered us an opportunity to build a "brave, new world," and an opportunity of assuming our share of responsibility in keeping the victory which we had won. We were diverted from the idealism of 1918 by the lure of materialism during the "gold rush" period which followed. We no longer championed the cause of the weak and the oppressed, but we turned to follow the voice of the isolationist, who said, "Am I my brother's keeper?" "No," said the isolationist, "not unless he happens to be on my premises." Dr. George W. Truett, in his masterful baccalaureate sermon yesterday from this platform, referred to Cain as a "slacker" when Cain said, "Am I my brother's keeper?" with the inference that he was not responsible for his brother's welfare.

Thus we decided to live unto ourselves alone. We decided that there was no obligation on our part to champion the cause of right against wrong except, perhaps, in the limited domain of the United States. We decided that moral obligation is hemmed in by imaginary boundaries and that we had no duty with respect to the world in which we lived, except the small corner which we ourselves inhabited.

We turned from a policy of vision and future greatness to the short-sighted policy of isolation, which is based on the erroneous theory that the United States is not a part of the world. It is based on the mistaken theory that, regardless of the economic and political upheavals in other countries, we can go on our way without being affected. It is based on the foolish theory that our Nation will not be threatened by the military power of our neighbors. Isolation, as an international policy, is as out of date as the Chinese Wall and just as ineffectual in protecting a nation from modern war.

Thus the policy of isolation helped to lose the great victory which was won for the ideal of democracy.

CYNICISM

Furthermore, cynicism contributed to the loss of that victory. For, after the armistice of 1918, a great wave of cynicism swept over the world, eating out the faith of men in their ideals. Sarcastic writers and cynical teachers set about "debunking," as they said, our ideals and pulling our heroes down to the level of commonplaces. These intellectual sophisticates sneered at religion, ridiculed democracy, and scoffed at things we considered sacred. Teachers were afraid of being laughed at if they taught the thrilling story of The Midnight Ride of Paul Revere. Fewer school children memorized Emerson's poem about the patriots who "fired the shot heard around the world." We soft-pedaled the immortal story of Nathan Hale, who said, "All that I regret is that I have but one life to give to my country." Even George Washington was shorn of some of his glory, and Abraham Lincoln was pictured as merely a clever politician. Thus, we were led to believe that all men's motives were selfish and that no man achieved greatness because of a high and noble purpose. The result of this world-wide wave of cynicism was to cut the ground from under our faith and leave us reaching up for something to hold onto. The cynics had robbed us, as Shakespeare would say, of "that which in nowise enriched them, but left us poor, indeed."

DEMORALIZED CONDITIONS IDEAL FOR DICTATORS

Then came the economic break-down with its millions of hungry people to make a mockery of our words, "freedom, liberty, and democracy." This paved the way for communism, which like a pestilence, always strikes when the victim's resistance is low.

Thus millions of people had their faith in humanity shaken. They ceased to believe in the ideals of democracy, and some even surrendered their faith in a just God. They were drowning in a sea of lost hope. This was an ideal condition for the establishment of dictatorships. And out of this chaos of confused thinking there arose Josef Stalin, Benito Mussolini, and Adolf Hitler.

When people no longer believe in anything or anybody, they are already defeated because they have nothing to fight for.

HITLER'S PLAN INCLUDES PSYCHOLOGICAL ATTACK

This is exactly the condition which Hitler has undertaken to create in every country before he has invaded it with his military blitzkrieg. Long before military hostilities broke out in Europe, Hitler had told the world how he planned to undermine a nation psychologically before he undertook to overthrow it militarily. Let me quote from Hitler himself, as told by Herman Rauschning:

"We need armies," said Hitler, "but we shall not use them as in 1914. The place of artillery preparation for infantry attack will in the future be taken by revolutionary propaganda, to break down the enemy psychologically before the armies begin to function at all.

"The enemy people," continued Hitler, must be demoralized and ready to capitulate, driven with moral passivity, before military action can even be thought of."

And then Hitler summed up his philosophy of modern warfare when he said:

"Mental confusion, contradiction of feeling, indecisiveness, panic—these are our weapons."

Hitler told the world beforehand just how he proposed to conquer it. His plan was so bold, so frank, so fantastic, that very few people believed him. His threats of world domination were dismissed as the dizzy ravings of a madman.

HUMAN OSTRICHES

Then he began to carry out his fantastic plan for total conquest. One nation after another fell before his assault as the diabolical scheme began to unfold. The people of the world have grudgingly awakened to the fact that Hitler has, up to date, carried out his plan to the letter. This awakening has been slow. It has been painfully slow.

In spite of the fact that 14 nations have, one after another, fallen under the power of this evil man, there are those in this country who still refuse to believe that Hitler's plan includes the Americas, although Hitler has been as outspoken with respect to his plans for South America and the United States as he was with reference to all of the countries which he has already conquered.

Yet there are still those in this country who, ostrich-like, hide their heads in the sand and say over and over to themselves, "I don't believe it."

Hitler's actions have followed the same pattern in the conquering of each country. Always the psychological assault precedes military action.

PROPAGANDA HITLER'S SECRET WEAPON

From the very first, it has been well understood in the Nazi regime that propaganda is as much a part of Hitler's plan of world domination as military attack.

It is generally understood now that propaganda is Hitler's "secret weapon."

Ewald Hermann August Banse, a well-known German writer, explaining the technique of the Hitler propaganda weapon, said that the purpose was "to convince the people of the enemy nation that they are being deceived, misled, and brought to destruction by their own government, in order that they may lose confidence in the justice of their cause."

May I say that Hitler has already launched this psychological attack on the western world.

FORGING WEAPONS FOR HITLER

There are some sincere but mistaken Americans who are unintentionally lending themselves to this Nazi attack. They have become the dupes of Hitler's revolutionary propaganda methods.

The time for division in the United States has passed. We should have unity. America has already charted her course. We have launched our program of national defense. That program contemplates all-out aid to the Allies. The American people have passed on that program and put their stamp of approval on it, and Congress has passed the lend-lease bill to make it effective. Therefore, the day of debate and dissention should be over. We should have 100 percent unity in this country today in support of this program to which we are already committed—irrevocably and irretrievably committed by word and deed.

Yet our radios blare with the voice of opposition which continues to forge weapons for Hitler, because Hitler has said, "Mental confusion, contradiction of feeling, indecisiveness * * * these are our weapons."

STRONG MORALE NECESSARY

This modern war is a three-dimension war. It is psychological, industrial, and military.

Your Government has already thrown into high gear industrial and military defense, but it remains for you, the people, to fortify yourselves against the psychological assault which Hitler is now making on this country.

Mechanized weapons and military training are necessary, but even if our Army has excellent military training and superior mechanized equipment, we are still not fortified unless our people have the spirit of unity and determination. Therefore, I ask you to steel yourselves against this psychological attack in order that "the well-knit, solid, powerful fabric of national unity" may not be broken down as planned by Hitler.

Vacillating people who have no faith in anything are the easiest to conquer. But those people who are united by their faith in an ideal are the toughest to vanquish. That is why religious wars are usually the bloodiest wars, for the more firmly that men believe in their cause, the more invincible they are.

If a great revival of patriotism should sweep over this country today it would be worth more to the cause of national defense than 10 divisions of trained soldiers. Strong unity of purpose right now in America would strengthen our national defense more than any one thing that we can do at this time.

No matter if we build the most powerful tanks, planes, and battleships in the world, they will not defend us unless we have the spirit of liberty.

FRANCE UNDERMINED PSYCHOLOGICALLY

France spent billions of francs on her military defenses. She had, numerically, the largest army in the world. The Maginot Line was conceded to be the most impregnable fortress ever constructed. But all of that military fortification did not defend France, because the people of France no longer believed in their ideals of "liberty, equality, and fraternity." The body of defense was there, but the spirit was dead.

Communists and National Socialists, posing as "liberals," had wormed their way into the schools and colleges of France as teachers and professors. They had shot the poison of cynicism into the young brains of the French children, and one after another the temples of French faith were undermined. The idealistic story of Joan of Arc, which had inspired French patriotism for years, was "debunked." The beautiful Biblical story of the creation of man was replaced by the materialistic theory of evolution. The ideal of liberty itself was explained away by economic arguments. The thrilling ideal of "equality" was ridiculed by pointing out obvious inequalities. The magic word "fraternity," around which armies had rallied, was mocked by citing racial prejudices.

Thus, France was a nation with an army but without a soul. She had lost faith. She had lost faith in humanity. She had lost faith in the ideal of democracy. She had lost faith in God. France was, therefore, demoralized and defenseless. For there is no fall so dangerous as the fall of those invincible towers of faith.

Thus France was ripe for Hitler's propaganda. The people were cynical and skeptical. "Fifth columnists" spread the poison of suspicion among the civilians and caused them to mistrust their public officials. They, likewise, sowed the seed of doubt among the soldiers and shattered the morale of the Army.

Do you recall how in the hectic days preceding the fall of France, the people, in their confusion, doubt, and suspicion, changed their government officials and their military commanders one after another on the eve of the fall of France? This lack of confidence on the part of the French people was worth many armored divisions to Hitler's cause.

France had fallen a victim of the deadly Nazi propaganda.

The story is told of the eagle which lay dying on a rock. And as his lifeblood ebbed away, he was saddened even more when he noticed that the feather which guided the arrow to his heart had come from his own wing.

Surely, today, as the last pulsing hope of freedom has been crushed out of poor France by the ruthless heel of the dictator, she must be saddened even more to know that she contributed to her own downfall by surrendering those spiritual fortresses of faith.

PETAIN CHOSE SLAVERY

Following the recent and final capitulation of France, in which General Petain agreed to full collaboration with Germany, Vice Premier Darlan made the announcement that General Petain had to choose between life and death, and that Petain had chosen life. But it would have been more accurate to have said that Petain had to choose between resistence or slavery, and Petain chose slavery.

What a contrast between Petain's foul choice of slavery and the statement of that great British leader who recently said, "The English people would rather die on their feet than live on their knees."

What a contrast between the cowardly choice of the Vichy government and the statement of that great American, Patrick Henry, when he said, "Give me liberty or give me death."

What a contrast between the weak and craven statement of Vice Premier Darlan and the immortal reply which King George, of Greece, made to Hitler's demand for collaboration when he said, "The infamy is too great for so small a country, and the blood of too many Britons is in the soil of Greece for Greece to forget."

UNITY FOR YOUR GOVERNMENT

Today you graduate from this university, but your efforts will all have been in vain unless the forces of democracy are able to stop the totalitarian powers in their march around the globe.

You are asking yourselves, "What can I do to help in this great struggle?" I will tell you. It is as important to fortify America psychologically as it is militarily. Therefore I call upon you for a full measure of confidence in your temporal leaders. Hitler is trying desperately at the present time to shake the faith of the American people in their public officials and thereby undermine their confidence in the integrity of their own Government.

Therefore you can do no more patriotic service today to your Government than to repel this present wave of Nazi propaganda which undertakes to poison people's minds with doubt and suspicion.

If Hitler is able to shake your faith in the integrity of your leaders, he will have won his psychological war against the United States. No matter how noble our ideals are, they must be championed by human leaders. Consequently if your belief in the integrity of those leaders can be shaken, your fighting spirit will have been undermined and you are then, as Hitler said, "demoralized and ready to capitulate."

Therefore, if you would do your part in strengthening the defenses of America, you can help to weave the strong fabric of national unity by maintaining loyal faith in the leadership of President Roosevelt. The most defeating blow which you can deal to Hitler in America today is to support Roosevelt like the English support Churchill.

RELIGHT TORCHES OF LIBERTY

Then again we must not only manifest loyalty to the champions of democracy, we must renew our devotion to the ideal of liberty itself. We here in America have enjoyed freedom so long that we have come to take it for granted. We treat our freedom just like we do our health. We never think about it until we are about to lose it.

The glowing words of democracy have lost some of their meaning because they are so familiar, but what a dynamic meaning those words must have to the poor souls who are today languishing in the concentration camps of Europe.

What a meaning they must have to those unfortunate human beings who are tracked down and murdered by the Gestapo bloodhounds of Hitler.

The right of habeas corpus, trial by jury, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of religion, the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—these are only some of the dynamic words of democracy which we have rubbed shiny in our pockets.

Yet there is enough explosive power in these words to blow Hitler to kingdom come if free men everywhere will but touch off the dynamite which they contain.

REKINDLE FAITH IN GOD

Then again, not only should the torches of liberty be relighted, but the fires of Christianity should be rekindled. Christian people everywhere should be rallying their forces to oppose this anti-Christ barbarian. Christian men and women of America, if Hitler is able to spread the Nazi curse over the world there will be no room for Christianity—no room for the worship of any God but Hitler—no room for any religion but the state.

According to Hermann Rauschning, Hitler said:

"The religions are all alike, no matter what they call themselves. They have no future—certainly none for the Germans. Fascism, if it likes, may come to terms with the church. So shall I. Why not? That will not prevent me from tearing up Christianity root and branch and annihilating it in Germany."

Then again Hitler said that the ministers would "replace the cross with the swastika" and that they would turn from the "worship of the blood of their quondam Saviour to the worship of the pure blood of the German race." The best answer that Christians can give to this challenge is a revival of faith in God.

When people have unshakable faith in their God it gives them strength. They have something to anchor to. They are not easily demoralized by propaganda. Therefore Christian people should come together under the banner of the cross and unite around their faith in God. Such unity will frustrate Hitler and strengthen America.

Here I wish to quote part of a letter written by a commander in the British Navy to a kinsman in America. The letter was sent to me by a graduate of this university, Mr. Bill Potter, of Ardmore. Mr. Potter is also a kinsman of the author of this letter, whose name is Commander Ronald Kinnear. Please bear in mind as I read this letter that it was written by a commander of the British Navy, one of the toughest fighting units in the world:

"MY DEAR KINSMAN: * * *

"Thursday, February 6, 4:25 a. m., and a beastly cold morning—snowing and blowing hard. The carrion night birds are in their foul nests across the Channel. * * *

"Well, the gong will soon go now for the next round, which we expect to be a gruelling one. Hard blows will be exchanged. If we go down for a count, do not lose heart. We shall get on our feet again and fight back harder than ever. It is then that we are always at our best; then that we are the most dangerous opponents. So never lose heart about us. We shall be O. K. Our real strength lies in the fact that we never forget the good God. The Germans discarded Him. The French forgot Him. The British remember Him.

"In my time He has performed at least four miracles for us. The first was in November 1914. The 70,000 remnants of seven British divisions were making a desperate stand against 200,000 of Imperial Germany's best, fresh and superbly armed, before Ypres. The tide of battle turned heavily against us. All seemed lost. Our people, led by King George V, fell upon their knees. And lo; the 70,000 held and fought to a standstill the 200,000. Do not ask me how; but they did.

"The second was in April 1918. British armies were being driven back to the Sucre—even, it looked, to the sea. Again all seemed lost. Once more our people, led by the King, fell upon their knees as Haig gave his famous order, 'Backs to the wall.' A desperate struggle then ensued; and lo, again our armies held and fought to a standstill the Imperial German hordes. Nor can I tell you how it was done; but it was.

"The third was when the life of King George V, who seemed to be on his death bed, was spared for 7 more years.

"The fourth was in June, last year, when our army seemed to face certain destruction on the beaches of Dunkirk. Mr. Churchill warned the Commons that he might have 'very grave news' for them in a week's time. Again our people, led by King George VI (who is indeed his father's son), fell upon their knees that our 350,000 might be saved. And saved they were, at a cost of some 35,000 casualties—note that figure—a tithe, a tenth part, of their strength. Do not ask me how it was done. One of my colleagues here was through it all. I have asked him, but he cannot tell me. But done it was.

"Foreigners sneer at you Americans and us British because we both believe in days of intercession and of thanksgiving. But we are right, my dear kinsman. Therein lies our great—and invincible—strength."

That concludes the part which I wished to quote from this remarkable letter. Remember that these sentiments came from the iron heart of a fighting man, Commander Ronald Kinnear, of the British Navy.

CONCLUSION

This war is different from any other war because the psychological attack has played such a deadly part in the fall of every nation which Hitler has conquered. Therefore, I feel that it is highly important that America stiffen her defenses on this front.

Graduates, each generation has drawn upon a bank account which was built up by its ancestors in the blood bank of liberty. This bank account was established by the Minute Men at Concord and Lexington, by Washington's ragged troops at Valley Forge and Yorktown. It was added to by Jackson's boys at New Orleans, and by the Rough Riders who followed Teddy Roosevelt up San Juan Hill.

The boys in blue with Admiral Dewey at Manila Bay made a deposit in the blood bank of liberty, and the doughboys who met the Hun at St. Mihiel, Cantigny, and Belleau Wood made a deposit which paid liberty's premiums in advance for 20 years.

But today once again that liberty is being threatened; therefore, I call upon you to fortify America's psychological defenses by maintaining your faith in the integrity of your temporal leaders, by rededicating yourselves to the ideal of democracy and by renewing your faith in God.

I thank you.

A Reply to the War Cry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. TOBEY

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 14, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. CHARLES W. TOBEY

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an address I delivered over the red network of the National Broadcasting Co. on July 7, entitled "A Reply to the War Cry."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the British Isles the Germans have made use of "scream bombs" to excite and confuse the people. Here in the United States the same device has been let loose upon the American people. These American "scream bombs" work under a handicap, because most of them are too old for service and yet they have some effect in creating confusion among the people and in driving them nearer and nearer to the fire of all-out involvement in the war.

The latest American "scream bomb" stunned the people of the Nation last week when, at the Conference of Governors, he called for total war by the United States, saying: "Now is the time to strike. * * * The time to use our Navy to clear the Atlantic of the German menace is at hand." There is no responsible party in America who does not realize that all-out war by our Navy will inevitably result in all-out war by every man in our armed forces and those yet to be conscripted—a war calling for expeditionary forces by the tens of thousands to Europe, Asia, and Africa.

To those of us in the Congress who are bestowed under the Constitution with the determination of whether and when this Nation shall declare war—to those of us in the Congress who, every week, receive thousands of letters from the plain people of America, pleading against a repetition of our 1917 venture—this call to war coming from one who is not the elected representative of the people coming from one who is not the elected President of the United States, is a serious and irresponsible action which calls for an explanation to the people of America. This member of the President's Cabinet is an executive head without authority as a policy maker in foreign affairs. The people had no voice in his selection for the post which he occupies. He was not chosen to speak for the people. His war declaration, uttered in disregard of our country's announced policy of aid short of war creates confusion in the public mind at a time when such confusion is the greatest enemy of national unity and national strength.

Fellow countrymen, it is a serious thing for a responsible official of the Government to call upon you to go to war without giving you the necessary information about our preparedness for war upon which you can base your decision on this crucial question.

This Cabinet officer did not tell you of the facts contained in the report of the House Military Affairs Committee, which for months has been making an intense study of our military situation. He did not tell you that this Military Affairs Committee has recently issued a report advising that our preparedness program has been shot through with confusion and failures and unwarranted delays.

This Cabinet officer did not give you the information about our Army which was recently revealed by Hanson Baldwin, military correspondent with the New York Times. He did not tell you, as Mr. Baldwin has reported, that our high Army officials have stated that not one American division is ready for war; that the Army conception of modern tactics is primitive; and that there are grave deficiencies in equipment, in training, and tactics and leadership in our Army.

This Cabinet member did not tell you of the report of Lt. Gen. Ben Lear, who, upon returning from a month's maneuvers in Tennessee by the Second Army, has advised that unless the performance of commanding officers is improved, disastrous embarrassments and failures will be encountered during battle.

Why should not the people of this country be given all of the facts frankly and without evasion? The American people are not children. They are capable of making sound decisions. They are the ones who will do the dying and fighting. I ask you, Does this member of the Cabinet speak for the common people of America or does he represent the view of a few college professors and other individuals who are ready at the drop of a hat to cheer the other fellow on to battle?

When this Cabinet officer was appointed, he was summoned to appear at public hearings before the Senate Naval Affairs Committee and made statements to reassure those who had apprehension that he would use his office to lead our Nation into war. He testified that he was in favor of a program short of war. The following is taken from the official transcript of the testimony:

"Senator JOHNSON of California. What do you mean by short of war?

"Mr. KNOX. I mean everything short of sending military assistance—either naval or Army assistance.

"Senator JOHNSON. Now, you would not go to war under any circumstances in this particular misadventure that is occurring in Europe, would you?

"Mr. KNOX. That is right.

"Chairman WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the committee understand that you favor moral and economic aid to the Allies through the sale by the United States of goods, products, and munitions by the businesses and citizens of the United States, but you do not favor direct economic aid to the Allies by the United States Government itself or any steps by the United States Government which will involve this country in the war?

"Mr. KNOX. That is my conviction."

This Cabinet member gave those replies knowing that the overwhelming sentiment of the Senate which had the confirmation power of his appointment was against participation in the war, and that the overwhelming sentiment of the people of the Nation was against involvement. He was confirmed by the Senate and now he assumes the prerogative of the Congress and of the President in declaring for all-out war, at a time when production is inadequate and our military equipment and training is far short of that required for a nation about to enter a death struggle in a world-wide war.

Nothing can create national disunity and national confusion so much as the directly contradictory advices and reports regarding our foreign policy and military situation by responsible officials of the Government. This at a time when we need calm judgment and the presentation of the true facts—at a time when we need national unity for greater and greater production of military materials.

In a time of war, declarations by unelected Cabinet officials and the resultant fear of the people that the administration will start a shooting war without consulting the Congress, it was refreshing to hear the words of Senator GEORGE, chairman of the powerful Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which he made on the floor of the Senate a few days ago. I quote: "I recognize the necessity for all-out total preparation as strongly as anyone can, and I think a little more strongly perhaps than some of our friends, because to my mind all-out total preparation never can be made by the American people without the resolution which has characterized them in all their great undertakings, unless and until they feel that they themselves are a part of the great decision which brings on that effort. So, when I was thinking of total defense I was thinking primarily of the strong spirit of unity which will not exist if our people are possessed with the fear that great decisions and commitments may be made without any opportunity on their part to participate in making such decisions. * * * I profoundly hope this country will not become an active participant in the present war or any other war. I have not yet accepted the fatalistic doctrine that our actual military or naval participation is inevitable."

These are the words of the duly elected chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, made in the face of the call to war by the unelected member of the Cabinet. It represents the struggle between those who seek to uphold the democratic method of national policy making and the method by which the people are not consulted—are not represented—in a matter which involves the very life of the people.

One of the most potent and far-reaching aggressors of the world is Soviet Russia. Her system of invasion is not so much through her armed forces but through sinister propaganda spread through her fellow travelers throughout the world. It was the influence of these Russian agents in France which largely contributed to France's downfall. It was the Russian Armies which imposed suffering on the people of Finland by an indefensible and cruel attack. It is the Russian agents in the United States who have been largely responsible for the stoppage of production in many of our defense industries.

There are many people of my State of Finnish and Polish extraction who have written to me in protest against the cruel treatment of the Finnish and Polish people of Europe by the Russian Government and yet, now that the Russians have become involved in the war, the interventionists have immediately called for all-out aid to Soviet Russia in her battle against the troops of Finland and the troops of Hitler.

In the June issue of the Readers' Digest you will find an article by Stanley High which makes revelations about the Communist plans and activities in the United States. For example, work on more than one-third of all the Nation's defense production contracts was fully or partially paralyzed 76 days from January to April this year by a strike at the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., whose products are essential to production in many of our defense industries throughout the Nation. This article by Mr. High reports that according to sworn testimony of a former Communist worker given before a committee of the Wisconsin Legislature the Communists decided 5 years ago that a strike at Allis-Chalmers would give them a chance to display their disruptive technique and power. Their efforts were directed from headquarters in Moscow, and yet the administration has announced it will give all possible aid to Russia.

Under the new propaganda effort of the interventionists we will be told that all of the revelations about Communist activities in the United States are nothing more than Nazi propaganda. The labor unions that have sought to purge their organizations of "reds" are now finding it a patriotic duty to reinstate all Communists. We have officially been called upon to put our arms around the Communist shoulder in a sober march down the road to war.

Already our Treasury has released $40,000,000 in Russian assets to the Soviet Government to enable it to increase its bombing against the defenseless populace of Finland. We will be called upon to join Soviet Russia in a campaign to establish the freedom of worship, the freedom from slavery, the freedom of speech, and freedom from want in Europe. We will be asked to gain for Stalin the hold of communism on Russia and to increase Russia's ability to extend communism to other parts of the world. Our marching boys will be told that this will be the battle of freedom—a religious crusade.

No! America has no place in Europe. The United States with her productive capacity can outproduce Hitler and can outlast Hitler if we build for national unity in the United States and devote our efforts to speeding up production week in and week out, month in and month out.

Only recently Bernard M. Baruch, who directed our unprecedented industrial effort of 1917–18, in an exclusive interview, pointed out that Germany, not the United States, would be "on the spot" economically if Germany were to seek control of the European Continent—that under a proper economic policy the United States should be able to drive Germany out of any desired neutral market.

Chief Justice Hughes has advised that he doubts that we can survive as a democratic nation if we enter into this war. Even the most passionate warmonger cannot accuse Mr. Hughes of being a fifth columnist or a Nazi agent. Such a charge would carry as little weight with the American people as the recent charge, by a responsible element of the British censored press, which accused our only living former President, Herbert Hoover, of being a spokesman for the fifth columnists.

It has come to the point where the alien, coming to this country to urge us into the war, is held by certain elements as a patriot, while an American-born, red-blooded American, who dares to give his honest advice in favor of noninvolvement, is accused of being a Nazi spy. What lengths these interventionists are willing to go to to achieve their end.

Fellow countrymen, the reassuring statement by Senator GEORGE, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, is evidence that you have one body in America, the body of Congress, made up of your own duly elected representatives to whom you can turn to counteract the call to war by the nonelected Cabinet member. The Constitution, which your forefathers drew up and which your forefathers ratified and which we all hold so sacred today, provides that the Congress shall have the sole power to declare war.

To your Representatives and Senators in Congress then, in this hour of crisis, direct your appeals and register your views in reply to the war cry of the determined Cabinet members who seek to force the President into a policy of war for the people of America.

Fourth of July Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 14, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. ALEXANDER WILEY, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech I delivered on the Fourth of July at Crandon, Wis.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Americans, in this grave period it is right that today we thoughtfully observe the anniversary of our Declaration of Independence.

Today we commemorate the birth of our great Nation in an observance which is probably our greatest secular holiday.

Today we observe a tremendous event in human affairs, the enactment of the social compact, a real and sacred bond, voluntarily and with deliberate dignity, consciously chosen by millions of free men to announce the solemn sovereignty of a great people.

One hundred sixty-five years ago today, under a cloudless summer sky, a number of men met in a plain red brick building in Philadelphia. It was the Philadelphia State House.

Hancock was in the president's chair. Before him there were half a hundred delegates. A committee had been appointed to draft a Declaration of Independence. The committee included Jefferson, the youngest and the tallest; John Adams, Robert R. Livingston, Sherman, the shoemaker, and Franklin, the printer.

It was about 2 o'clock before the Declaration was signed. A little boy ran from the doorway into the street with uplifted arms and gave the tidings of the Nation's birth to the man who was waiting to ring the great liberty bell on which was inscribed, "Proclaim liberty to the land; to all the individuals thereof."

It is not enough to say that on the 4th day of July 1776, representatives of the United States of America assembled in Congress to declare that the colonies would henceforth be free and independent States. Those representatives did much more than declare our independence from Great Britain. They proclaimed the first principles on which civil government is founded. They proclaimed a system where the sovereignty of the people is paramount.

They proclaimed the political equality of all citizens. They established justice. They established a reign of law, not brute-force law, based on the consent of the governed.

They said, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by our Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

These declarations define the American way and breathe life into these great values which we take for granted today. These great values of the race were attained through struggle and sacrifice. Are we awake to the truth, they can be retained and maintained only in the same way?

Those declarations, meant struggle and sacrifice but the founding fathers were fighting for the first principles of civil government. They knew what they were fighting for. They knew why the principles they fought for were of great importance. Are we awake as they were?

Because the founding fathers held as self-evident the great truth that all men are created equal, throughout our history we have never known pillage or privilege for individuals or for groups.

We have freedom and equality of opportunity. Political equality in this land has not been a theory. It is a reality. We are a Nation of laws and before the law every man is equal.

The whiplash of oppression never cracks in this land. There is no witch hunting of any group. Rich and poor, the mighty and the powerless—all are equal. The poorest citizen in his humble home has the same rights, the same privileges, and is an equal before the law with the mightiest financier in the land.

Government is not the master here. Government is the servant of the citizens. The sovereignty of a free people, politically equal, is the basis of our system.

In the Declaration of Independence our founding fathers said that we had "certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." In almost every land on the globe today, man's rights have been crucified and man has only those privileges which the state gives to him.

Our founding fathers knew that there were certain rights beyond the power of any state to confer. They are rights which come from the Creator. Our founding fathers acknowledged these rights and what is more, they acknowledged the source of the rights.

Of all the nations, we alone acknowledged at the inception of our Government, that there were rights which came from the Creator. We alone acknowledge that life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are the rightful heritage of men from their Creator. They are the written embodiment of all of the hopes of mankind.

Those words have a tremendous far-reaching meaning. They define the right to live, not at the whim or the caprice of any dictator, but because the Creator gave us that right.

That means that there are no blood-purges, no massacres of minorities, no firing squads at dawn, no black-outs of the freedoms of worship, of speech, of the press.

They give us the right to liberty, not because a power-drunk ruler slackened his grasp on the clanking chains of oppression, but because the Creator endowed us with liberty.

That means, that there are no concentration camps in this land, no old-world blood-stained torture chambers, no dungeons with men trudging the dreary lock step of imprisonment.

Those words define the right, to engage in the pursuit of happiness. That means that we do not devote all of our toil to the State. It means that unlike other lands we recognize that a man has a right to the pursuit of happiness and that it is the obligation of government to make it possible for him to seek gainful employment, to become married and raise a family.

It means that in this land a man can seek the happiness of his hearthside free in the conviction that no Gestapo is lurking in the shadows of his doorstep.

The founding fathers said that "to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." There is a statement of tremendous importance. These words should be carved in the intellect of every American.

It means that government is the servant and not the master. It means that sovereignty rests in the people. It means the establishment of justice and a reign of law based on the consent of the governed.

Our Government is unique, in that our people deliberately choose a government for themselves, deliberately and with dignity wrote their social compact. Our Declaration of Independence was written as an act of conscious choice. It was written as a demonstration of the capability of man for self-government.

Our Government has never been an instrument for venal self-seeking groups. Instead, our Government, as born in the Declaration of Independence, established the sovereignty of a great nation as a solemn trust, and it is with that trust that we are concerned today.

It has been the custom on days like this to recall the sacrifices of the great men and women who have builded this Nation. We remember our heroes on land and on sea; we recall the names of Putnam and Lafayette, John Paul Jones, Washington, and many others, and we do not forget the unknown and unsung common soldiers, and the mothers of men who gave their boys that America might be free in the days of the Revolution.

We follow along the pathway of history with Perry and Lawrence and Andrew Jackson, Generals Scott and Taylor. Then we reach that period when this country of ours fought out the issue, whether we were one Nation or whether we would have on this continent a repetition of Europe—a group of nations.

There were great men—valorous men on both sides. In the South there were Lee, Longstreet, Johnson, and "Stonewall" Jackson. On the North there were Grant and Sherman and Sheridan and many others.

But again, there were the common soldiers and the mothers of men—heroes all; but above them all towered the great form of the immortal Lincoln—great because he loved the North and the South; great because he recognized the imperative need of our remaining one people—one Nation.

Then there followed the post-war period—the reconstruction days, and our war with Spain in 1898 when we became an empire, taking over the Philippines, Puerto Rico, and freeing the Cubans from the Spanish yoke; and eventually there came the World War in 1917 when for the first time American soldiers set foot on European soil.

We fought for a great principle then. It was for the freedom of the seas and to abolish war and bring democratic principles to the peoples of the world. What would have happened if we had not gone into that war no one can tell. Nowadays the last war and our part in it becomes a prolific source for discussion. Orators differ on that subject as they do on all subjects. What might have been no one knows. What has been, history records. What shall be, God alone knows.

Yes, indeed, it was a glorious age, this march of our people from a fringe of States on the Atlantic across a continent. A glorious age in growth and in accomplishment; but, as the present is so full of challenges so tremendously important to our lives, we must discuss it today in the light of those first principles. We must consider our obligations as citizens in this troublesome period, this critical hour.

We must weigh the facts as they appear to us. We must calmly arrive at some conclusion which will determine the Nation's course.

If, up ahead there is to be a period of stress, of crisis, then we must be prepared to meet it. So today, instead of making the usual Fourth of July oration, I want to ask you to reason with me, to follow the bibilical injunction: "Come, let us reason together." It is only in calmness, it is only in balanced judgment that we can arrive at the right course.

I said previously that 2 years ago the nations of Europe, most of whom have been overridden and enslaved now, were free people. Witness Czechoslovakia, Poland, Esthonia, Lithuania, Denmark, Norway, France, Holland, Belgium, Yugoslavia, Rumania, Bulgaria, and Greece.

I was in Europe when the war broke out. I represented this country at the Interparliamentary Union in Oslo, Norway. I was in Copenhagen when the news came through from our embassy in London to stop me from going into Germany. In going to Oslo it was my privilege to stop first in Plymouth, England, and then to visit London.

It was in London where I had a remarkable talk with Mr. Rhys Davies, a Laborite from Manchester. He stated, among other things, that he hoped Britain would have at least 1 year longer in which to prepare. He said that if Hitler had struck 2 years before he would have found the English people so peace-minded, so unbelieving that war could come, that he could have taken over Britain. He said that it was Hitler's breach of treaties, breach of the pledged word, and Chamberlain's appeasement policy that finally began to awaken the people of Britain that war was imminent. "But we are unprepared," he said, "we need at least another year. Pray God we have it." But they did not have it.

When Hitler, in violation of his pledge to Poland, invaded that country, and Chamberlain, recognizing the unprepared condition of Britain, tried to appease, the British, speaking through their representatives in Parliament during Chamberlain's speech, cried out, "Speak for England," and war followed.

In my conversation with Rhys Davies, he brought out the fact that the democracies of Europe were asleep, because after the last World War the nations were bled white, and they were looking for sanity; they were looking for a solution to this terrible problem of war, and then he said, "There came from out of the west your great President Woodrow Wilson, and he brought to us the idea of the League of Nations."

"Then there followed the Locarno Pact, the Kellogg-Briand Pact outlawing war" (I can see Rhys Davies now with a smile on his face saying "You can't outlaw war").

"As a result, our people dreamed a great dream," he said. "They thought war could not come and could not happen. Our people became great pacifists. This was true of other nations except Germany, Italy, and Russia. These nations armed and armed to the teeth. These nations by their propaganda, however, divided, or sought to divide, the peoples of the peaceful nations. They succeeded, he said, in France. France went to pieces, as we all know, because there was no cohesion, no unity within, no willingness to sacrifice and to get ready to meet the onslaught that was inevitable."

I remember another scene. I sat with King Haakon, of Norway, in his office in the palace in Oslo. (His office was full of ship models.) This was about 10 days before the war broke. We talked about nothing else but the coming events. He hoped that the treaty he had with Hitler would keep his country safe as a similar neutrality pact did during the last war, but now he is a fugitive king in Britain and his land is overrun by half a million German troops; his people are enslaved.

Out of this holocaust in Europe there has come into the consciousness of the American people the imperative need of being prepared for any emergency. Therefore, Congress has voted billions of dollars for defense. The lease-lend bill is law, but before it was passed it was the policy of this Nation to furnish aid to Britain and the democracies. The reason for this was that we were just as unprepared as Britain and as long as Britain stands there can be no successful onslaught on the Western Hemisphere.

All the world recognizes that the technique of war has changed. Hitler's blitzkrieg, or lightning stroke, is based on, first, infiltrating other people with saboteurs and "fifth columnists" with ruinous propaganda which breaks the morale of the people and breaks their unity.

Second, a lightning stroke, not with the old style Army technique, but with mechanized units, great tanks followed by mechanized motor vehicles for creating a spearhead, and synchronized in the air with fighting ships, or Stukas. It is said that a hundred and twenty thousand Germans, consisting of 10 Panzer divisions of 12,000 each, mechanized and synchronized, broke the backbone of 3,000,000 French.

Third, after the fighting forces are demoralized, the infantry comes in and takes possession of the land.

Fourth, already in advance every bit of the industrial and agricultural life has been inventoried and Hitler's men take over the whole political and economic life of the occupied nation. When I say they take it over, they own it. They circulate their worthless printed paper, and require that the occupied people sell whatever they have for this paper. They take over the banks, manufacturing plants, and the farms. They take over the people and require them to perform like slaves for their masters.

Fifth, the Gestapo is everywhere. Freedom of speech, the press, trial by jury—all are gone, and there is imposed upon the people, through the regulation of schools and churches, the ideology of what has been called the new order.

The like of this has never before been seen, possibly in the history of the world—at least not on such a large scale.

Many of these conquered people had solved their political and economic problems. Many of these nations were outstanding lighthouses serving as guides for all mankind. He has taken these people and attempted to turn them back into slavery.

Now, I dwell upon these facts, because there is no reason for us to hide them. Hitler and Mussolini and Japan have entered into a tripartite treaty to divide the world between them. In each of these nations the individual is nothing, the state is everything.

Hitler has interfered with all the worthwhile values such as we call values. In his "new order" of things there is a new religion which he attempts to impose on his own people and those he conquers. In America we have freedom of worship. In this "new order" men are told what to think and how to think.

In our American way men are permitted to be explorers of unfathomable reaches of the mind.

So we come to a recognition of the fact that a world revolution is on. I personally feel that there is not a great deal of difference between the technique of Hitler and Stalin.

Under each, men are regarded again as chattels and serfs, all except a few who constitute the ruling group.

Now, where does this lead us? We certainly must reach the conclusion that if we are interested in our American values, if we want to maintain the great freedoms which most of us do not appreciate because we never did anything to obtain them—we must build a bulwark against anyone attempting to take them away from us.

I said most of us do not appreciate these freedoms of ours because they seem to us to be just as natural and as matter of course as the air we breathe, but they are not. It has taken a thousand years, or more, of human sacrifice to gain them, and right now we know, as I have stated, that they can be lost as they have been in Europe if we do not build ourselves a strong defense.

Now, this strong defense consists first, as I have intimated already, of a spirit of unity in our people. We are not English-Americans, German-Americans, Scandinavian-Americans, Polish-Americans—we are Americans. When our fathers came to this country they dug their roots deep into the soil, and we who are born here are Americans and our fathers before us were Americans. They came here for various reasons—political, economic, emotional—anyway, they came here to be free and they found freedom here. Now, we will not be recreant to their memories—we are going to maintain that freedom. So, the first thing is to build unity.

Unity of purpose—of understanding—of nationality. Hitler says we are a divided people because we stem from so many different blood sources. Let us prove that that is our strength. Let us be a discriminating people. We must learn to take everything we read in the papers and magazines with a "pinch of salt." There is so much propaganda.

If you and I were British subjects, of course, we would do everything we could to get America into this war to help Britain. If you and I were Hitler men—followers of Hitler—we would do everything we could to stop America from getting into this war. We would sabotage, we would indulge in propaganda. Well, that is just what is being done. Therefore, we should become discriminative—keep our heads and use a little horse sense in analyzing news and radio accounts, and what we do, do as Americans, realizing our job is to preserve America.

We do not have to hate any other people. We have enough to do, to love our great America, and, oh, how great she is, and to think of it, that we are a part of her and that she calls to us now, to help to preserve her.

The second thing we have to do, of course, is to build this Nation strong with modern weapons. This calls for a navy adequate to meet any emergency with a coordinating air arm. It calls for an independent air arm which could repel any attack on our shore—an air arm of bombers and fighting planes. It calls for an army mechanized with the most modern weapons and possessing also a coordinating air arm.

It calls first for common sense on the part of our leaders in the field of invention and initiative.

I made the statement some time ago that if Hitler moved into Spain and took over Spain and Portugal, I was in favor of moving into the Cape Verde Islands and the Azores. They do not belong to Hitler; they would be an outer line of defense against the bombardment of our eastern seaboard.

I hear a lot of people say that we do not have to worry about Hitler—he is never coming to America. Well, I am not one of those who worries, because worry never makes for efficiency, but my eyes are open. He is already in America with his saboteurs and "fifth columnists." He is already in South America.

You think he would have had enough to do to look after Europe and Africa, but his "fifth columnists," saboteurs, and propaganda artists are already in South America. We have to be realistic.

Third, I believe America today should get its best brains working on what we might call the post-armament problems. I believe every city and village, county and State should build up a reservoir of projects with the idea that after this war is over there will be jobs for our soldier boys and boys in the Navy and boys in the defense plants to go to work on. Consequently these political divisions should seek to accumulate cash reserves for those purposes. Let them be invested in defense bonds.

The Federal Government is putting on this big defense program and the local municipalities should, wherever it is possible, curtail the imposition of taxes, because the Federal tax load is going to be so severe. In other words, we should, all of us, as far as possible, bring into play more foresight and less hindsight. We can let the dead bury the dead, but we should, as far as possible, anticipate the problems which may come into being and find the solution for them.

I am in favor of finding the solutions now and stopping a lot of problems from coming into being. This subject of post-war problems is so immense that I could discuss it for many hours with you.

We are a great people—we are blessed in so many ways. I believe in the rule of expressing gratitude each morning when I awake and expressing gratitude the last thing at night when I go to sleep for the blessings we possess as Americans.

I believe also that exaltation will come to the man and the woman who dedicates his best service to his country in this period. That service may not be in high position or high rank. The ordinary citizen can be lending courage and direction to his fellows by his example of thrift, tolerance, and industry and thereby he will render the greatest service to his country. Give me a nation of level-headed, God-fearing, industrious people and I will show you a people sufficient, safe, and strong.

This is no time to break ranks, this is no time to listen to the saboteurs, some of whom are Americans who are trying to create classes among us.

This is a time for reason. The time for constructive thinkers has come.

Through the columns of our newspapers and over the radio, and through the talks of our forum speakers, we hear men who, instead of talking on the issue, are constantly damning their opponents.

In my opinion, 99 percent of the people of this country want to stay out of war. There is probably less than 1 percent who can be classified as interventionists, and there is equally only a small percentage who might be called old-time isolationists.

In between these two classes can be found the great mass of level-headed Americans—men and women who realize that other nations did not want war but they got serfdom—men and women who realize that there is a fire abroad which may spread to our shores, and men and women who realize that it is a time to thank God that an ocean separates us from Hitler and an ocean separates us from Japan; but these men and women also realize that the whole technique of war has changed, that there are bomber planes that can travel 6,000 miles without refueling, that the world is on fire, and that there is need for every precaution.

You, each of you, are called to leadership in this hour, a leadership of sane thinking, without hysteria. A leadership of poised minds, with perspective and vision. There is no hate or intolerance there.

All over our country people are wondering which way we are going. We find extremists on both sides befuddling the people. What we need now is to proceed cautiously as trustees of property of great value. We must not go down the way to war if it is possible to avoid it. Ninety-nine percent of the people of this country do not want to go to war unless it becomes necessary as a matter of self-defense.

I have told you today of some of the dangers which confront us. I speak of these dangers because I do not believe that we can ignore them, ostrich fashion, by putting our heads in the sand. They are facts. We cannot ignore them.

Because I present these facts, however, do not conclude that I am for intervention. I am not for intervention. Every vote which I have cast on matters of foreign policy has been motivated by the idea that we must avoid involvement. My conclusions on foreign policy will continue to be based on the idea that we must avoid involvement. If we are realistic we know that even if we sought involvement (and I do not believe that we should) we are still woefully unprepared.

To seek the involvement of the Nation at any time, and certainly when the Nation is still unprepared, involves a criminal responsibility.

In the past few weeks we have seen an illustration of the great international "about face" with reference to Russia.

Once Germany aided Russia against Finland. Now Germany and Finland are together. A short while ago Germany signed a 10-year nonaggression treaty with Russia—she had similar treaties with all her conquered nations.

On the 17th of September 1796 George Washington said: "Observe good faith and justice toward all nations.'

He also said: "Nothing is more essential than that permanent inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded."

George Washington also said: "The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop."

Certainly events of the past few weeks illustrate the wisdom of formulating a foreign policy apart from "permanent inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others."

Certainly the German, Finnish, and Russian situation is an illustration of the undesirability of adopting a permanent policy on the basis of something which may be changed overnight.

This Fourth of July is different from any other. It is different because we cannot simply appraise the picture of America emotionally. There are too many challenges staring us in the face. Frankly, we have to ask ourselves, each of us. What is my job in this great period of challenges? What can I do?

May I summarize briefly a few of the things I think each of us can do:

1. Let us really get a sense of appreciation of the worthwhileness of American citizenship—of being Americans. Let us know the greatness and the glory of America.

2. Let us in our lives, in our daily actions, live greatly, in that we exemplify tolerance, industry, thrift, love of country, and love for all mankind.

3. Let there come into our consciousness the thought that we are living in one of the great challenging periods of the race. This hour will require sacrifice, submergence of petty differences, and a realization that we are one people—one people called upon to keep the light of liberty and freedom burning on this continent.

We are concerned with the past primarily in the light of the present. The people's sovereignty which the founding fathers wrote into the Declaration has been a heritage and a birthright but, more than that, it is a trust, a trust which we must preserve and pass on to future generations unimpaired.

Mighty ferments work among us today, and we need more than lip service to render a good account of our trusteeship of the great freedoms.

Today we are free to assemble, to speak, to write, and to worship as we choose. We observe our independence today not to inflate our national vanity and to boast of our achievements. We do not celebrate an idle tradition. We observe our independence today partly because we need a renaissance of patriotism, but more particularly we observe this day because it is vital that we reaffirm our faith in the great principles of the Declaration, that we rededicate ourselves and our allegiance to that Declaration, and that we repudiate anything which menaces its freedoms.

It is moreover a time for us to reconsecrate our highest efforts to the protection and preservation of our trusteeship so that we may hand on these values unimpaired to yet another generation.

As William Cullen Bryant wrote of America:

"There's freedom at thy gates and rest
For earth's down-trodden and opprest;
A shelter for the hunted head,
For the starved laborer toil and bread."

We need first of all a great unity in our appreciation of the American freedoms and of our way of life. Then we need a unity of desire to preserve those freedoms and the great American values—the will, the flame within, to protect them.

Once we have a deep-rooted understanding of what America means to us, and once we have the will to retain the American values intact, we will have a fervent spirit of unity of purpose and conviction which will be our greatest bulwark in maintaining our morale against aggression.

We may then differ as to the best methods of preserving our American values just as men differed in the days when the Declaration was written, but we will be one in our common ideals.

It is well also for us to remember today that the founding fathers wrote into the Declaration that, "* * * for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

These are perilous times and momentous events are stirring in the world which may be of as lasting consequence to the world as was the Declaration of Independence. It is well for us then today to again place a "firm reliance in the protection of Divine Providence."

It was in 1863 on July 4 that an unknown man wrote a hymn which I think is as applicable now as it was then. He wrote:

"Lord, the people of the land,
In Thy presence humbly stand;
On this day, when Thou didst free
Men of old from tyranny;
We, their children, bow to Thee.
* * * *
"With one heart the Nation's cries,
From our choral lips arise:
Thou didst point a noble way
For our fathers through the fray;
Lead their children thus today!"

I am speaking to free men about an event which 165 years ago lit a light in a foggy world.

The world is murky now again. The lights have been going out all over the world. We who love America and appreciate the significance of this day—4th of July—must pledge to each other our property, our lives to maintain that light—maintain America a lighthouse in a foggy world—so that those who come after us will say, "Our fathers kept the light a'burning."

Morale

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ
OF NEW MEXICO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 14, 1941

BACCALAUREATE SERMON BY PRESIDENT PAUL F. DOUGLASS TO GRADUATING CLASSES OF AMERICAN UNIVERSITY

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the baccalaureate sermon delivered to the graduating classes of The American University, Washington, D. C., by President Paul F. Douglass. The subject was of general interest—Morale.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"For who is this uncircumcised Philistine that he should defy the armies of the living God?"—I Samuel xvii: 26.

One six-letter word sums up the objective of national effort in this year of your graduation. That word is "morale." The fabrication of morale is this season a national adventure.

Morale is, of course, nothing other than group persistence in the pursuit of a collective purpose. Tenacity in the face of adversity is its most unequivocal index. Your generation of college graduates comes of age when each man is forced to think of his relationship to a program which organizes him into a common undertaking, and in which the control of fear is effected by a crusade for values (now being laboriously defined from the contemporary nihilism). Sometimes our national effort is alleged to be organized to defend democracy, sometimes to save our skins, and sometimes its imperialistic ambition is the extension of the four freedoms to people who must first be spanked as a prelude to their enjoyment of our Christmas presents.

During your 4 years in college you have seen a change in the targets at which American thought and effort are aimed. The anxiety of Archibald MacLeish over the indifference of the current college generation toward moral values in the present war is the same Archibald MacLeish who himself not so long ago was a semipacifist writer. A Hemingway who cried out against the evils of war in Farewell to Arms picks up a gun and goes to war to fight the evils of something he felt was worse than war in Spain. You ask yourself, Have these men been changing sides? If you examine their thought, you will have to answer no. They have merely changed targets. The MacLeish of 1931 was propacifist; the MacLeish of 1941 is antipacifist. You may be puzzled in their apparently spiritual somersault until you find a continuing devotion to humanitarianism as a common denominator.

You are graduating tomorrow into a world which doubts itself; which is talking violently about morale; a human society in fear of itself; and which in our particular culture areas is rampant with nihilism.

It is therefore our privilege in searching for perspective upon our problem of morale this afternoon to turn to the record of events of men and warfare as recorded in the First Book of Samuel. Things weren't going very well either in those days for culture which revolved around the Hebrew tradition. The immediate issue then was, of course, the operation of the original panzerkraft division named Goliath. Goliath was a streamlined, armored, Nordic "totalblitzkrieger," if I may take liberty in inventing a word. He handled his own propaganda from his own loudspeaker. He kept saying the same thing then as now: "I defy the armies of Israel this day." I grant you that if any human being listened day after day to that loud-speaking tank, the threats would jar any human nerves. We can therefore probably be sympathetic with the Israelites. The news report from the field tells us that they were dismayed.

The problem of morale in Israel was a national concern. How was King Saul going to build up a fighting field force to reckon with this Panzerkraft? Well, the 25th verse tells us what the program of the army morale division was. It was to encourage men to fight for these values: the promise of the government to take over the mortgage on the victor's home; (2) to give him a pretty girl to marry; and (3) to supply him with a marriage settlement in cash.

You see, Israel was very modern in its morale program; it almost had a Nordic philosophy, yet somehow the morale program didn't work. Whether it was because men preferred mortgages to Goliath; or were disinterested in charming matrimonial prospects; or were really not in need of cash funds, we do not know. All we know is that the morale program of Israel's war department was unsuccessful. Israel was afraid; horribly afraid.

But now note the news report from the front: It is commencement season and a new generation begins to speak on the problems of the day. A new young man was beginning to ask embarrassing questions—asking questions of the terror-stricken members of the expeditionary force. Question No. 1: "Who is this uncircumcized Philistine that he should defy the armies of the living God?"

The question vanished into an argument between David and his older brother who was terribly embarrassed by the nuisance value of his little brother. He wanted him to go back home and tend the sheep. You will hear the same advice when you tackle perennial problems with new methods and fresh enthusiasm.

Question No. 2: Little brothers don't stop with asking one question. "Really, aren't you fighting for a cause?" inquired David. The graduate in the year of Goliath found the same low ebb of morale wherever he went. But he called attention to himself. Everybody knew that David had entered the active arena of public life. Presently we find him before King Saul, still asking questions; but now also building morale at headquarters.

Imagine the insubordination of this pep talk of David to King Saul: "Let no man's heart fail him because of this panzerkraft! I'll go out and fight him." David was a volunteer.

Saul was astounded by the nerve of this new candidate for a degree. "What," he said, "You, a college senior fresh from the campus up there where the sheep mow the grass?" David explained that he had had a little laboratory work back there with lions.

Now note this: David wasn't intending to fight the Panzerkraft with obsolete methods. He couldn't use the apparatus that belonged to the demoralized field force to which his brother was attached. He tackled his problem. He analyzed it. He discovered the vulnerable part of Goliath—a little spot in the forehead 9 feet from the ground. He then adjusted his technique to his objective. He introduced new methods into the struggle—and the alarming simplicity of the tériel necessary for victory won the war.

Now all these facts make the total picture. (1) A new generation. (2) A new kind of mind that thinks objectively in terms of ends and means. (3) Sustained courage. (4) Expertness. But the power of the morale we find discussed in the 45th verse.

David expresses the motive power of his effort. He says to Goliath: "You come to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield; but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of Hosts.

"Who is this uncircumcised Philistine that he should defy the armies of the living God?" That was David's question.

His answer was his performance of his conviction that Goliath must be liquidated by the instrument of God. That, of couree, is the ultimate source of morale. Appeal to that divine source as a rule, is made by both sides in every war.

The deed which David perfo.med was sufficient to reestablish morale—or group persistence in the pursuit of a collective purpose.

PERSISTENCE

Persistence is a difficult thing in life. It is so easy to give up. You must look at life with a kind of humor which enables you to have tenacity in the face of adversity. The adversary may be a "panzerkraft" or a "totalblitzkrieger" or the mud on the cutover maneuver fields of Louisiana. The fact is that to have morale you must first persevere.

PURSUIT

But that perseverance must be properly directed in the pursuit. Michelangelo painted the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel lying on his back. For a long time after the paintings were completed he could read only by holding the page above his head and raising his eyes; but he took advantage of his impaired sight to prepare a medical treatise on the eyes, which is preserved among the manuscripts of the Vatican. Perseverance in the pursuit is difficult; but the power of morale can win over obstacles. Michelangelo wrote of the impeachment of night:

"They err who praise this gloomy birth,
So frail and desolate and void of mirth
That one poor firefly can her might appall."

Alan Knight Chalmers asks the question: "Did you ever try to carry a candle in the wind?" It flutters and sputters. You bring it down in front of yourself to guard it with your hand from the wind. The thing which you carry to light the way soon demands your complete attention. You see nothing but that fragile light; you are once more a prisoner of the darkness from which the burning tallow should redeem you because all your attention is taken up with guarding the flame, your feet stumble. "Some gusty night," says Chalmers, "along a country road, try to carry a candle in the wind." You see morale demands perseverance and pursuit.

PURPOSE

Morale demands something more—and that is purpose. The ultimate factor in morale is purpose—even purpose in adversity. When we hear talk of the nihilism of our age, and of the allegation that your generation is morally invertebrate, we must, like David, ask questions. What is the purpose of life? It is something your older brother cannot answer for you. And until you answer that question yourself, morale is impossible.

I am concerned this afternoon with a purpose which is worthy of your years of intellectual comradeship in the American University. I am concerned with the definition of a purpose which you can pursue persistently and with enthusiasm. I am concerned with a coherent statement of that purpose in this day of nihilism. May I state what that purpose seems to me to be: To affirm the social technique by which the individual as a part of a pattern of political association participates in political power which collectively he sustains and distributively he shares within a realm of immunity for the mobilization of opinion which makes government amenable to an educable concensus of opinion. The major affirmation which you and I must make with all the resources at our command is the insistence that in full freedom of deliberation we work out the programs for the control of our collective selves.

The March letter in the journal of the American Bar Association reports that a bomb has destroyed Middle Temple. Middle Temple is the very symbol of the English common law—violence annihilating the bulwark of liberty. A screaming, blazing weapon of death from the land where Nicholas Copernicus testified: "I do not ask the pardon accorded to Paul; I do not hope for the grace given to Peter; I beg only the favor which You granted to the thief on the cross." A bomb rained on the hall where Shakespeare's Twefth Night was first performed, the Shakespeare who wrote:

"The bosom of my conscience, enter'd me,
Yea, with a splitting power, and made to tremble
The region of my breast."

Men and women of 1941, the rallying cry of your commencement year is "morale." You go forth as a new generation of Davids to face Goliaths. This is my prayer for you, that you will face the problem of your day with the same new enthusiasm and reasonable new methods which were David's; that you will volunteer as David did; and that by analysis and the selection of proper means to proper ends, you will raise your testimony to God in making possible the free collaboration of men in the collective control of themselves. May you dedicate your endeavors to the liberation of mankind from habits of violence which intensify the fears of men into desperate enterprises for mutual destruction.

Presentation of Award to Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM STEWART

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 14, 1941

ADDRESS BY MRS. GUILFORD DUDLEY

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by Mrs. Guilford Dudley at the White House on May 16, 1941, on the occasion of the presentation of the national achievement award to Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Our great leader, Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, came to Nashville at our urgent request and stayed until after the passage of the ratification, helping us with her counsel and wisdom and breathing into us her own indomitable courage and will to win.

Three minutes to tell you of one of the most sensational episodes in all the dramatic history of Tennessee.

First of all, in the year 1920 our legislature had adjourned before the suffrage amendment could be submitted. I happened to be the first woman delegate at large from Tennessee to the San Francisco Democratic National Convention. Mrs. George Fort Milton was the alternate. We persuaded the Tennessee delegation to wire Governor Roberts, urging him to call a special session of the legislature for the purpose of ratification.

When he consented the fight was on.

From all over the United States our opponents rushed to defeat us.

Every legal, political, and parliamentary trick was tried against us.

We had thought our majority was secure, but the most tremendous pressure was brought to bear upon the legislators supporting our cause. They were threatened with loss of jobs, ruined careers, and they fell away from us like autumn leaves in a high wind. They got ill, they got drunk, efforts were made to spirit them away. But we passed the senate before the opposition got fully under way. There were 99 members in the house. I checked the roll call twice a day with all our women and men workers. We counted 49 certain votes if all our men were in their places—a precarious majority of 1, since 2 men were absent.

When the great day for taking the vote dawned the suffragists stole in the house in the early morning and decorated it with yellow roses and tiny golden sunflowers. The antis were out in full force with their red roses, so the newspapers inevitably spoke of the war of the roses.

The suffragists did magnificent picket duty. Every one of our men was in his seat. Then came that heart-stilling moment when the roll call began. I was permitted on the floor of the House at the rear.

With trembling hands I checked each name. All went well until we came to the T's. Then a man named Thronesberry voted no instead of aye. We will never forget that name. You could hear the hushed gasp from the galleries—we were lost. But a young man named Burns jumped up and changed his vote from no to aye in order to move to reconsider, thereby giving us our constitutional majority of 50 and pulling his first boner in the campaign.

Governor Roberts stood stanchly by us. He was about to certify the ratification of the suffrage amendment giving all the women in the United States the right to vote when a man rushed breathlessly into his office with an injunction prohibiting the Governor from signing because a motion to reconsider was on the speaker's desk. Now, according to our State laws, you cannot enjoin a Governor, it just isn't done. He, however, submitted it to the supreme court then in session. The injunction was dissolved and the certification of our victory was sent by special messenger to Washington to Secretary of State Bainbridge Colby.

The rest is anticlimax. Our opponents wouldn't give up. A motion to reconsider can lie over 2 legislative days. In order to keep it from being brought up while we still had a majority, over one-third of the legislature ran away to Decatur, Ala., and remained for days hoping to break into our ranks and defeat us in the end. While these poor men were hiding out in Decatur, a group of influential lawyers went to Washington to protest to Bainbridge Colby who told him simply he could not go back of the Governor's signature, that the nineteenth amendment had already become the law of the land.

And that's how we won in Tennessee.

An Explanation Due

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 14, 1941

EDITORIAL ON OCCUPATION OF ICELAND

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled, "An Explanation Due." It refers to the fact that the President's message last Monday asserted that the American forces in Iceland are there eventually to replace the British forces, whereas Prime Minister Churchill's address to the British House of Commons on the following Wednesday said:

We still propose to retain our Army in Iceland.

I simply want to observe in passing that an American occupation of Iceland for American defense purposes would have to be exclusively an American occupation. It seems to me that a joint British-American occupation would be a direct invitation to our participation in a shooting war.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN EXPLANATION DUE

On Monday President Roosevelt addressed to Congress a message which contained this paragraph:

"In accordance with the understanding so reached, forces of the United States Navy have today arrived in Iceland in order to supplement and eventually to replace the British forces which have until now been stationed in Iceland in order to insure the adequate defense of that country."

On Wednesday Prime Minister Churchill addressed the British House of Commons as follows:

"We still propose to retain our Army in Iceland, and, as British and United States forces will both have the same object in view, namely, the defense of Iceland, it seems very likely that they will cooperate effectively in resistance to any attempt by Hitler to gain a footing.

"It would obviously be foolish for the United States to have one plan for defending Iceland and for British forces to have another."

Mr. Churchill then spoke of collaboration.

For 48 hours the American people and Congress believed that the British were about to quit Iceland because the troops were needed elsewhere. So American forces had taken over to forestall a German occupation.

Now another situation appears. British troops are not to quit Iceland and American forces are to operate in collaboration with the British forces.

Between those two situations there is a world of difference. To Congress and the country was presented the picture of a necessity to occupy a territory which might be forfeited to a nation which would use it as a base for offensive operations against this hemisphere. As such it was a defensive measure.

But the picture we now get from London is that American forces are stationed shoulder to shoulder with British forces; our forces are collaborating with those of a nation actively in a shooting war and subject to attack for reasons which may be wholly disconnected with any defense of this continent.

There is an explanation due.

Any failure by Congress to insist on that explanation will be more than the acceptance of the loss of its own self-respect. It will be an ill omen for the cause of constitutional government. It will be the betrayal of a people the great majority of whom do not want to go to war.

Address at Beaver Dam, Wis., Centennial

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 14, 1941

ADDRESS OF HON. ALEXANDER WILEY, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech I delivered at Beaver Dam, Wis., on the sixth day of July, on the occasion of the Beaver Dam Centennial.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Americans, we are met here today to observe the centennial of the city of Beaver Dam.

A full century has passed since Jacob P. Brower first bought land where the city of Beaver Dam stands today.

Longfellow once said:

"The shadow on the dial, the striking of the clock, the running of the sand, day and night, summer and winter, months, years, centuries—these are but the arbitrary and outward signs—the measure of time, not time itself. Time is the life of the soul."

And so, in a larger sense, the history of Beaver Dam on this one-hundredth-anniversary celebration is not merely a history of days and months and years, but a history of men—of souls—who gave their highest efforts throughout the century so that out of the crucible of time this beautiful city has emerged.

THIS CENTENNIAL OBSERVATION SYMBOLIZES A CENTURY OF GROWTH

This centennial observation is a momentous one. It symbolizes a century of growth—a century of growth, not only in terms of population and homes and industry, but a century of continued growth in the character and quality of leadership which you have given to all of your endeavors.

It is difficult to realize that your community has its taproots as far back as 1841.

In 1840 there were hard times on the prairies. The Nation was in the midst of a turbulent Presidential campaign, staged with tremendous rallies, parades, log-cabin floats, and barbecues. That was a significant year in American history. It marked the Whig victory and it marked the end of the Jacksonian era.

WORLD HAS CONTRACTED SINCE EARLY DAYS WHEN TRANSPORTATION AND COMMUNICATION WERE LIMITED

Those were days when men still jolted over the oxcart roads in a covered wagon which faced the setting sun.

Those were days when water transportation was slow. As they broke trails from the Atlantic seaboard to the Middle West and the West, men traveled in wagons and canal boats, or rode on horseback, or walked alongside the wagon, with the cows tied to the tailboard.

There were traders who followed these trails until they were deep-rutted roads and finally wagon roads built of planks, and eventually followed by the locomotive.

Those were the days, when one of your early pioneers, a Mr. Shafer, made the trip on foot from Milwaukee to Beaver Dam in 24 hours. He arrived in Beaver Dam at daylight and then ran a foot race with a neighbor before he rested.

Those were the days when the first stage, a four-horse mud wagon, reached Beaver Dam from Watertown in the spring of 1848 to drive up before old Eagle Tavern, in true frontier style. It was not until 1848 that the Concord coach was begun, and the daily stage line was established, and it was not until 1856 that the railroad was completed.

Because transportation facilities were so limited, and because communication facilities were similarly limited, community life was particularly important and communities, to a certain degree, lived unto themselves.

Today, communities are more than ever an integral part of the Nation, and nations in turn (because modern transportation and communication has annihilated space), are more a part of the world. The world has contracted. That is a primary reason for our concern today with our foreign policy.

MATURITY OF EXPERIENCE BRINGS LESSONS APPLICABLE TODAY

It is interesting to recall, in view of our present foreign policy, that a hundred years ago, when Beaver Dam was founded, we also had a foreign-policy problem. Relations with England were very strained in 1841; as a matter of fact, they were worse than at any time since the War of 1812.

It will be recalled that in 1842 the Webster-Ashburton Treaty was made, fixing our northeastern boundary in its present location. Those were stirring days. Your community lived through those early years, almost a century ago when our expansion to the Rio Grande and to the Pacific coast reopened the old question of the status of slavery in the western territory—a question which was supposed to have been settled by the Missouri Compromise of 1820.

Your community lived through the tumultuous days when the compromise failed, and your community struggled through the 4 dark years when this Nation sought to decide whether we would be 13 nations or 1. We have been one, from that day until this, and since Lee surrendered his sword at Appomattox in 1865 no State has sought to withdraw from the Union.

Out of the rich maturity of wisdom and experience which comes to a people because they have lived through tumultuous years and trying days, there emerge lessons which are applicable today as then, and probably the greatest lesson to be learned from the first three decades of the past century was the lesson of a united people facing common problems of reconstruction in a spirit of unity and understanding.

There is a great need for us to reexamine that lesson today. We face grave problems—graver perhaps than any the past century has known, and we must meet them with the strength that comes from a united people. Nowhere is the strength of a united people and the vitality of our way of life better demonstrated than in a community such as Beaver Dam.

When the Bureau of Home Economics of the Department of Agriculture made a special study of small cities, Beaver Dam was selected as one of these typical small American cities.

The Bureau of Home Economics selected these cities largely on a basis of certain economic factors which made them typical communities. I think there is infinitely more involved in the selection of a typical American community.

There is involved in any typical American community a great and fundamental strength, the heritage of pioneer forbears grown virile, through long contact with the soil—of forbears who built in communities like these, a living memorial to our way of life, our beliefs, our freedoms, our ideals, and our highest hopes.

These are the things we think about when we review a century of history.

BEAVER DAM HAS GREAT PIONEER HERITAGE

When we enter Beaver Dam on United States Highway 151 we drive down well-shaded streets, we see large lawns, beautiful and typical American homes, we see a number of factories and a splendid business section—we see a great community.

It is great in what it has accomplished. It is great in the potential accomplishments of its manpower. It is great in terms of homes and hearthsides. It is great because it represents the greatness of free-born Americans living in a typical American city.

But, my friends, the greatness which belongs to this community is the greatness of its men and women, and of their spirit—a spirit which is ever looking forward to new achievements—toward the dawn of a better tomorrow.

A great Middle Western statesman once said, "This is but the dawn. We stand in the vestibule of the temple. The achievements of the past will pale into insignificance before the completed glory of the century to come."

You people have a great pioneer heritage—a heritage of independence, courage, resourcefulness, and democracy.

It is a far cry, since that day in 1840, when Jacob Brower came to Beaver Dam, on a pony through the woods from Fox Lake and purchased the three forties between the western line of Division Street and the lake.

It is a far cry since those days when Thomas Mackie and his son-in-law, Joseph Goetschius traveled to Beaver Dam in March of 1841.

It is a far cry from the days when Reverend Ordway and Jacob Brower surveyed and marked all of the roads in and out of Beaver Dam.

It is a far cry from the days when these men built the pole bridges and cleared the streets and plotted the lots and built the grist mill and the sawmill. Those were days of early growth.

Prior to the panic of 1857 and for a decade and a half, Beaver Dam grew very rapidly. There was some speculation—property doubled in value, particularly after the railroad became to be considered as a reality.

It is a far cry, from those days when your population could be numbered on the fingers of one hand, to the present time when your population is more than 10,000.

It is a far cry, from the original Beaver Dam settlement when the farms of the seven first settlers were located toward the southwest terminus of Railroad Avenue, to the present time when you are a city of many factories, great industries, and thousands of workers.

More than three centuries have passed into the mists of time since Nicollet traveled through the Beaver Dam region on his journey southward.

Almost a century and a quarter has elapsed since James Duane Doty camped overnight in Beaver Dam on what was later known as West Front Street.

THREADS RUNNING THROUGH BEAVER DAM HISTORY ARE PART OF PATTERN OF AMERICAN LIFE AND IDEALS

It is a far cry from 1841 to 1941, and yet, throughout the century, there have been certain threads running through the pattern of community life in Beaver Dam, of territorial life in the northwest territory, of statehood in the State of Wisconsin and in the life of the Nation, which threads, thank God, remain part of the pattern of American life and American ideals today.

Today, as then, we are a Nation of free and independent people. Today, as then, we are a Nation of religious people.

We meet today to look back over a span of a century. It is good to know that throughout that century your community has developed not only its material resources but the great spiritual values—the values the Nation needs most today.

Reverend Ordway and Reverend Miter were among your pioneer clergymen. There were meetings in some of the cabins of the first settlers, and there was a church organized on the 1st day of June in 1843 in Thomas Mackie's cabin, and later the timber for the first church was hauled from the woods in the spring of 1844.

I believe with Hans Christian Andersen that "Time is so fleeting that if we do not remember God in our youth, age may find us incapable of thinking about Him."

I believe that in the days up ahead it will be necessary for us to lift our philosophy of living to a high spiritual level, where we have faith in the ultimate victory of righteousness, faith in the strength of our people, and faith in our destiny as directed by the Creator.

These are not the twilight years of democracy. We face the dawn of a new world, though it is not Hitler's new world.

These are not vague ideals. They are just as real as the iron sinews of the men and women who made them a reality in your own community and in our State and in our Nation.

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT MUST BE GREAT BECAUSE OF GREATNESS OF ITS PEOPLE

The people of Beaver Dam have always striven for social and political betterment. You have always built great churches and great schools. You have always demonstrated a spirit of self-denial and sacrifice, to support the community welfare.

We will need that spirit in the days up ahead. We will need to rekindle the flame which your pioneer forbears lit. We will need to strengthen our moral fiber. We will need to reassert fundamentals in government.

We will need to recovenant our faith in vital principles. We will need patriotism. We will need to ground our education, as your forbears did, in the same solid virtues of thrift, and morality, and integrity, and honesty, and fair dealing.

We will need to reinstill the simple, homely virtues of the American spirit that made this country great.

The American Government must be and will be great because of the greatness of its people in communities such as Beaver Dam. The people do not become great solely because of the Government.

THROUGHOUT AMERICAN HISTORY OUR PEOPLE HAVE ALWAYS MET THE CHALLENGES WHICH CONFRONTED THEM

Your community has seen, since that day in 1840 when the Jacksonian era was closed, hardy explorers defying the Rocky Mountain blizzards and crossing the arid wastes of sands, threading their way through sagebrush and cactus through the passes of the Great Divide, to follow the courses of the boiling rivers in a far-western migration.

Your community has seen the driving force of westward expansion sending thousands of land-hungry pioneers out from the Mississippi Valley far across the Sabine and Red Rivers.

Your community lived through the days when Taylor won his victory at Buena Vista, when Scott took the Mexican capital, when we completed our program of expansion by the cession of New Mexico and California, when we made our businessmen's peace in the new far West, when the compromise of 1850 was written, when America asserted her manifest destiny, and when our Nation became a house divided.

Those were the decades which saw the peninsular campaign and the Battle of Antietam, the emancipation proclamation, the year of defeatism in 1863. They saw the battle of Gettysburg, the fall of Vicksburg, the Battle of Chickamauga. They saw Grant move on Richmond, they saw Lincoln reelected, and they saw Sherman's march to the sea and the collapse of confederacy.

Then there were years when they saw a united country fighting for wealth and power. There were reconstruction years. There was a great economic revolution and a new industrial age with the opening of a mighty western empire.

There was a tremendous period of agricultural development and the first beginning of the era of big business.

There were years of colorful political battles, there were years of fighting for tariff reform, there were years of trust battling. There was a western land boom.

There was the Spanish-American War and there was a Hague Conference—now almost forgotten. There was a Roosevelt era—and, though it is hard to believe, it was not the same Roosevelt that we know today.

There was a revolution in Panama. There was a progressive movement. There was seething social agitation. There was a period of woman's suffrage and municipal reform.

There was a rise of nationalism. There was an era of "new freedom" with Wilson. There were the same old problems of struggling for neutrality, and there was the war.

There was the post-war neurosis and the post-war shell-shocked economy. There was the gruesome aftermath of that war.

There were the days of market manipulations, and there was the inevitable crash of 1929.

Beaver Dam lived through all of these periods and it survived the experimentation of recent years.

At the turn of the century the United States entered upon the "new and untried path" of empire. We entered a great war. We began a period of international idealism, and we supplanted the ideal with a devotion to "national interest." We had a period of unexampled prosperity—prosperity not built on the bedrock of sound principles, but growing like a speculative mushroom. We hit bottom in 1929.

Throughout the history of America every step of American development has brought new responsibilities to communities such as Beaver Dam, to our Government, and to our people. The Government and the people have always met these challenges, have always met these responsibilities, have always met these duties and these obligations.

PEOPLE HAVE ALWAYS EMERGED STRONGER FROM PERIODS OF CRISIS

Out of every crisis in American history the American people have emerged stronger physically, morally, and spiritually than ever before.

That is the legacy which comes to you from your century-old history. That is the heritage of high hopes and courage born of the knowledge that America has always met every challenge, whether it was a dissension-torn people in a reconstruction era, a carpetbag government, or a greenback economy.

The important thing to remember about this legacy is the simple truth—that our people have always met every crisis and emerged stronger. We have emerged stronger because we grasped our way back the hard way. We tightened our belts. We made sacrifices. We lived within our means. We paid our bills. We cut out luxury in government. We sweated our way to prosperity.

There is no record anywhere in the history of the United States where the people of this land have ever been coddled and spoon-fed through a major crisis. The people of the United States as individuals and as a nation have always stood on their own feet to fight adversity, and in so doing they have always become stronger. We develop through sacrifice, hard work, and decent living.

WISCONSIN ONCE A PART OF TERRITORY DOMINATED BY EUROPEAN CONTROL

The people of our State have frequently fought adversity. Just 2 days ago we celebrated Independence Day. It is interesting for us to recall that our founding fathers knew little or nothing about our section of the country, although our vast area of some 56,000 square miles had already been traversed by the French explorers.

It is not my purpose today to discuss the two centuries of romance and adventure which preceded the days when Wisconsin emerged from the winding Indian trails onto the broad highways of this great agricultural, dairying, and industrial State.

I think it is well for us, however, to recall that when John Jay and John Adams went to Paris to join Benjamin Franklin, the fate of the West and the fate of Wisconsin was at stake.

There was a treaty signed on September 3, 1783, and under the terms of that treaty Wisconsin was included in the United States.

Again, during the War of 1812, the fate of Wisconsin was dependent upon a European treaty. The Treaty of Ghen ended European control in the Northwest, and Wisconsin Territory was still a part of the United States.

It is natural for all of us to be concerned with the present world crisis, and it is probably even more natural here in Wisconsin, with our heritage and with our mingled bloodstreams, that we should be gravely concerned.

In 1863, on July 4, an unknown man wrote a hymn which I think is as applicable now as it was then. He wrote:

"Lord, the people of the land,
In Thy presence humbly stand;
On this day, when Thou didst free
Men of old from tyranny,
We, their children, bow to Thee.
* * * * *
"With one heart the Nation's cries,
From our choral lips arise:
Thou didst point a noble way
For our fathers through the fray;
Lead their children thus today!"

It is appropriate today, when we observe a century of history—a century of freedom for Beaver Dam—that we recall that Wisconsin was once territory dominated by European control.

During the Revolutionary days, our State was a land of virgin forests, inhabited only by the painted tribesmen of Wisconsin. Its towering pines reached up to the sky, and its Great Lakes, Superior and Michigan, and the great Father of the Waters, the Mississippi River, were known only to a few, and they thought of them as names associated with distant lands.

Our Commonwealth was little known in the days when the Nation was born, but today we have a population comparable with that of the Thirteen Original Colonies.

From the days when our Nation established its independence to that day some 65 years later when the city of Beaver Dam was founded this Nation underwent tremendous social and economic changes. In the century since the founding of this community we have undergone even more tremendous social and material changes.

WE MUST CLING TO FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

Through these changes, however, we have clung steadfastly to the fundamental American freedoms and to our fundamental American ideals.

We are confronted with changes in our way of life today, but we are confronted also with the obligation of holding steadfast to those same freedoms and those same ideals which made America great.

The lesson of the legacy of the past 10 decades is the simple lesson that we cannot whip a crisis with a nation whose initiative and courage and resourcefulness has become permanently hospitalized.

There are days of sacrifice up ahead—lean, hard days—but they will be days which will make us strong and successful.

On this hundredth anniversary of the founding of Beaver Dam, we could say of this community and of this people, as has been said of individuals, "Come along and grow old with me—the best is yet to be."

Our sacrifices must make us stronger—that is the message of a fighting hope for our economy and for free enterprise today. That is a message which repudiates every bit of demagogic claptrap and "fifth column" defeatism which would crucify our vitality and sap our morale.

We must continue to believe in social progress and social betterment, but we must never subscribe to a social progress which crucifies our traditional American freedoms and initiatives.

We must continue to stand for the most widespread benefit of the blessings of civilization. We must continue to strive for security, for savings, for protection against unemployment and impoverished old age, but we must gain these securities without a destruction of human or material values.

The days of the oxcart trail winding into Beaver Dam, the days of the highly individual self-sufficiency of your pioneer forebears—those days have vanished in the social mists which hang low over a great mechanized and urbanized world, but the sturdy pioneer spirit which accomplished them must live on.

These are historic days. It is vital that as citizens we maintain our mental poise. It is vital that we think clearly. So long as we do so, the Congress of the United States will not be stampeded by hysteria, whether it be on matters of foreign policy or domestic economy.

The men in Washington are the servants of the citizens of the United States. The citizens must remain the masters and government the servant.

We stand today on what may be the brink of a new world, but we must never lose sight of those great values which we see today through the mists of a hundred years of community growth.

We must never lose sight of the courage, of the initiative which it took to carve communities such as Beaver Dam from frontier lands.

We must never lose sight of the great values which our forebears created and maintained.

We must never lose sight of the fact that this is the land of great freedoms—this is the land where you and I can speak our minds, can express our convictions, can write our beliefs, can worship as we choose, can assemble when we will, can petition as we desire, can collect our wages and invest them as we choose, can retain our property as we will, can cherish our independence as we always have.

These are the freedoms which our forebears won and builded into the framework of our lives.

When we meet today to observe a century of history, we do homage not only to these pioneer forebears, but to these ideals.

It is not enough for us to review the achievements of the past decades. It is not enough for us to retell the stories and the legends of the pioneers who peopled this section. For us to merely retell these stories is but to render lip service to the past.

Our job is to rededicate ourselves and our communities and our State and our Nation to those ideals which have made us a great people.

I believe in the doctrine of growth. I believe that on firm foundations of the achievements of the past century you will build even more glorious achievements.

John Greenleaf Whittier once wrote a great centennial hymn which was sung at the opening of the World's Fair in Philadelphia in 1876.

In the first stanza he said:

"Our fathers' God, from out whose hand,
The centuries fall like grains of sand,
We meet today, united, free,
And loyal to our land and Thee,
To thank Thee for the era done
And trust Thee for the opening one."

And in his last stanza he expresses the hope that however glorious the achievements of the past may have been, the achievements of the future will be even greater.

"Oh, make Thou us, through centuries long,
In peace secure, in justice strong;
Around our gift of freedom draw
The safeguards of Thy righteous law;
And, cast in some diviner mold,
Let the new cycle shame the old."

Let us have faith that God will guard and guide this great Nation and that our acts as a people under his guidance will redound to the peace, happiness, and joy of all the peoples of earth.

Delay of Defense Projects by Strikes, and Ban on Criticism of C. I. O.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STYLES BRIDGES

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 14, 1941

ARTICLES FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD two articles from the New York Times of July 14. One is entitled "One Hundred and Eighty-seven Strikes Cost 2,458,150 Man-Days"; or a total of nearly 20,000,000 man-hours in the first 6 months of this year on War Department contracts alone.

Another article, which I ask to have printed in connection with the first one, is headed "Anti-C. I. O. Talk Tabooed in Plant"; in which the Allis-Chalmers Co. agrees to punish, or even discharge, men showing union hostility.

I think these are two important items in connection with our defense program, particularly the latter item, which goes as far as forcing a company to agree to punish or discharge men for showing hostility to an existing union.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of July 14, 1941]

ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-SEVEN STRIKES COST 2,458,150 MAN-DAYS—TIE-UPS ON DEFENSE PROJECTS IN HALF YEAR INVOLVED 213,900 WORKERS—DECLINING NOW

WASHINGTON, July 13.—Strikes in factories working on Army contracts and among workmen on War Department and defense industry construction projects resulted in a loss of 2,458,150 man-days during the first 6 months of 1941, a study of War Department charts of labor disputes disclosed tonight.

Army contracts were delayed by a total of 187 strikes, involving 213,900 workers, with each strike lasting an average of 11 days and involving 1,144 men.

While officials are heartened by the steady decline in strikes which began in mid-June, the Department's records showed little difference in the rate and magnitude of strikes during the first quarter as compared with the second.

In January, February, and March there were 93 strikes, involving 100,750 men, which cost 1,193,500 man-days, while in April, May, and June there were 94 stoppages, involving a total of 113,150 workmen and a resultant loss of 1,264,650 man-days.

ALLIS TIE-UP LASTED 75 DAYS

The strike wave reached three peaks during the 6-month period. The first was in March, when the 75-day Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co. strike at Milwaukee was at its height. That strike alone cost 421,000 man-days.

The second was late in May, when the total of man-days lost was increased by the wildcat strikes in a few General Motors plants. These strikes lasted only a few days while the corporation was deciding whether it would accept a National Defense Mediation Board recommendation that it grant the United Automobile Workers, C. I. O., a 10-cent hourly wage increase.

The third peak came early in June, caused by the C. I. O. strike at the Inglewood, Calif., plant of North American Aviation, broken after 6 days by Army occupation of the plant, and the aluminum workers' strikes at the Cleveland plant of the Aluminum Co. of America and the Detroit plants of Bohn Aluminum & Brass Co.

The decline in labor disputes began about June 16, even before the German invasion of Russia dictated a change in the Communist Party line calling for obstructing aid to Britain and United States defense efforts. Officials believe, however, that only a few of the 187 strikes listed could be attributed to Communist or Nazi influence, and Secretary Perkins has set the figure at 7 or 8.

TWENTY-ONE STRIKES IN PROGRESS NOW

The comparative peacefulness of American industrial relations at present is indicated by War Department figures showing that on Friday only 21 strikes were in progress, involving fewer than 11,000 workers.

Officials said that the War Department records did not include the April-long shutdown of the Appalachian bituminous-coal fields, with a resultant loss of 6,000,000 man-days, because that industry had no direct War Department orders. The records also did not include the 1,000,000 man-days lost in the Ford Motor Co. River Rouge strike because it was impossible to determine the exact extent of the delay in War Department projects.

Surprise was expressed in some quarters that more days were lost in the machine-tools and parts industry, a vital link in expanding defense production, than in the booming aircraft industry. In the machine-tool industry each of the 16 strikes lasted an average of 15 days and involved an average of 860 workers, while in aircraft engines and parts each of the 17 strikes lasted an average of only 7 days and involved an average of 1,800 men.

Strikes in plants working on mechanical and electrical equipment and parts lasted an average of 14 days and involved an average of 820 workers, and all but 148,000 of the 569,000 man-days lost were chargeable to the Allis-Chalmers U. A. W.-C. I. O. walk-out.

The strike study was the first of its kind dealing solely with War Department orders, and the figures for the first 6 months of this year cannot, therefore, be compared with the 1940 period, when the all-out defense program had not been started.

TRYING TO END CURRENT STRIKES

This week the National Defense Mediation Board will intensify its efforts to end the walk-out among U. A. W.-A. F. L. workers at the Sealed Power Corporation, Muskegon, Mich., which already has closed two other defense factories and is causing War Department officials "extreme concern."

The Board also will speed efforts to bring about a settlement of collective-bargaining differences between the A. F. L. Chemical Workers Union, which twice has threatened a strike at the East Alton (Ill.) smokeless-powder division of the Western Cartridge Co., which has $4,800,000 worth of Army orders.

There was talk of the Government commandeering the plant to prevent a production stoppage during the period in which the company had refused to grant the A. F. of L. union recognition as exclusive bargaining agency. The company later accorded such recognition.

C. I. O. vice presidents will assemble here Tuesday for a conference with Philip Murray, C. I. O. president, and the organization's full executive board will convene on Wednesday to discuss new plans for organizing campaigns and internal union problems.

The executive board is expected to award the 1941 convention to Detroit, and it is expected the session will be held late in October.

ANTI-C. I. O. TALK TABOOED IN PLANT—ALLIS-CHALMERS AGREES TO PUNISH, EVEN DISCHARGE, MEN SHOWING UNION HOSTILITY—BAD FOR "SHOP DISCIPLINE"—DEAN GARRISON, REFEREE, TELLS OF WEST ALLIS PACT—SAYS NO ONE HAS TO JOIN UNION

MADISON, WIS., July 13.—Employees of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co. can refrain from joining plant unions but may be subject to discipline, possibly discharge, for hostile speech or actions against the local C. I. O. union on company premises under an agreement just announced.

Terms of the agreement, reached between the West Allis management and its C. I. O. United Automobile Workers local, have been outlined by Dean Lloyd K. Garrison, of the University of Wisconsin Law School, whom the National Defense Mediation Board appointed referee May 1 in deciding plant grievances.

His appointment had followed a 76-day strike at the plant which ended in April after halting production on $45,000,000 in national-defense orders.

A summary of the agreement issued by Dean Garrison stated in part:

"An employee who elects not to join Local 248 (C. I. O.) or to join a rival labor organization may do so, but he is warned that if he says or does anything against Local 248 on the company premises he is likely to cause an 'interference with shop discipline,' which, under the agreement, will subject him to being disciplined.

"Specifically, hostile remarks about Local 248, sneering at or insulting its members or officials, directing special attention to the buttons of rival organizations by pointing to them in front of others and similar acts of an aggressive nature against Local 248, particularly when performed by persons known for their antagonism to Local 248, have been found to interfere with shop discipline and to justify lay-offs or, if necessary, discharges, according to the circumstances."

The post of referee in company-employee relations was set up by the Defense Mediation Board in its negotiations settling the strike, which was called originally by the union over demands including a closed shop.